THE little Confederate navy is growing with a rapidity that begins to give serious alarm to the Northern papers. On March 10, a new ironclad steamer, the Ashley, was launched at Charleston, making seven in that single port ready to attack the Federal fleet on the first favourable opportunity. The Confederacy has thirty-four ironclad steamers, either finished or in progress of construction, between the James and Red Rivers, and a larger number of other steamers and sailing vessels. The time is not distant when a few of the more formidable of the iron-clads may be expected to leave the harbours and rivers they now defend, and illustrate for the Yankees their favourite apothegm—'Some things can be done as well as others.'

WE quote from the ode sung at the opening ceremonies of the New York Sanitary Fair, two stanzas, which probably did not strike those who sang or listened to them as false and blasphemous:—

God of all nations, Sovereign Lord,
In thy dread name we draw the sword,
We lift the starry flag on high
That fills with light our stormy sky.

No more its floating folds wave
To bar from hope the trembling slave,
No more its radiant glories shine
To blast with woe one child of thine.

And this is written of the flag under which armies march to slay, subjugate, plunder, and exterminate those whom they were a few years ago proud to call their brethren! But better than any observation of ours, as a commentary on these earth and heaven defying lines, is the following brief extract from the New York World:—'We were told when the war broke out that the people of the North—Christians—were going South to regenerate the "lost tribes" of that region. How has it been done? Let the still-smoking ruins of Hopefield and Greenville, and Lake Providence, and Young's Landing tell the story. We were told, too, that the war would redeem the race of blacks from bondage. How has this been done? Let the lecherous scoundrels who disgrace the name of officer or private answer. The morals of the North were shocked by the narratives of Harriet Beecher Stowe and Mr. Trowbridge, but what has our army done? What became of the poor contrabands that escaped into our lines at White River, Nashville, and Bridgeport? The brutality of our officers at these points exceeded anything that fiction could produce. Has it come to this—that the stars and stripes, once so respected and feared, are to cover robbery and piracy, and make them legal through power?'

No more its radiant glories shine
To blast with woe one child of thine.

THE Federal flagship Minnesota, lying in Hampton Roads, has been seriously damaged by a Confederate torpedo. The Maple Leaf, a Federal gunboat in Florida, has been completely destroyed, with the loss of four of her crew, by a similar agency. The rivers and harbours of the South have not only formidable artillery on their shores, but their bottoms are covered at certain points with batteries that would hurl every ship in the Federal navy much nearer the clouds than they care about sailing. A monitor might possibly run into Charleston harbour under the fire of the batteries, and get out again: but what could a monitor do when blown into the air by the explosion of a ton of gunpowder under her? With such dangers lurking in their path, the Federal commodores have considered that 'the better part of valour is discretion.'

THE following is the resolution unanimously adopted by the United States House of Representatives in regard to the establishment of a monarchy in Mexico:—

Resolved,—That the Congress of the United States are unwilling by silence to leave the nations of the world under the impression that they are indifferent spectators of the deplorable events now transpiring in the republic of Mexico; therefore they think it fit to declare that it does not accord with the people of the United States to acknowledge a monarchical Government erected on the ruins of any republican Government in America, under the auspices of any European Power.

The Committee of Foreign Affairs in the Senate, acting, it is said, under the influence of the Government, had reported against the concurrence of the Senate with the above resolution, and it was indefinitely postponed—which means that it was postponed until the success of General Grant in the subjugation of the South should give to the Monroe doctrine an odour of practicability. Meantime, we learn that three French frigates were at last dates preparing to enter the Rio Grande, and that French troops were about to occupy Matamoras, on the borders of Texas.

THE officers of the Federal Government continue to make seizures of persons and things. The Provost-Marshal-General has ordered the seizure of Pollard's History of the War, the Confederate Official Reports, the Life of Stonewall Jackson, Morgan and his Men, and 'all publications based upon rebel information' in the department of General Rosecrans. General McCullum has seized for the United States Government all the unfinished locomotives at Portland, Maine, which were being constructed for the Grand Trunk (Canada) Railway. Finally, there is a large business done in seizing runaway British subjects for soldiers, disloyal clergymen who refuse to pray for the Union, and unhappy contrabands, who, if able-bodied men, have the choice of working on plantations under Yankee drivers, or being marched to slaughter by Yankee officers.

Counterfeit greenbacks have been taken to Canada in large quantities for the purchase of horses, cattle, and provisions, says the Montreal Telegraph; a fact which, we presume, does not increase the affection of the Canadians for their Yankee neighbours. 'Early in the war the Confederate currency was openly counterfeited in New York. The retribution comes now from possibly the same ingenious speculators, and can scarcely fail to produce the most disastrous effects upon the sinking currency.

The New York Herald, which has persistently glorified General Grant for months, does not approve of a simultaneous advance of three columns on Richmond, and predicts that if his orders are in any way interfered with, 'this division of forces will originate disaster.'

The Court of Appeals of the State of Virginia has unanimously affirmed the constitutionality of the recent Act of the Confederate Congress abolishing substitutions in the military service. The permission of substitution, it was held, was not a contract, but an act of grace and favour, which the Government had the right to repeal whenever the exigencies of the country required it. The Confederacy is a camp, and every citizen a soldier. There are, no doubt, exceptions to the almost universal devotion, but there are also thousands of old men regretting that their age unfits them for service, and thousands of ardent youth longing for the day when they can be soldiers. Among the defenders of Richmond is a corps of boys, whose commander is eighteen.

General Johnston's army is reported to have been largely reinforced, as expected, from the armies of Generals Beauregard and Polk, which have been engaged in the defence of Charleston and Mobile.

The renowned Confederate war-steamer Alabama was at Cape Town, March 21, where, as in every British colonial port she has visited, she is a great favourite, and was greeted, says the correspondent of the London Telegraph, by a crowd of citizens with hearty congratulations on her arrival once more in safety under the protection of the British flag. She took in coal and supplies, and Captain Semmes entertained numerous visitors. Yankee ships are very scarce in the eastern seas, so that she had taken only nine prizes.

The rule of General Banks in New Orleans, as described in our correspondence and exchanges, does not appear to differ very essentially from that inaugurated by his infamous predecessor. The banishment of Mr. Denegre for declining to be counted in with several deceased citizens of New Orleans as parties to the organisation of the new State Government; that of Dr. Mercier, a distinguished physician, for writing a private letter of kindly advice; the imprisonment and banishment of a lady for an innocent, misinterpreted gesture—were acts worthy of General Butler; but an order to the banks of New Orleans, transmitted to us in manuscript, seems more crafty and rapacious, if possible, than the acts of that unscrupulous satrap. The banks are ordered to report the minutest particulars of all their business transactions for three years past, both before and since the Federal occupation of the city, with the evident object of wholesale confiscation, reaching them and their customers, whether private individuals or the Confederate Government. It is a bill of discovery directed against the wealth and finances of the South-west. The evident motive is plunder; the immediate incitement was probably the fact that the notes of these banks are some five per cent. nearer the standard of gold than the paper of the Federal Government.

ENGLAND.

The first sitting of the Conference on the Danish question was fixed for Wednesday, April 20, and some of the members thereof met at the official residence of the First Lord of the Treasury in Downing Street on that day. However, Herr von Beust did not appear, and the meeting was adjourned to Monday last. On the latter day the Conference met for the despatch of business. The Plenipotentiaries are: Earl Russell and Lord Clarendon for England; Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne for France; Count Apponyi and Privy-Councillor Biegeleben for Austria; Count Bernstorff and Privy-Councillor Balan, formerly Ambassador at Copenhagen, for Prussia; Herr von Beust, Saxon Minister, for the German Confederation; Baron Brunow and Councillor Ewers for Russia; General Wachtmeister for Sweden; Baron de Bille, M. Quaade (the Minister), and Councillor Krieger, for Denmark.

The difficulty with respect to the Under-Secretaries of State, as already explained in our columns, has been overcome. Mr. Chichester Fortescue will remain at the Colonial Office; Mr. Thomas Baring, now in the India Office, will be Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, in the room of Mr. Bruce, who has been made Vice-President of the Council in the place of the Right Hon. Robert Lowe. Lord Wodehouse will be Under-Secretary for India. By this arrangement only four Under-Secretaries of State will have seats in the House of Commons.

The Bank Court, influenced probably by the present Governor, has determined that the Bank of England shall become a member of the Clearing House. Hitherto the Bank has effected settlements by the agency of collecting clerks. The new system will render yet more perfect the banking facilities already existing in London.

A writ from the Court of Exchequer was served on the Collector of Customs at Liverpool on Friday last, ordering him to deliver the Alexandra to her owners; and in consequence the Collector informed Messrs. Fletcher & Stone, solicitors for Messrs. Sillem and others, that the vessel would be delivered up at once to them.

General Garibaldi has quitted England. On Wednesday, April 20, Garibaldi went from Mr. Seely's house at Prince's Gate along Piccadilly, the Strand, and Cheapside, to Guildhall. On his arrival he was conducted to the Council Chamber, where, after the reading of the resolution of the Common Council, the Chamberlain of London addressed the General in a lengthy speech replete with eulogy. Afterwards the General signed the Roll of Honorary Citizenship, and his name appears in succession after those of Mr. George Peabody, Mr. Cobden, and His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The General was further presented with a gold box of the value of 100 guineas, with the arms of the City engraved thereon, with a raised star in gold and the letter G. in brilliants mounted upon it, and the resolution of the Common Council engraved on the inside of the lid. On leaving Guildhall, Garibaldi was escorted to the Mansion House, where he was entertained at a magnificent luncheon in the Egyptian Hall. In the evening Garibaldi dined with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Mrs. Gladstone. After dinner Mrs. Gladstone held a reception, which was very numerously attended. Three Archbishops, the Bishops of London and Gloucester, the Premier, the Speaker of the House of Commons, great numbers of earls, barons, and ladies of title, and men of high position were present. On Thursday morning the members of the Reform Club entertained the General at luncheon. Lord Ebury was in the chair. M. Jullien's band was in attendance with the leaders of the chorus of Her Majesty's Theatre. After the toast of the General had been honoured, the chorus, led by Signor Arditi, sang the Garibaldi Hymn. In the afternoon the General visited the House of Commons and the House of Lords. He was conducted by Sir Augustus Clifford, bearing the Black Rod, through the Peers' Library to the House of Lords, and was accompanied by Lord Shaftesbury to the space within the railings at the foot of the throne. The Bishop of Oxford, Lord Harrowby, and Lord Russell left their seats to greet him. In the evening the Fishmongers' Company entertained Garibaldi at dinner, and presented him with the freedom of their order enclosed in a gold box studded with precious stones. On Friday the General left London. Previous to his departure the Prince of Wales, who had come to London on business, paid a visit to the General at Stafford House. Afterwards Garibaldi proceeded to Clifden House near Maidenhead, where he remained as the guest of the Dowager Duchess of Sutherland till Monday; on that day he left for Cornwall. On Tuesday he embarked on board the Duke of Sutherland's yacht on his voyage home to Caprera.

Last Saturday, the 23rd April, had been definitely fixed upon as the tercentenary anniversary of the birth of Shakspeare, and the worthy inhabitants of Stratford-on-Avon have made, and are now carrying into effect, the most elaborate designs for the due celebration of the interesting period. The idea, however, has spread far beyond the limits of the Warwickshire town, and London itself is inundated with pictures, books, and various publications commemorating the festival. Even Punch has condescended to produce a tercentenary number. The interest, however, of the whole affair is of course centred in Stratford-on-Avon. The programme for the festival embraced a banquet, fireworks, the 'Messiah,' a grand concert with the words from Shakspeare, the plays of 'Twelfth Night,' 'Romeo and Juliet,' the 'Comedy of Errors,' 'As You Like It,' with a grand fancy ball, and other amusements. The services of Mesdames Parepa, Sainton-Dolby, Arabella Goddard, and of Messrs. Sims Reeves, Santley, and Alfred Mellon, have been engaged for the musical part of the affair, while Mr. Sothern, Mr. Buckstone, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Compton, Mr. Vining, Mr. Chippendale, Miss Lindley, Miss C. Carson, Mrs. Charles Young, and other dramatic celebrities, have been secured for the performance of the plays from Shakspeare and the other pieces. Of these designs many have been realised.

The Shakspeare jubilee, as celebrated on Primrose Hill on Saturday last, renders ordinary mortals suspicious of the existence of that sound sense to which Englishmen lay claim. Handbills had been stuck about the streets imploring the public to march in a vast procession from Russell Square to Primrose Hill, in celebration of a 'Working Men's Shakspeare Jubilee and Great National Festival.' The procession no doubt did assemble, and did march along the prescribed route: but inasmuch as it consisted of only 500 persons, principally remarkable for their idiotic attire of green velvet, feathers, and paint, and the tattered condition of their miserable banners, and inasmuch as the cabs and omnibuses took a fiendish delight in cutting up the regularity of their ranks, it may well be imagined that the spectacle was not imposing. At Primrose Hill Mr. Phelps and Mr. Fechter turned up; a 'people's oak' was planted, and, having been planted, was christened with water from the Avon, brought in a bottle so ably corked as to defy for some minutes all attempts at extraction of the stopper. A lady made a speech, and a gentleman recited an ode, and all was supposed to be over. But the 'Working Man's Garibaldi Reception Committee' resolved to hold a meeting 'for the purpose of protesting against the manner in which Garibaldi had been hurried away from England, and to demand further explanations from the Government as to the cause of his hurried departure.' Mr. Edward Beales was called upon to preside, and proceeded at once to declare that Mr. Gladstone and Lord Shaftesbury had not stated all they knew. At this moment an inspector of police with a division of constables appeared on the scene, and interrupted the harmony of the meeting by threatening to disperse the assembly by force. Mr. Robert Hartwell has written to the public journals to protest against the conduct of the police, and another meeting is called for Saturday week.

On the 25th inst., Mr. Justice Crompton charged the grand jury of Middlesex in the Court of Queen's Bench. It was expected that an indictment would be preferred before them on the case of the Rappahannock. It will be recollected that this ship belonged to our Admiralty, and was purchased from them by certain persons on behalf of the Confederate Government; the defendant in this case, Mr. Rumball, was said to have been concerned in getting her refitted and sent to Calais, and further in getting men to embark on her with a view to their enlistment under the Confederate Government when she arrived at Calais. The case arises under the same statute as that by which the cases of the Alabama, the Alexandra, and the steam-rams were governed. The duty of the Judge on the present occasion was to direct the grand jury as to the effect of that statute upon the case before him—in fact, to state to them his construction of the Act. The learned Judge directed them on the question of fact, to decide whether the defendant had procured the enlistment of any persons into the Confederate service in this country, or had gone over to France and there procured such enlistment; the former proceeding being a violation of the Act, the latter not being so. Coming then to the notorious seventh section, which forbids any person to 'equip, &c., any ship or vessel with intent that such ship should be employed in the service of a foreign State,' the learned Judge declared that he agreed with the judgment of Mr. Baron Channell in the case of the Alexandra; he considered that if the equipment was of such a nature as to make the vessel more available for warlike purposes, that would be sufficient to justify the jury in finding a true bill. There was no dispute that as to the equipment whatever was charged had been done in this country. If then the jury thought that there had been in this country such a hiring or such an equipment as he had explained, they must find the bill, leaving it to the Court to deal with the questions of law. The evidence on this case is not yet complete, so that in point of fact no bill was ready to be preferred, and the matter will not come on till May 4.

The first case that came before the Court of Queen's Bench was that of the Confederates now in custody at Liverpool, on a charge of piracy alleged to have been committed in the seizure by them of the Federal schooner the Gerity. This vessel, bound from Matamoros to New York, was in the Gulf of Mexico, about five miles from land, when certain passengers who had embarked at Matamoros suddenly seized upon the master and crew, informed them that they were prisoners to the Confederates, and showed them documents purporting to be granted by President Davis, and authorising what they did. The crew were put ashore on the coast of Yucatan; the ship was taken to Belize, and has not since been heard of. In February last, the prisoners, who were among those concerned in this seizure, were found in this country, and thereupon a requisition was made by Mr. Adams, the United States Minister, to Sir George Grey, the Home Secretary, to have them delivered up under the extradition treaty of 1852. A warrant for their detention was accordingly issued, the terms of which state that the said prisoners, by name J. Clements, T. Wilson, D. O'Brien, and — Kelly, were to be apprehended 'for the purpose of their being dealt with according to the provisions of the extradition treaty, and delivered up to justice pursuant to the Act for giving effect to the said treaty, if found to be within the same.' According to this treaty it was agreed between Her Majesty and the United States that 'the authorities respectively should deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with the crime of murder or piracy or arson or robbery or forgery committed within the jurisdiction of either of the contracting parties, should be found within the territories of the other, provided that this should be done only upon such evidence of criminality as would, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive should be found, justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime had been there committed.' Upon the Home Secretary's warrant, and the information of Nicholas, the master of the schooner, the men were apprehended by the local magistrate; but, it being contended on their behalf that they had acted under the orders of their Government and not as pirates, it was thought advisable to give them the opportunity of applying to a higher tribunal. Mr. Justice Willes, the Senior Judge of Assize at Liverpool, to whom application was made on their behalf for a writ of habeas corpus, took the same view, saying that it would be an abuse that the men should be given up to their probable doom without their having the opportunity of taking the opinion of the superior courts. They were accordingly remanded. A motion was made on the 25th inst., by Mr. James, to the Court of Queen's Bench for a rule ordering a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the gaoler at Liverpool, with a view to the discharge of the men from custody. He contended that they were entitled to the writ on several grounds. First, the act committed was not piracy; it was an act done on behalf of one belligerent upon another; the actors in the affair might or might not be British subjects; it was sufficient that they were none of them Federal subjects. Secondly, even if the act was one of piracy, it was piracy jure gentium, and therefore not within the treaty, but a crime triable and punishable in England as much as in the United States: a pirate was hostis humani generis. The learned counsel further contended that the extradition treaty could not apply in this case, inasmuch as the act was not piracy by English law. He quoted 'Wheaton's International Law,' p. 253, to prove that the act, in the eye of the United States courts, was not piracy jure gentium, but only piracy against their own municipal law, to which we have none corresponding. Mr. Justice Blackburn said his doubt was whether it would not be lawful to detain the men to be tried in this country. The learned counsel pointed out that the warrants were made out for their apprehension not for the purpose of being tried here, but expressly that they might be delivered over to the United States authorities; and if their detention was declared lawful, they must be at once delivered up, as Mr. Justice Willes had observed, 'to their probable doom.' The Court granted a rule nisi for the writ of habeas corpus.

THE CONTINENT.

On April 18, the assault and capture of the Danish position at Duppel took place. At early dawn on that day the troops destined for the assault were stationed in the trenches, with the reserve in rear under shelter. A terrific cannonade of about three hours' duration was the inauguration of the combat. Suddenly, at 10 A.M. precisely, the batteries by common consent became mute; a few moments of silence, the dead calm of the impending storm, and from the most advanced Prussian trenches, with wild cheers, the six columns of attack dashed simultaneously. A feeble fire of grape and musketry did not check their course; the columns bore onwards like parallel waves, preceded by a fringe of skirmishers and crested with a light foam of sparkling bayonets. Not a shot had been fired on the Prussian side to mar the symmetry of the picture. Another quarter of an hour, and the wave had flooded the first six bastions of the Danish lines; in the midst of it struggled the few defenders, soon all to be killed, wounded, or captured. Again three-quarters of an hour, and the advancing tide of steel had reached bastions Nos. 7, 8, and 9, and the second or rear line of redoubts. Bastion No. 10 capitulated. All the endeavours of the shattered Danish army were now directed to an escape; there was shelter on the Isle of Alsen, but the Prussians were pressing them hard: what if the enemy should succeed in passing over the connecting bridge together with the fugitives? The danger was too great, the evil too imminent, to admit of half-measures; the better part of the Danes had passed the bridge in security; as the Prussians came up, it was destroyed, leaving three Danish regiments on the other side. The tête de pont and its defenders, thus cut off from their base, were quickly overpowered: the capture of the position was complete at noon. The Rolf Krake tried to help her countrymen from the sea, but was forced to withdraw from a heavy fire; the Danish liner Skiold could not take any share in the fight. Marshal von Wrangel and the Prince Royal of Prussia were present at the assault, which was led by the Prince Frederick Charles. General von Gerlach, though still suffering from his accident, was carried in an arm-chair to the Danish front, and superintended the defence.

The losses on the two sides, as officially published, are, on the Danish side:—Killed, 1 general, 2 colonels-commandant, the second in command of the staff, 18 other officers, and 580 men; wounded, 21 officers or more, and about 1,380 men; prisoners, 44 officers, and 3,145 men; making a general total of upwards of 5,000 men. Expressed in another way, the loss included almost one entire brigade (the 1st) and more than half of the 8th. In the 18th regiment every officer was killed, several colours were lost, and between 80 and 90 guns. On the Prussian side the general statement gives us 2 generals, 60 officers, and about 1,000 men killed, wounded, and missing.

Immediately after the capture of the redoubts orders were given to the Prussian siege train to hold itself in readiness for an advance to Fredericia. The Allies have stated their intention of occupying the whole of Jutland as a compensation or substantial guarantee for the losses occasioned to German commerce by the Danish fleet. Since the retirement of the Danes into the Isle of Alsen, a number of transports have been seen hovering about its coasts; and it is supposed that the garrison of the island is to be or has been already transferred to Fredericia, the fortress which in 1848 arrested the onward march of the Germans.

The news of the victory was of course received at Berlin amidst the greatest enthusiasm; and gratifying as it must be to the nation in general to find their fighting tools in good order, it must be more especially pleasing to the King, who sees in it a national, a royal, and an individual success. It is a national victory; it is a pledge of the reconciliation of the people and the Crown; and, finally, it is a proof of the King's individual wisdom as shown in his efforts for military improvement in the teeth of the advice of his people. On receipt of the news at Berlin, the crowds flocked around the palace of the King, with tumultuous cheers; so great and universal was the enthusiasm that the King himself for once acknowledged the existence of a people, and, coming out on to the balcony with the Queen, called for and led off three cheers for their valiant army. He has since paid a short visit to Düppel, accompanied by Herren von Bismark and Manteuffel, in the course of which he paid great compliments to the commanders, and distributed some medals in the army. The Emperor of Austria is also expected to honour the conquered provinces with his presence.

The naval affairs on both sides remain very much in the same state as last week. We hear of gallant expeditions made by the Prussian ships out of Stralsund and other ports; but as the gallantry is entirely confined to the action of leaving the port in the teeth of the blockading squadron, and returning to it when 'convenient,' they cannot yet be said to have produced any material effect one way or the other. The Rolf Krake is reported to have been so severely handled on April 18, as to have been towed away by the Skiold for repairs.

The complete success of the Prussian assault on Düppel, the ruinous condition in which the redoubts were found, the weakness of the fire opposed to the Prussian advance, have led all good judges to the conclusion that the lines of Duppel had for some time been untenable, and ought to have been evacuated without a contest. It is answered, on the other part, that the Danish commanders not only had no authority to retire, but had received distinct orders from Bishop Monrad to defend the position to the last. The responsibility for the sacrifice of human lives is thus shifted from the military authorities to the Executive Government. In their behalf it is said that the Danish people, whose anger on the evacuation of the Dannewirke was scarcely propitiated by the sacrifice of General Meza, would have received the report of the unopposed capture of Düppel with an uncontrollable burst of fury: the Government would have been lost, and the monarchy itself would have been in grievous peril.

These are rather the arguments of unscrupulous office-seekers than of true statesmen and patriots, and tally well with the circumstances under which Bishop Monrad formed the present Ministry. It is well known that the retirement of M. Hall from the Premiership was expected to be followed by his immediate recall, as there was no one else capable of forming a Cabinet. When, therefore, Bishop Monrad, a member of M. Hall's Cabinet, undertook the duty of constructing a fresh Government, it was evident that he had betrayed his former chief and repudiated his principles, and was prepared to trust for success to his skill in executing and anticipating the will of the populace. The good fortune of the present Prime Minister of England in the same line may have emboldened him in this course, but none can draw Ulysses' bow but himself; and the history of the siege and capture of Duppel is a fair specimen of the effect of Palmerstonian policy without Palmerstonian skill.

The reception of Garibaldi in England has been generally gratifying to the Italians. Several expressions of thanks have been transmitted from Italian corporations to the English people by telegraph, and the English Consul at Turin has been enthusiastically serenaded. The feeling is, however, not perfectly unanimous. Signor Ferrari, deputy in Parliament, on being requested to preside at a meeting held to embody these sentiments, very candidly informed the deputation that he was so thoroughly French in idea, and so devoted to the principles of 1789, that he could not consent to take the chair for them. The Italia of the 22nd inst. suggests that Garibaldi would be better satisfied with fewer words and more action, with less enthusiasm and more help, with fewer addresses and more rifles. It is generally believed that the 'party of action' are meditating some new attempt, although the scene of it has not transpired. A seizure of arms was made lately by the police at the goods station at Brescia. They were concealed in bales purporting to contain rags for paper, and consigned to a party at Salò on the Lago di Garda. It is remarkable how the tradition of Garibaldi lingers about that lake; it was on its waters that he cruised for three months during the Austrian war, levying contributions and doing as much damage as he could to the Austrians, and, if report speaks truth, not quite scrupulous, when short of provision, whether his hand fell upon German or Italian property.

The Italian cotton factories have imported a good deal of material lately from Persia. A bale was opened lately at the factory of Peregallo coming from that country, and inside it was found the body of a Persian woman in a very good state of preservation. The story hints at a romance, and would certainly make a very good basis for a melodrama; at the same time it reminds us irresistibly of the famous Yankee who killed his adversary, put him in a barrel, and sold him as pickled pork.

Two important elevations to the dignity of Cardinal are about to be made in Rome. The first is Monsignor de Mérode, the present Papal Secretary for War, who is to go out to Mexico as Cardinal-Nuncio; the second is Prince Louis-Lucien Bonaparte, now Chamberlain to the Pope. The first of these appointments will extinguish one of the most unpleasant features of the French occupation of Rome. Monsignor de Mérode's fiery nature is by no means fitted for his present position, which requires the utmost care and tact to avoid collisions between the French and the Papal military authorities. The second is just now very significant; the elevation of a Bonaparte to a position in which he may be candidate for the Papal chair, may possibly lead to an unexpected solution of the whole difficulty.

The annexation of the Ionian Islands to the kingdom of Greece has been completed. A formal address has been presented by the National Assembly of the seven Islands, and answered by King George I. The Chambers have been dissolved, and a new election ordered of double the number of members.

We hear of fresh bloodshed on the eastern shores of the Black Sea; a sharp engagement has taken place between Russians and Circassians, in which the former lost 1,500 and the latter 2,000 men. It is known that the Poles have made an attempt at disturbance in that direction; but the idea was not taken up by the nation generally with much enthusiasm.

The Church of Rome is often great in adversity. Monsignor Felinski, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Warsaw, who has been banished from that city for some time, was to be allowed to return on certain conditions: the only condition which the Archbishop would accept was one involving a general recall from banishment. On this the Imperial Government deprived him of his see, and conferred it upon the Father Rzewuski, at the same time requiring their nominee to order the mourning now used in all Roman Catholic churches of Warsaw to be discontinued. M. Rzewuski, however, true to his country and to his class, has declined the appointment, and has refused to recognise the deprivation of M. Felinski as not emanating from the Pope, or to give orders for the discontinuance of the mourning: at the same time he declines to receive any part of the salary belonging to the Archbishopric.

On April 11, Baron Offenberg, the Russian Consul-General at Bucharest, paid a formal visit to Prince Couza to demand of him the immediate dismissal of the Cogolnitchoanu Ministry on the ground of their complicity in schemes favouring the Polish insurgents. The Prince demanded of the Consul-General whether he had the authority of his Government for making such a request, but refused to inspect the proof of the authority with which Baron Offenberg supplied him, declaring that he would not believe that the Russian Government intended to pass upon him so grievous an insult. The Russian diplomat was of course furious, but after being thus discomfited he had no alternative but to retire from the palace, and ultimately from the country. General Kotzebue, commanding the Russian forces in Bessarabia, has informed the Government of the Principalities that he cannot respect the Moldavian frontier in the pursuit or arrest of the Polish rebels. Prince Couza has despatched messengers to the Princes of Servia and Montenegro to concert measures of defence with them. Another complication has been added to the whole affair by the protest of Turkey as Suzerain of the Principalities against the raising of any loan in those countries without her express permission. In consequence of this protest the English capitalists have retired from the affair. The French still continue to believe in the ultimate success of Prince Couza. A conference is to meet shortly at Constantinople for the consideration of all difficulties connected with the Principalities.

On the 7th of Prairial, Year VII. of the French Republic, a date more generally known as May 25, 1799, an additional tax of 10 centimes was imposed upon all stamps used in business. The tax, levied originally under the pressure of war, and continued into the years of peace, returned to its proper element in the Crimean and Italian wars: it has now again become an anomaly, through the pacific conduct and intentions of the ruler of France. Under these circumstances the French Government, acting under Imperial guidance, have taken a most wise and logical step in proposing its abolition. The amount of revenue sacrificed is not less than 26,000,000 francs, or upwards of 1,000,000*l.* sterling, a loss which, in the present state of French finances, is of a most serious character. But it is highly important, and more especially so in despotic governments, that the distinct object of a tax, where such exists, should not be lost sight of: while the power given to each citizen of measuring the pressure exerted by war upon himself individually by the presence or absence of an additional charge such as this is invaluable.

The Parisian world of fashion had every opportunity afforded to them of enjoyment at the Paris races of April 17. Longchamp put on its gay appearance, and to the visitor's eye maintained its character as one of the most pleasant of race-courses. Indeed, what more can mortals desire than the charming drive through the Bois de Boulogne, the view of the circular course with its handsome stand, its crowd of equipages and spectators, the Seine encompassing the western side of the plain, and beyond the river the beautiful palace of St. Cloud? Thanks, moreover, to the Emperor, racing in France has become not merely a pastime for the creatures of pleasure, but a matter of earnest business for the sporting community. On the day in question five prizes were set for competition, and one of these at least offered no mean reward to the fortunate winner. The Prix de Longchamp, a produce stake of 3,000 francs, with an entry of 300 francs, deserves a passing notice, as it brought out Nepto, a colt of some reputation from a previous passage of arms with Sonchamp. However, in spite of the public's earnest support, Nepto was compelled to succumb to Gédéon, a son of Monarque, the property of the Duc de Morny. In the following race, the Prix de la Seine of 8,000 francs, the Duc de Morny was again successful. Partisan, now five years old, by Launcelot out of Partlet, promised great deeds of fame in his younger days; and when at the age of three years he took his gallops at Newmarket, and drew the French Minister from Paris to the capital of the racing world to be the eyewitness of his progress, he seemed to hold within his grasp the best rewards of the English turf. However, neither joints nor sinews of iron can be dispensed with in these days of early and hard-fought battles, and Partisan was incapacitated from even an effort. His trainer was not to be discouraged, and adopted the sensible plan of converting him into a hunter for a winter season to the great improvement of his limbs and of his energy. Therefore he was able once more to appear, and to defeat in grand style Flibustier and Guillaume le Taciturne. The race of the day was the Grand Prix de l'Impératrice of 15,000 francs, which the excellent Dollar, the son of the Flying Dutchman and Payment, won by a head after a terrific race with Stradella. The latter mare, the property of Count de Lagrange, in 1863 overthrew at Newmarket the English horse The Marquis, the winner of the Two Thousand Guineas Stakes and of the Doncaster St. Leger; but, in spite of that victory, the French public bravely supported Dollar at the small odds of 7 to 4. The sport terminated with the Prix des Acacias, for which nine horses came to the post, and which was won by Eva, the daughter of Allez-y-gaiment and of Junction, of whose success not a speculator had dreamed. Senorita, by the Flying Dutchman out of Lola Montes, was second, and the Duc de Morny's Gédéon third.

Another Japanese embassy, consisting of three plenipotentiaries and their suite, has arrived in Europe: they have, for the present, taken up their quarters in Paris at the Grand Hôtel de la Paix. For a nation which three years ago was the pattern of exclusiveness, two embassies in the course of two years sent to the very extreme of the earth is not a bad beginning.

The admirers of Rabelais will be pleased to hear that Panurge still exists in Paris, and apparently in high feather; he is now called Gremier, but is otherwise unmistakable. We subjoin a conversation between that worthy and a police magistrate which took place during the past week:—Magistrate: 'What is your profession?' Gremier: 'A dealer in fire.'—'And what may that be?' 'Why, lucifers; I light them, and offer them to gentlemen as they leave the theatre for their cigars.'—'That is not a serious trade; it is the occupation of a vagabond.' 'Well, it's not a bad position; I get sometimes thirty sous at one theatre door.'—'The police watched you for a whole evening; you were offering to hold horses and opening carriage doors.' 'Yes, all that sort of thing, and lucifers; it's the same business.' The magistrate went on to ask him whether he had not been convicted as an incorrigible beggar. The prisoner rejoined that the only reason for the conviction was that his trousers were torn; and said, 'It is certain I should not have been arrested had I worn a black coat, patent leather boots, and gloves.' —'You appear to have a very decided opinion on that subject; you were wearing a pair of straw-coloured kid gloves, with your blouse and cap, when you were arrested.' 'Certainly, I wore gloves that I might not be mistaken for a barefooted rascal; but I was arrested all the same. I don't know what course to take now.'—'Why not work at your trade? You are a scullion.' 'I could get no work because I was too badly dressed, and yet I presented myself with my gloves on.'—'Where did you get these gloves?' 'A gentleman threw them away after the theatre; then, of course, I picked them up.'—'The police took you to your landlord, who refused to receive you.' 'That was a dirty trick of his (C'est une saleté qu'il m'a faite). I don't owe him anything; wait till some one asks me to recommend furnished apartments, he'll see if I will send him customers.' Alas for poor Panurge! he was condemned to one month's imprisonment, to the relief, doubtless, of the landlord whose prosperity was thus threatened.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THE LAW OF PRIZES—CASE OF THE TUSCALOOSA.

On Tuesday, in the House of Lords, this subject was brought forward by Lord Chelmsford in a very able and exhaustive speech. After a few prefatory remarks, His Lordship recited the history of the case. The Tuscaloosa was originally a Federal vessel named the Conrad, and on the 21st of June last she was off the coast of Brazil with a cargo of wool, and was there captured by the Alabama. The captors put some guns on board, a lieutenant of the Confederate navy, and ten men, and changed her name to the Tuscaloosa, and employed her as a tender of the Alabama. The two vessels were in company at the Cape of Good Hope in the beginning of August, and Captain Semmes ordered the Tuscaloosa to Simon's Bay for the purpose of obtaining provisions and undergoing some slight repairs. She arrived off Simon's Bay on the 7th of August. The Admiral upon the station, Sir Baldwin Walker, doubted whether she could properly be considered as the tender of the Alabama, whether she did not retain her previous character of an uncondemned prize, and therefore whether she could be admitted under the terms of Her Majesty's proclamation forbidding the armed ships of both belligerents from coming into British ports with their prizes. He wrote to Governor Wodehouse, who consulted the Attorney-General at the Cape. The Attorney-General gave it as his opinion that, by reason of the vessel having been armed by the captors, and having had a lieutenant and crew put on board, the Tuscaloosa was a vessel of war, and might enter the bay; and accordingly the Tuscaloosa anchored in Simon's Bay on the 8th of August, and remained there till the 15th. While she was lying at anchor there, the United States Consul claimed that she should be retained on behalf of the original owners. Having mentioned that the Tuscaloosa's true name was the Conrad, and that she had never been condemned as prize by any lawfully constituted Admiralty Court, he proceeded to say:—

I am well aware that your Government has conceded to the so-called Confederate States the rights of belligerents, and is thereby bound to respect Captain Semmes' commission; but having refused to recognise the 'Confederacy' as a nation, and having excluded his captures from all the ports of the British Empire, the captures necessarily revert to their real owners, and are forfeited by Captain Semmes as soon as they enter a British port.

In reply, the Governor wrote to the United States Consul:—

The Governor is not aware, nor do you refer him to the provisions of international law by which captured vessels, as soon as they enter our neutral ports, revert to their real owners, and are forfeited by their captors. But His Excellency believes that the claims of contending parties to vessels captured can only be determined in the first instance by the courts of the captor's country.

The United States Consul rejoined that by the terms of the Queen's proclamation the Tuscaloosa was forbidden to enter Simon's Bay, that she was there as a prize, having on board her original cargo of skins and wool, and as Captain Semmes could not hold prizes in Simon's Bay, 'who else could hold them except those whose right to hold them was antecedent to his—that is, the owners? That claim was extravagant and illogical, but it has been sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government. In reply to a despatch from Governor Wodehouse, an answer was sent by Her Majesty's Government, and he (Lord Chelmsford) 'could not help thinking that the instructions conveyed in it were the result of Federal pressure.' After 'rather a menacing correspondence on the part of the United States Minister,' the following instructions were sent to Governor Wodehouse on the 4th November from the Colonial Office:—

With regard to the vessel called the Tuscaloosa, I am advised that this vessel did not lose the character of a prize captured by the Alabama merely because she was, at the time of her being brought within British waters, armed with two small rifled guns, in charge of an officer, and manned with a crew of ten men from the Alabama, and used as a tender to that vessel under the authority of Captain Semmes. It would appear that the Tuscaloosa is a bark of 500 tons, captured by the Alabama off the coast of Brazil on the 21st June last, and brought into Simon's Bay on or before the 7th of August, with her original cargo of wool (itself, as well as the vessel, prize) still on board, and with nothing to give her a warlike character (so far as is stated in the papers before me) except the circumstances already noticed. Whether, in the case of a vessel duly commissioned as a ship of war after being made prize by a belligerent Government, without being first brought infra præsidia or condemned by a Court of Prize, the character of prize, within the meaning of Her Majesty's orders, would or would not be merged in that of a national ship of war, I am not called upon to explain. It is enough to say that the citation from Mr. Wheaton's book by your Attorney-General does not appear to me to have any direct bearing upon the question.

And then the Duke of Newcastle concluded as follows:—

The question remains what course ought to have been taken by the authorities of the Cape,—1st, in order to ascertain whether this vessel was, as alleged by the United States Consul, an uncondemned prize brought within British waters in violation of Her Majesty's neutrality; and 2nd, what ought to have been done if such had appeared to be really the fact. I think that the allegations of the United States Consul ought to have been brought to the knowledge of Captain Semmes while the Tuscaloosa was still within British waters, and that he should have been requested to state whether he did or did not admit the facts to be as alleged. He should also have been called upon (unless the facts were admitted) to produce the Tuscaloosa's papers. If the result of these enquiries had been to prove that the vessel was really an uncondemned prize, brought into British waters in violation of Her Majesty's orders, made for the purpose of maintaining her neutrality, I consider that the mode of proceeding in such circumstances most consistent with Her Majesty's dignity, and most proper for the vindication of her territorial rights, would have been to prohibit the exercise of any further control over the Tuscaloosa by her captors, and to retain that vessel under Her Majesty's control and jurisdiction until properly reclaimed by her original owners.

The Governor replied that he was in a state of uncertainty, but he was relieved of responsibility by an extraordinary departure from the ordinary course of procedure. On December 26, after an absence of four months, the Tuscaloosa returned to Simon's Bay, and Admiral Sir B. Walker wrote to the Governor:—

As it appears that this vessel, the Tuscaloosa, late Federal ship Conrad, is an uncondemned prize, brought into British waters in violation of Her Majesty's orders, made for the purpose of maintaining her neutrality, I therefore consider that she ought to be detained with the view of her being reclaimed by her original owners, in accordance with the opinion of the law officers of the Crown forwarded for my guidance, the copy of which I have already transmitted to you.

The Tuscaloosa was seized, and the Government offered to give her up to the United States Consul, but, fortunately for this country, that official had some scruples about receiving her. Lieutenant Lowe, in command of the Tuscaloosa, put in a protest against the seizure. [We published this protest on February 25.]

On March 4 the Duke of Newcastle wrote to the Governor to deliver the Tuscaloosa back to the Confederate officers. Her Majesty's Government could not assert they were right, and did not like to admit they were wrong, and therefore, 'in the despatch communicating the reasons why the Tuscaloosa was to be restored, they took a course which was always an indication of weakness—they made the Tuscaloosa a special case.'

Lord Chelmsford then pointed out the error and illegality of the instructions sent out by Her Majesty's Government. He challenged his noble and learned friends to point out in any writer on international law a passage declaring that where a neutral had prohibited belligerents from bringing prizes into its waters, that neutral, on the prohibition being disregarded, had any right whatever to seize the prize and to restore it to the original owners. The power of the neutral was confined to ordering the vessel away, and if she refused to go force might be used to expedite her departure. By the rules of international law the moment a capture took place the property, as between belligerents, was vested in the captors, and therefore a neutral dealing with the property in the way attempted by Her Majesty's Government was in effect to take it from one of the belligerents and to give it to the other. Further, the neutral had no right whatever to enter upon the consideration of the validity of prizes brought into its waters. The capture might have been invalid and illegal, but the neutral had no power to inquire. There were only certain cases in which the neutral might and ought to inquire, and those were exceptions very strongly establishing the rule. Where a vessel was seized by a belligerent within neutral waters, a violation of neutrality took place, and it was not only the right, but the duty, of the neutral to restore the vessel to its original owners, because there never was a moment at which the vessel was legally a prize. But that rule certainly could not be made to apply to the case of the Tuscaloosa, which after a lapse of six months from the time of her capture came into neutral waters and was seized for the purpose of being delivered back. It was also said that a neutral might exercise the authority of seizing prizes brought into its waters, and of returning them where the property of its subjects had been illegally captured and was afterwards brought into its ports; the very extraordinary reason given being that this was intended as a compensation for the asylum afforded. But that no authority was to be found for the proposition that neutrals were entitled to deal with prizes brought into their waters in the manner in which Her Majesty's Government had sought to deal with the Tuscaloosa. It would, no doubt, be urged by the Government that the bringing of a prize into neutral waters, contrary to the prohibition contained in the proclamation, was a violation of neutrality. But with this view, taking the plain meaning of the words 'violation of neutrality,' he could not agree. He contended that the instructions issued by Her Majesty's Government were wholly illegal, void, and improper; and there was this further disadvantage, that, he presumed, they had not been confined to the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, but had been sent round to all our colonial possessions. At that very moment it might be that prizes had been seized in some of those quarters and delivered up by the different local Governors either to the Confederates or the Federals. If the prize improperly seized under the instructions of the Government belonged to the Federals, he could anticipate fully well what would happen: strong remonstrances and high-toned menaces on one side, submission, apology, restoration, and, perhaps, compensation on the other. Should the prize taken be from the Confederates, the remonstrances might be equally loud, but they would not be so much regarded. Restoration, as shown by the present case, might be necessary, but it would be restoration unaccompanied by any apology; it would be mere restoration, and nothing more. Whichever alternative happened, the position of the British nation would not be very dignified.

Earl Russell (who was evidently very angry) said: 'It must be recollected that all these applications of international law to the contest between the Federals and so-called Confederate States have to be made under very exceptional circumstances. It has been usual for a Power carrying on war upon the seas to possess ports of its own in which vessels are built, equipped, and fitted, and from which they issue, to which they bring their prizes, and in which those prizes, when brought before a court, are either condemned or acquitted. But it so happens that in this conflict the Confederates have no ports except those of the Mersey and the Clyde, from which they send out ships to cruise against the Federals; and having no ports to which to bring their prizes, they are obliged to burn them upon the high seas. It is natural, under these circumstances, that the Confederate officers and Confederate authorities should somewhat resent the orders of Her Majesty, of which the noble and learned Lord was pleased to approve, and should endeavour to evade their operation. These orders, as your Lordships are aware, were not to bring prizes made by either belligerent into the ports of the United Kingdom or of Her Majesty's possessions abroad. [It is untrue that 'the Confederate officers and the Confederate authorities' have resented the orders of Her Majesty or have endeavoured to evade their operation.] His Lordship contended that Sir B. Walker had a reasonable ground for the seizure of the Tuscaloosa, because if the Confederates were allowed to send in all their prizes or cruisers they might set at defiance the Queen's proclamation. It was, however, he admitted, difficult to decide whether the Tuscaloosa ought to have been moved off, or whether she should be seized, and taken possession of, and restored to her owners. The Duke of Newcastle had gone a little beyond the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, and he (Earl Russell) should have done the same. The point was still open to consideration whether the proper treatment of such vessels as the Tuscaloosa would not be to move them off. He thought that 'to say that the question can be decided in the courts of the captors is altogether an error.' He denied that there had been any truckling to the United States, and, in proof of his assertion, cited the cases of the Trent, the Saxon, and the Chesapeake, in all of which the Federal Government had granted satisfaction and justice.

Lord Kingsdown said that the question involved in the present discussion was one of the most important that had arisen out of the application of the principles of international law. Sir B. Walker had rested his case upon the supposition that a prize remained the property of the original owner until it had been condemned by a court of legal adjudication. That also was the principle on which, so far as he understood, the Government and the Duke of Newcastle in his despatch acted, but he confessed it was a great relief to him to find that in writing that despatch the noble Duke had gone beyond the opinions of the law officers of the Crown, on whose judgment and learning the utmost reliance was to be placed. The question of capture as between belligerents was conclusive when the capture was made. It required no adjudication. The moment one belligerent obtained possession of the goods of another, they were as much his property as if they had been condemned by all the prize courts in Europe. In that view of the subject he was supported by Wheaton, who said: 'The obligation of a captor to bring his captures into port for enquiry and adjudication depends on the instructions which he has received from his own Government. But this obligation under the law of nations exists only with respect to vessels navigated under the neutral flag, the object being to ascertain whether the property belongs to a neutral or an enemy. Enemies cannot claim a right that their property, upon capture by a belligerent cruiser, should be taken into the port of the belligerent, or his ally, for inquiry and adjudication. Capture alone divests an enemy of his property. Upon the surrender of a vessel under an enemy's flag on the high seas a belligerent may destroy her under the general law of nations, and if the captor is unable to bring her into port, he will be justified towards his own Government in destroying her. In the present case Her Majesty had forbidden armed vessels, with their prizes, to come into her ports. According to law, if a ship of war with her prize entered a British port, she could be ordered away, but he was at a loss to understand how our Government obtained a right to take possession of the Tuscaloosa. That vessel had violated the Proclamation of Her Majesty, and might have been sent away, but how could she become confiscated and liable to seizure by our Government? Even supposing it could be said that the violation of the laws of neutrality of which she had been guilty entitled the British Government to seize her and confiscate her to the Crown, their lordships would observe that the conduct pursued by our authorities was based upon entirely different grounds. Their argument was that, the Tuscaloosa having come under their control, they were entitled to seize her and restore her to the original owner, forgetting that the original owner was Captain Semmes, she never having been recaptured. It was highly important that there should be no mistake on this point, because the Confederate States could not obtain adjudication in their own ports, to which access was barred by a blockade recognised by Europe, and under any circumstances the enforcement of the laws of neutrality must operate with very different force upon one belligerent and upon the other. What, then, was the opinion of Lord Stowell upon the want of adjudication? Lord Stowell was reported to have held, when a captor could not bring in his prize, that Nothing is left to the belligerent vessel but to destroy the vessel which she has taken, for she cannot consistently with her general duty to her own country, or, indeed, under its express injunctions, permit enemy's property to sail away unmolested. If it should be impossible to bring her in, her next duty is to destroy enemy's property.

It was laid down everywhere in the same way that adjudication had nothing to do with the matter except as between neutrals, and that the moment an enemy's ship had struck her flag and was taken possession of by an officer of the other belligerent she became the property of her captor, and remained so until she was recaptured. There was no ground for saying, as had been said in the present case, that, the Tuscaloosa having innocently come into the power of our Government, she was liable to seizure, and that the effect was to revest the property in the original owner, because there had been no adjudication. The law was so clear that it could not be misunderstood.

The Lord Chancellor denied that it was an indisputable law that the property in a prize was transferred by mere capture. That was as between belligerents. He wished to show that this matter was one which, in the language of the law officers of the Crown, deserved 'very serious consideration.' That serious consideration it had received; and the result would be embodied in clear and definite instructions, which would be generally circulated throughout our colonial harbours.

Lord Chelmsford said, as they were now told there was to be a modification of the instructions, he thought their Lordships were entitled to know what that modification was.

The Lord Chancellor said, what he stated was that new and definite instructions were under consideration.

A FEDERAL OUTRAGE ON A BRITISH SUBJECT.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Lord R. Cecil called attention to the outrage committed on a British subject, of which a report had recently appeared in the public papers.

Mr. Layard said they had received information on the subject which agreed very much with the statement that appeared in the newspapers. A correspondence had been going on for some time with the American Government in relation to it, and Her Majesty's Government had made a demand for redress.

[We give elsewhere a full and detailed account of the outrage from the New York correspondence of the Times of Thursday last.]

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Lindsay moved, 'That, in the opinion of this House, Her Majesty's Government should now adopt measures for the construction of harbours of refuge on the coasts of Great Britain and Ireland, recommended by a committee of this House in 1858, by a royal commission in 1859, and by a resolution of this House in 1860.'

Sir Stafford Northcote moved the addition of the following words:—'And to make provision for wholly or in part defraying the expense of such harbours as it may be thought right to construct by means of tolls upon shipping, as recommended by the committee of this House.'

Mr. Milner Gibson opposed both the original motion and the addition, contending that the House would not be justified in passing a resolution which would pledge it to an indefinite and enormous expenditure without indicating the means by which that expenditure was to be met.

Both the original motion and the addition were negatived by large majorities.

THE LAND TRANSFER ACT.

On Thursday, in the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor, in reply to Lord Chelmsford, denied that the Act of 1862 had been a failure. In sixteen months, despite great opposition on the part of the solicitors, nearly two millions' worth of property had been brought into the Transfer Office. The difficulty to be overcome is the manner in which solicitors are remunerated. They are paid according to the length of the work. As the law now stands, they are rewarded for prolixity and fined for brevity. The Land Transfer Act so simplifies the titles to property that, in one case within his (the Lord Chancellor's) knowledge, a title of which the abstract required 150 sheets, was now contained on one side of a piece of parchment, on which, in accordance with the provisions of the new law, are a map of the estate, an accurate abstract of the title, and a copy of the entry of the register. If the owner wants to sell, he has only to carry this document to the auctioneer, or if he wants an advance he can deposit it with his bankers. A title under the new law of registration is cheap and convenient. His Lordship anticipates that the regulation will become general as soon as the solicitors are disposed of, and that the titles to real estate will become clear and certain, precisely in the same manner as the title to stock in the funds, to railway, or any other analogous form of property.

PARTNERSHIP LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

This Bill is of great importance to the commercial community, as it will enable a private capitalist to invest money in business without risking all his fortune.

Mr. Scholefield, in moving the second reading on Monday, said in his opinion this was emphatically a creditors' measure, for at present a loan to a partnership was a secret transaction. This Bill did not in the slightest interfere with the present law of partnership qua those who were held out to the public as being partners. The only persons who would be limited to the amount which they had put down were those who had no contract with the creditors, and whom the creditors did not know, excepting as far as they appeared on the registry for the amount for which they were liable.

Mr. Hubbard opposed the second reading, but his amendment was negatived without a division.

REDUCTION OF THE DUTY ON FIRE INSURANCE.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Sheridan moved that, in place of the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reduce the duty on insurances on stock in trade, there should be a uniform reduction to 1*s.* per cent. on all descriptions of property liable to the duty. This was rejected by a majority of 53, and Mr. Gladstone's resolution was carried.

DEPARTURE OF GARIBALDI.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Gladstone, in answer to a question put by Mr. Kinnaird, said he went to Stafford House at the request of the Duke of Sutherland to consult about the desirability of advising Garibaldi to contract his provincial tour. He was requested to tell Garibaldi his opinion, and he did so. He represented to the General that he could not go through such labour without great injury to his health, and he also added, 'that there was some risk lest the magnificent national reception which had been given to him in the great metropolis of this country, and which really formed an historical event, should not gain, but even lose, some of its real dignity from being frequently repeated elsewhere.' The reports about his having used any official influence, and of his being instigated by political motives in the advice he offered Garibaldi, were entirely without foundation.

THE GARIBALDI MEETING.

On Monday, in answer to a question put by Mr. H. Lewis, Sir George Grey stated that, owing to the scenes which some short time since had taken place through meetings held in the parks, a notice was issued forbidding all assemblages of persons in the parks for the purpose of delivering speeches or discussing exciting topics leading to disorder, such meetings being wholly inconsistent with the object for which the parks were thrown open to the public. The inspector of police, though acting under no special instructions, might naturally think that he was acting in the spirit of that notice when he stated that the meeting ought not to be held there. But he had acted on his own discretion alone, and had no express authority to prevent the meeting being held.

RAILWAYS AND THE WORKING CLASSES.

On Friday, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Derby brought forward a subject which very nearly concerns the happiness and well-being of the working classes. The dwellings of the poor in towns, and above all other towns in London, are, as a rule, overcrowded hovels that disgrace our civilisation, and induce physical and moral degeneracy. The evil was conspicuous twenty-five years ago, and has been growing worse from year to year. As population and wealth have increased, the value of land and the demand for houses have increased, so that the dwellings of the poor have been pulled down to make space for houses of a better class. With the middle classes the growth of the population has been met by the development of the suburbs, and by the facilities afforded by railroads for men of business residing a few miles from the city. With the working classes it has been altogether different. The increase in numbers has been simultaneous with a decrease in accommodation, and the evil is getting unbearable. The Earl of Derby therefore proposes that the railways which are such a boon to other classes, and which by their coming into London take not a little from the house accommodation of the working classes, shall be compelled to run trains night and morning, at convenient hours, and at cheap fixed rates—say at 1*s.* per week, or 1*d.* per journey—so that working men will be able to keep their families in a pure atmosphere and in decent dwellings. A resolution embodying this recommendation was proposed. Seldom has it fallen to the lot of a statesman to propose a more beneficent act of legislation. As usual, all kinds of objections are stated; but we are confident that the scheme is as practicable as it is desirable.

CHINA.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Liddell moved, 'That, in the opinion of this House, further interference on the part of this country in the civil war in China is impolitic and unnecessary.' The hon. member said that Mr. Lay, the Inspector-General of Customs, had sought to obtain a supremacy over the Imperial Government by means of the Anglo-Chinese fleet, under Captain Sherard Osborn, which had been fitted out under his direction, and which was to be at his disposal. Prince Kung had properly refused to consent to a compact which would have established a British protectorate—a protectorate that would have offended all the other Powers. Our policy in China ought to be merely a commercial policy. We ought not to aid the rebels or the Government, which was a foreign and hated despotism. [The Tartar dynasty has ruled for 200 years, and yet the country is prosperous. The fact is that the Chinese Empire is in practice a federation, and the federal chief (the Emperor) has very little real authority, except in the immediate neighbourhood of the seat of the Imperial Government.]

Mr. Layard replied to Mr. Liddell's long and able speech. He denied that any attempt had been made to establish a British protectorate in China, and said that our policy had been eminently successful, and in proof of this cited some statistics of trade showing that the exports and imports at Chinese ports amounted to 60,000,000*l.* Our policy had also been approved by Mr. Burlingame, the United States Minister at Pekin, and other persons capable of forming an opinion.

After a few remarks from Mr. Forster, Mr. Ferrand rose to address the House, and was almost immediately interrupted by the House being counted out at a quarter past eight o'clock, there being only 35 members present.

On Monday Mr. Baxter gave notice that, in consequence of the abrupt termination of the debate, he should, at an early date, call attention to the state of affairs in China.

THE BUDGET OF BLOOD.

We find the following statement in the Philadelphia North American, the organ of the Administration in that city. The awful list is made up to September, 1863, including the battle of Chickamauga. We cannot vouch for the figures, and we are at a loss to understand with what object so damaging a statement is made on undoubted 'loyal' authority by the war party:

CONFEDERATES.

	Killed.	Wounded.	Prisoners.	Total.
1861 .	1,270	3,955	2,772	7,987
1862 .	14,556	47,204	15,876	77,646
1863 .	12,321	48,300	71,211	131,832
Total .	28,147	99,459	89,859	217,465

Confederates died of disease and sickness from commencement of war to present time 130,000.

FEDERALS.

In Doctor Kirkbride's last report of the Insane Asylum, he notes an enormous increase of female patients, whose insanity is caused by the loss of relatives—literally 'Rachel mourning for her children and will not be comforted, because they are not.'

Speech of Mr. Long, of Ohio,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 7, 1864.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union in consideration of the President's Message, Mr. Long said:

Mr. Chairman—I speak to-day for the preservation of the Government, and, although for the first time within these walls, I propose to indulge in that freedom of speech and latitude of debate so freely exercised by other gentlemen for the past four months, and which is admissible under the rules in the present condition of the House; but for what I may say and the position I shall occupy upon this floor and before the country, I alone will be responsible, and in the independence of a Representative of the people, I intend to proclaim the deliberate convictions of my judgment in this fearful hour of the country's peril. And now, Mr. Chairman, as we are in Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, let us inquire, how stands the Union to-day?

A little over three years ago, the present occupant of the Presidential mansion, at the other end of the avenue, came into this city under cover of night, disguised in plaid cloak and Scotch cap, lest, as was feared by his friends, he might have received a warmer greeting than would have been agreeable on his way through Baltimore at the hands of the constituents of the honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Davis). On the 4th of March he was inaugurated, and in his address deprecated civil war, using that ever to be memorable language, 'Suppose you go to war, you cannot fight always, and when, after much loss on both sides, and no gain on either, you cease fighting, the identical old questions as to terms of intercourse are again upon you.' Seven States had up to that time seceded from the Union. All believed that war would be averted. At the conclusion of the address the lamented Douglas, who had closely watched every word as it escaped from the lips of the President, turned to a friend, and, with tears in his eyes, 'thanked God that after all the election of Abraham Lincoln would not involve the nation in war.' A secret meeting of the Governors of a number of States was soon after held in this city. A scheme was devised and a vessel sent out under pretence of furnishing provisions to the troops with Major Anderson in Fort Sumter. On arriving in Charleston Harbor the people of that city fired upon the Fort. The telegraph bore the news to this city, and on its first mention to the President, he exclaimed, 'I knew they would do it,' which to my mind is conclusive that it was intended expressly for that purpose. Seventy-five thousand men were immediately called for, war was inaugurated, twenty days were given the insurgents to lay down their arms; an additional five hundred thousand men were soon called for, hostilities commenced. The rebellion was to be crushed inside of sixty days, more troops were called for, the Union was to be restored with all the rights, equality and dignity of the States unimpaired. No man was permitted to question for a moment the right of the Government to coerce the States back into the Union. To doubt the right or question the speedy suppression of the rebellion and restoration of the Union, was to be denounced as a traitor to the Government and a sympathiser with the South. Thus, Sir, was the war inaugurated. The first year passed away; the second came and passed in like manner, so of the third; and now, Sir, let me again inquire how stands the Union to-day? The brief period of three short years has produced a fearful change in this free, happy, and prosperous Government; so free in its restraints upon personal liberty, and so gentle in its demands upon the resources of the people, that the celebrated Humboldt, after travelling through the country on his return to Europe, said, 'The American people have a Government which you can neither see nor feel.' So different is it now, and so great is the change, that the inquiry might well be made to-day are we not in Constantinople, in St. Petersburg, in Vienna, in Rome, or in Paris? Military Governors and their Provost Marshals override the laws, and the echo of the armed heel rings forth as clearly now in America as in France or in Austria, and the President sits to-day guarded by armed soldiery, stationed at every approach leading to the Executive mansion. So far from crushing the rebellion in sixty days, three years have already passed away, and from the day on which the conflict began up to the present hour, the Confederate army have not been forced beyond the sound of their guns from the dome of the capitol in which we are assembled. The City of Washington is to-day, as it has been for three years, guarded by Federal troops in all the forts and fortifications with which it is surrounded to prevent an attack from the enemy, and as an evidence of the despondency of the Administration, and the unsuccessful opening of the Spring campaign of the fourth year in the progress of the war, the Morning Chronicle of this city, the President's organ, in an editorial a few mornings since, said: 'Charleston has not been taken; Lee maintains a bold front on the Rapidan; the Florida expedition was a failure; the Sherman expedition has not been a success, and the rebels have everywhere shown more vigour than they were supposed to possess.' Although the same paper, and others in support of the Administration, have told the country from time to time during the past winter, that the rebellion was crushed and slavery was dead; that the Confederates were deserting in whole regiments at a time, coming within our lines, taking the oath, and describing the most horrible suffering and demoralisation from want of food, clothing, and ill-treatment, yet at the very time the people have been so deceived and misled from day to day the President calls for 500,000 more troops, and in a few weeks follows it with an additional call for 200,000 more, making 700,000 since the first of January, and over 2,500,000 since the commencement of the war out of the 3,500,000 who voted in the so-called loyal States at the last Presidential election, when 75,000 militia were to end it in twenty, or at most sixty days.

Mr. Chairman, I have thus made a very brief statement of facts as to the condition of the Union to-day, and for doing which I have no doubt the usual charge of 'encouragement for the rebels,' 'the prolongation of the war,' 'the rebels are aided by their friends on this floor,' and the like charges, will be repeated again by gentlemen on the opposite side of the House: and, as I have heard such charges so repeatedly during the past four months, I say now and here that the real friends of the Confederates—those who give them aid and encouragement, and enable them to carry on the war—are on the opposition side of the House and in the control of the Government. Your confiscation resolution, voted for and passed by the friends of the Administration, by which you propose to thrust your hands into the coffin of the deceased father, and take all he may have left at his death to his widow, and innocent and unoffending children, is worth more than fifty thousand men to the Confederate army. The order issued by the President to General Saxton, dividing up and parcelling out the State of South Carolina among the negroes and enterprising Yankees of Massachusetts, gives courage, energy, and enthusiasm to the men now in arms in the Confederate States. The order of the President to his military commanders in Louisiana and Arkansas, and the order issued in pursuance thereof by General Banks to the people of Louisiana—in which, by a single dash of his pen, he strikes out of existence the Constitution and organic law of the State, and by virtue of the power vested in him as a major-general proceeds to call and hold an election, and inaugurate State officers, and set up a State Government—and the legislation consummated and proposed by Congress, and speeches made upon this floor in support of Radicalism, is strengthening the Confederacy and prolonging the war. Herein, Sir, is where they find strength; the true friends of the Confederacy in the North are the Radical Abolitionists, and the Radical press goading on the President to issue proclamations and military orders which provide food, raiment, strength, and support for the Confederacy.

If Mr. Lincoln had made a gift of millions of greenbacks to Jefferson Davis to be used as bounty money in recruiting the Confederate army, he could not have done better service to the cause of the South than he has done by his silly, absurd, and insulting Amnesty Proclamation, and his equally absurd attempt to create State Governments by dictatorial power. He has in effect said to the Southern people: 'You shall not return to the Union except under such local Governments as I and my military officers dictate,' and with the aid of his friends in Congress he is enabled to add: 'in the event of your submission and return your estates shall be confiscated; your property, personal and real, shall be taken from you; your children shall be disinherited and left homeless and penniless to starve under the scorn and hatred of Northern fanatics; your lands and manor houses shall be parcelled out among our retainers; the negro (Freedmen) and the adventurer shall sit and rule at your hearthstones, and you—beggars and outcasts—shall be forbidden representation in our national councils, and be shut out for ever from offices of trust and honor.' Such is the language in which Lincoln and this Congress and the preceding Congress have spoken and are speaking to the people of the South—and now, Sir, with such a prospect before them as the sequel of submission, outlawry, disfranchisement, social, moral, and political degradation, penury for themselves and their children, decreed as their portion, will they throw down their arms and submit to the terms? Who shall believe that the free, proud American blood, which courses with as quick pulsation through their veins as our own, will not be spilled to the last drop in resistance? This is the source, Sir, from whence comes encouragement, strength, support, and sustenance for the Confederates; herein lies the secret of the unity of their action, the prolongation of the contest, and the desperation of the conflict produced, not by anything said, or measures proposed by gentlemen upon this side of the House, or by any measures proposed or policy advocated by the Democratic party, but by the acts of the gentlemen who make the charges, and the President and his military commanders who issue the proclamation and the military orders.

Mr. Chairman, I have deemed it proper thus to advert to the charges of encouragement to the Confederates so repeatedly made upon this floor, and I again recur to the consideration of the Union. Can the Union be restored by war? I answer most unhesitatingly and deliberately no, never; 'war is final, eternal separation.' My first and highest ground of opposition to its further prosecution is that it is wrong: it is in violation of the Constitution and of the fundamental principles on which the Federal Union was founded. My second objection is, that as a policy it is not reconstructive but destructive, and will, if continued, result speedily in the destruction of the Government and the loss of civil liberty to both North and South, and it ought therefore immediately to cease.

In order, Mr. Chairman, that we may know what views were entertained upon the right as well as the expediency of coercing States into submission by some of the departed as well as living statesmen of the country, previous to the commencement of the present war, I propose to call the attention of the House and the country to a few extracts, which to my mind are worthy of consideration at this time.

In 1827, during the administration of John Quincy Adams, when the Legislature of Georgia had passed an act setting aside the laws of Congress regulating intercourse with the Indian tribes within her limits, the messages of the President on the 5th and 8th of February, 1827, in relation thereto, were referred to a select committee of the Senate, of which Colonel Benton was Chairman, and of which Martin Van Buren and General William H. Harrison, each afterwards President of the United States, were members. The committee, in their report, Senate documents, Second Session, Nineteenth Congress, Document No. 69, say:

'It is believed to be among those axioms, which in a government like ours no man may be permitted to dispute, that the only security for the permanent union of these States, is to be found in the principle of common affection, resting on the basis of common interest. The sanctions of the Constitution would be impotent to retain, in concerted and harmonious action, twenty-four sovereignties, hostile in their feelings toward each other, and acting under the impulse of a real or imagined diversity of interest. The resort to force would be alike vain and nugatory. Its frequent use would subject it, with demonstrative certainty, to ultimate failure, while its temporary success would be valueless for all purposes of social happiness. In such contests, however unequal, and however transient, the seeds of disunion would be thickly sown, and those who may be destined to witness them will speedily thereafter be called to lament the destruction of the fairest prospect of civil liberty which Heaven in its mercy has vouchsafed to man.' 'The committee will not enlarge upon the frightful consequences of civil wars. They are known to be calamitous to single governments, and fatal to confederacies.'

The prediction of the committee of the destruction of the fairest prospect of civil liberty which Heaven in its mercy has vouchsafed to man, is already in great danger of being realised, and every hour the war is continued only widens the separation and increases the danger. But, Sir, I propose to introduce the opinion of another departed statesman, of the school of politics to which the gentlemen on the opposite side of the chamber belong, and for whose political opinions they entertain the highest regard. That profound statesman, after the experience of many years in the most exalted positions of the nation, and with a perfect knowledge of the subject upon which he spoke, said:

'Nations acknowledge no judge between them upon earth, and their Governments from necessity must, in their intercourse with each other, decide when the failure of one party to a contract to perform its obligations absolves the other from the reciprocal fulfilment of his own. But this last of earthly powers is not necessary to the freedom or independence of States connected together by the immediate action of the people, of whom they consist. To the people alone is there reserved, as well the dissolving as the constituent power, and that power can be exercised by them only under the tie of conscience binding them to the retributive justice of heaven. With these qualifications we may admit the same right as vested in the people of every State in the Union, with reference to the General Government, which was exercised by the people of the United Colonies with reference to the supreme head of the British Empire, of which they formed a part, and under these limitations have the people of each State in the Union a right to secede from the confederated Union itself. Thus stands the Right. But the indissoluble link of Union between the people of the several States of this confederated nation is, after all, not in the right, but in the heart. If the day should ever come (may heaven avert it!) when the affection of the people of these States shall be alienated from each other; when the fraternal spirit shall give way to cold indifference; or collisions of interest shall fester into hatred, the bands of political association will not long hold together parties no longer attracted by the magnetism of conciliated interests and kindly sympathies; and far better will it be for the people of the disunited States to part in friendship from each other than to be held together by constraint. Then will be the time for reverting to the precedents which occurred at the formation and adoption of the Constitution, to form again a more perfect Union, by dissolving that which could no longer bind, and to leave the separated parts to be re-united by the laws of political gravitation to the centre.'

Thus, Mr. Chairman, spoke John Quincy Adams in an address delivered before the New York Historical Society on the 30th of April, 1839, in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the inauguration of George Washington as President of the United States. Mr. Adams was a believer in the doctrine therein set forth, and the leaders of the party to which he belonged shared in that belief; and continued to do so until the commencement of the present unnatural civil war. If it was sound doctrine before secession took place and the war began, what is there in either to change the principle?

Andrew Jackson, in his farewell address to the American people, has solemnly warned them that the citizens of one section of the country arrayed in arms against the other would be the end of the Union and an end of the hope of freedom. He says, that: 'If such a struggle is once begun, and the citizens of one section of the country are arrayed in arms against those of the other in doubtful conflict, let the battle result as it may, there will be an end of the Union, and with it an end of the hope of freedom. The victory of the injured would not secure to them the blessings of liberty; it would avenge their wrongs, but they would themselves share in the common ruin. The Constitution cannot be maintained nor the Union preserved, in opposition to public feeling, by the mere exertion of the coercive power of the Government.'

But this opinion, that the Union cannot be preserved by the coercive powers of the Government, was not confined to the departed statesmen of the country.

William H. Seward, in his letter of April 11, 1861, to Mr. Adams, our Minister to England, said:

'For these reasons the President would not be disposed to reject a cardinal doctrine of theirs (the Rebels) namely: that the Federal Government could not reduce the seceding States to obedience by conquest, even though he were disposed to question that proposition. But in fact the President willingly accepts it as true. Only an imperial or a despotic government could subjugate thoroughly disaffected and insurrectionary members of the State. This Federal Republican system of ours is, of all forms of government, the very one which is most unfitted for such labour.'

Such was the language of the Secretary of State in April, 1861, three days before the Sunday on which the President wrote his proclamation calling out seventy-five thousand troops, but after seven States had seceded. The Secretary shared in the fears of the President, that the attempt to subjugate the South would destroy the Government. Three years of civil war in a vain and fruitless effort at subjugation attest and prove to-day the correctness of the opinion then held by the President: 'Only an imperial or despotic government could subjugate thoroughly disaffected and insurrectionary members of the State.' 'This Federal Republic of ours is of all forms of government the most unfitted for such labour. Who does not believe it? If there is truth in the Declaration of Independence—and the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House will certainly not dispute it, since they incorporated it in the Chicago platform, which became a law unto the President — who, I ask, can deny the conclusion of the Secretary of State, having in view always, as he and the President undoubtedly had, the great cardinal truth underlying all republican governments 'deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.' If the President and his Secretary of State gave utterance to truth in 1861, is it any less a truth to-day? Has not rather the experience of three years of war confirmed it? I believed it then. I believe it now. But, sir, I propose to call another witness to testify against this coercive policy, who also spoke in advance of the war. Edward Everett, in his letter of May 29, 1860, to Washington Hunt, accepting the nomination as Vice President of the Union party, of which, I believe, the distinguished gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Henry Winter Davis) was a member, and for whom a number of gentlemen upon this floor voted, then said:

'The suggestion that the Union can be maintained by numerical preponderance and military prowess of one section exerted to coerce the other into submission is, in my judgment, as self-contradictory as it is dangerous. It comes loaded with the death-smell from fields wet with brothers' blood. If the vital principle of all republican governments "is the consent of the governed," much more does a union of coequal Sovereign States require, as its basis, the harmony of its members and their voluntary co-operation in its organic functions.'

It will no doubt be said Mr. Everett has changed his views upon the subject. That may be so, but I have not. I believed it sound doctrine in 1860, before secession occurred or coercion began. Three years' experience in attempting 'by numerical preponderance and military prowess of one section exerted to coerce the other into submission' has convinced me more thoroughly that it is 'as self-contradictory as it is dangerous'—contradictory because it violates the great principles of free government, which 'derive their just powers from the consent of the governed;' and dangerous, because, by its exercise, especially when wielded by a weak, vacillating, and unscrupulous man, it destroys instead of maintaining the Union, Constitution, and organic law; civil liberty and personal security are forced to yield to what is claimed to be a military necessity, and the Government itself, in the brief period of three short years, is to-day verging on the very brink of ruin.

I am well aware, sir, that the cry of disloyalty, want of patriotism, and lack of devotion to the Government, which is in every place and at all times raised against those who have the independence to disapprove of any of the acts of Mr. Lincoln, as well as an inordinate desire for Government patronage, from the building of a steamship and a shoddy contract down to the insignificant position of taking charge of a mutilated and depreciated greenback in the Treasury building, has changed the opinion of many men, but the fixed principles of free government, as well as the rules of right, reason, justice, and truth, are unchangeable; and although it may be unpopular, and even at the risk of personal liberty in times like the present, to advocate them, they are nevertheless eternal and immutable.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Stevens), who stands upon this floor and before the country as an acknowledged leader of the Administration party, has had the honesty and independence, in a speech delivered at an early part of the session, to announce what he holds to be the true position of the Confederate States. He says:—

'Some think that these States are still in the Union and entitled to the protection of the Constitution and the laws of the United States.'

This idea he at once repudiates, and then boldly affirms that which he holds to be the true doctrine:—

'Others hold that having committed treason, renounced their allegiance to the Union, discarded the Constitution and laws, organised a distinct and hostile Government, and by force of arms have risen from the condition of insurgents to the position of an independent power de facto; and having been acknowledged as a belligerent, both by foreign nations and our own Government, the Constitution and the Union are abrogated, so far as they are concerned, and that as between the two belligerents they are under the laws of war and the laws of nations alone, and that whichever Power conquers may treat the vanquished as conquered provinces, and may impose upon them such conditions and laws as it may deem best.'

In answer to any objections that may be raised to this position, he says:

'But it is said that this must be considered a contest with rebel individuals only, as States in the Union cannot make war; that is true so long as they remain in the Union; but they claim to be out of the Union, and the very fact that we have admitted them to be in a state of war, to be belligerents, shows that they are no longer in the Union, and thus they are waging war in their corporate capacity, under the corporate name of the Confederate States, and that such major corporation is composed of minor corporations called States, acting in their associated character.

'When an insurrection becomes sufficiently formidable to entitle the party to belligerent rights, it places the contending Powers on precisely the same footing as foreign nations at war with each other.

'No one acquainted with the magnitude of this contest can deny to it the character of a civil war. For nearly three years the Confederate States have maintained their declaration of independence by force of arms.'

'What, then, is the effect of this public war between these belligerents, these foreign nations? Before this war the parties were bound together by a compact, by a treaty called a 'Constitution.' They acknowledged the validity of municipal laws mutually binding on each. This war has cut asunder all these ligaments, abrogated all the obligations.'

Now, sir, for once at least, I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the Confederate States are out of the Union, occupying the position of an independent power de facto; have been acknowledged as a belligerent, both by foreign nations and our own Government; maintained their declaration of independence for three years, by force of arms; and that the war has cut asunder all the ligaments, and abrogated all the obligations, that bound them under the Constitution. So far I agree with him, and however unwilling we may be to accept such position as the actual condition of the Confederate States, the history of the past three years, the law of nations, the genius of our government, and a regard for truth, compel me at least to accept it, and my judgment to approve it; and if the charge of disloyalty is brought against me for this opinion, I have only to shield myself under the broad mantle of the distinguished leader of the Republican party. At the commencement of the war England and France both declared the Confederate States to be belligerents; the United States has treated with them as such in the exchange of prisoners, and the Administration is to-day, without the honesty or independence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to avow it, doing precisely what he proposes to do under a war of conquest, waged against the Confederate States as a foreign nation. It is not now even pretended that the war is carried on, having for its object the restoration of the Union; 'reconstruction,' 'consolidation,' 'centralisation,' 'with an entire change in the Constitution,' are the terms employed in speaking of the Government that is to exist hereafter. To speak of the Constitution as it is, and the Union as it was, is an offence, subjecting an officer in the army to punishment by dismissal from the service, and conclusive evidence of disloyalty in the citizen. If the time ever was when the Union could have been restored by war, which I do not believe, it has long since been dispelled by emancipation, confiscation, amnesty, and the like proclamations; military orders annulling State constitutions, setting aside State laws, obliterating State lines, and attempting to organise and set up a form of State government in their stead, in which one man out of ten who shall turn Abolitionist, take and subscribe an oath to execute and obey the will of Abraham Lincoln, whatever it may be, shall govern and rule over the remaining nine who refuse to become Abolitionists. These follies of the Administration, and others of the like character, have, instead of 'crushing the rebellion,' crushed out whatever Union sentiment may have remained among the Southern people. It is possible that, in districts of country occupied by the army, occasionally a man may be found who, seeing nothing before him but ignominy and death, his wife and innocent children appealing to him for protection with all the ties of filial affection, his property to be confiscated, and his family to become outcasts and beggars in the world—that such a man, in order, for the time being, to save himself, save his family, and save his property, may take the oath, but the effect of it will be, as it ought to be, like that of Galileo, who invented the telescope, and who first taught the rotary motion of the earth. That noble old Italian, after many years of labour in the study of science, and when he had advanced to the extreme age of seventy, was summoned before an inquisition, tried, condemned, and imprisoned in a dungeon for teaching a heresy; subsequently he was brought out and offered liberty on condition of renouncing his heretical doctrine. The effect of beholding the glorious light of the sun and breathing again the pure air of heaven, as contrasted with the loathsome dungeon in which he had been cast, and to which he must return or renounce his belief in the earth's motion, so far overcame his humanity that he consented to comply, and upon his bended knees, with his hands upon the gospels, he abjured his belief in the Copernican doctrine. Part of his abjuration ran in these terms: 'With a sincere heart and unfeigned faith, I abjure, curse, and detest the said errors and heresies (viz., that the earth moves, &c.); I swear that I will never in future say or assert anything, verbally or in writing, which may give rise to a similar suspicion against me.' Rising from his knees with his eyes still fixed on the earth, he whispered to a friend, 'E pur si muove.' 'It moves for all that.' So it will be with the man who is forced to take the oath to save himself, his family, and his property. He may take it, but in his heart he will detest and despise the authority that required it. Will such a man be devoted to or make a good citizen of the Government in which he lives? The history of Poland, of Hungary, of Ireland, and of Italy, furnishes an answer to the question. If imperial governments are not able to hold in submissive obedience small portions of a vast empire, once in revolt, how much less a government having for its basis the consent of the governed! But 'subjugation' is the watchword. Liberty and freedom for the slave, and subjugation and extermination for the master, is the popular cry. Meet them, fight them, crush them, says the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Green Clay Smith). Sir, that is easily said upon this floor, and is popular with those who from day to day fill the gallery of this House, but even the gentleman from Kentucky, as well as a number of other military gentlemen, were quite willing to forego the pleasure of the performance, and exchange their commissions as generals in the field for a certificate entitling them to a seat upon this floor; and were I to judge by the willingness with which it was done, and the tenacity with which they hold on to it, and the efforts some of them are making to return here again, instead of the war spirit they breathe within these walls, I should strongly suspect them of being in sympathy with the peace party.

Mr. Chairman, I am no military man, and therefore incompetent to give advice or advance an opinion in military affairs, but I have been often forcibly struck by a remark of Marshal Ney, in reply to Napoleon, as related by Headly in his 'Napoleon and his Marshals:'—'One day, at Madrid, Napoleon entered the room where Ney and several officers were standing, and said in great glee, "Everything goes on well: Romana will be reduced in a fortnight; the English are defeated and will be unable to advance; in three months the war will be finished." The officers to whom this was addressed made no reply, but Ney, shaking his head, said with his characteristic bluntness, "Sire, this war has lasted long already, and our affairs are not improved. The people are obstinate; even their women and children fight; they massacre our men in detail. To-day we cut the enemy in pieces, to-morrow we have to oppose another twice as numerous. It is not an army we have to fight, it is a whole nation. I see no end to this business." Bonaparte followed his own inclinations, and was eventually defeated.'

Mr. Chairman, is there not instruction in the blunt yet forcible reply of the old French Marshal to his superior officer for us? Have we not had, from time to time, the predictions of Napoleon during the past three years, but without a Marshal Ney to say, 'I see no end to this business?'

But, Mr. Chairman, how do we stand in the eyes of the civilised world to-day, in waging a war of subjugation and conquest against the Confederate States, which have seceded from us and set up a Government of their own? Are we not inconsistent with all our former acts? Have we not been early to admit this doctrine with regard to others? There never was a people on the face of the earth that demanded an independent government, that did not have the sympathy of the American people; and ought we now to shrink from the doctrine we have been willing to apply to others? My earliest recollection is the appeal made by Clay and Webster in behalf of Greece, in 1824, when they so eloquently declaimed in that behalf on this floor and in the other branch of Congress. Whether it was Greece, or the States of South America, or Poland or Hungary, or Italy or Ireland, the fact that a large country, for any cause, demanded a distinct and separate government, always received the warmest sympathy and support of the American people, irrespective of party. Even as late as December, 1860, after Mr. Lincoln was elected, and after the preliminary steps for secession had been taken, the paper having the largest circulation of any in the Republican party, and having more influence than any other in the formation of Republican opinion, declared that it could see no reason why, if three millions of colonists could separate from the British Crown in 1776, that five millions of Southerners could not separate from us in 1861. I have been as much puzzled as the distinguished Republican editor, Mr. Greeley, to find, looking at it as a revolutionary right, the difference in position. Ought we to shrink from the application of a doctrine to ourselves which we have been so willing to apply to other nations, such as Austria, Russia, and Spain? If we do, what will be the judgment of impartial history? How much better it would have been for us and the cause of Democracy throughout the globe. What a splendid tribute it would have been to a republican government if we had parted in peace with our dissatisfied sister States, as Mr. Everett recommended as late as February, 1861, sustained by such leading Republican journals as the Cincinnati Commercial, New York Tribune, Indianapolis Journal, Chicago Tribune, New Haven (Connecticut) Palladium, Columbus Journal, and Salmon P. Chase, now Secretary of the Treasury, and many others of that school. What in monarchial countries had required a long and bloody war, would have been accomplished by Democratic principles and Republican sense of justice. What a splendid proof it would have afforded of the capacity of the people for self-government. What a valuable lesson it would have conveyed to the whole civilised world. The fact that we could rise superior to all prejudices and passions, and have conquered ourselves, would have been the highest triumph that we had ever achieved. I regret as much, Mr. Chairman, as any gentleman upon this floor, that any of our sister States should have desired to cut asunder the ligaments that bound them to us. None would be more willing than myself to make any reasonable sacrifice to induce them to return to their partnership with us; but still recognising the truth of the doctrine taught by the fathers of the Republic, and so fairly expressed by Mr. John Quincy Adams, that our Government was after all in the heart, it would be better, severe as would be the pang of regret, to part in friendship, rather than to hold sovereign States pinned to us by the bayonet, as Mr. Greeley expressed it, in 1861. What advance have we made in the science and principles of government, Mr. Chairman, if we cannot rise above the Austro-Russian principle of holding subject provinces by the power of force and coercion? What becomes of the Declaration of Independence and of all our teachings for eighty years? After all, Mr. Chairman, it is not the extent of territory which should be the object of our desires. Better sacrifice over nine-tenths of the territory than destroy our republican form of government. What our people desired in 1861, and which I honoured, though I regarded as mistaken, was the preservation of the Government and the retention of our jurisdiction over the whole territory. They were rightly willing to sacrifice every material consideration for that purpose. Land is nothing, Mr. Chairman, compared to liberty. We existed as a Republic when the mouth of the Mississippi was held by a foreign power, when we had nothing west of that river, when Florida was held against us: and we could exist again, if by the chastisement of heaven we should be curtailed to our old territorial dimensions. For fifteen millions of dollars we purchased the whole of that immense territory, and were it a hundred thousand times as valuable its preservation would not be worth our admirable form of Government. Pride of territorial ambition is a vulgar and low ambition of national greatness. Russia and even China can vie with us in that; but who would not rather reside in one of the cantons of Switzerland, or in Great Britain, than in those countries? It is not in the extent of territory we possess, but the manner in which we govern it that renders us respectable. Many gentlemen seem rather to look to the quantity than the quality. All republics have been destroyed by the thirst of territorial aggrandisement and the lust of conquest. The great object of our government should be to develope and cultivate the internal resources of those friendly to its jurisdiction, rather than to extend it over hostile and foreign people. It is in that character that true patriotism is to be cultivated and true national glory found. Especially should all republics cultivate the arts of peace, since it is by the war power that free governments are commonly overturned. The charge has been made that democracy is turbulent, warlike, and aggressive; but, if so, it is a terrible misconception of its true interests, for upon the people fall the awful calamities of armed collisions. An eminent poet has said—Lord Byron—that war was a game which, if the people were wise, kings and princes would never play at. The venerable Dr. Franklin, at the close of his illustrious career, remarked: 'That there was never a good war or a bad peace.'

We have made, Mr. Chairman, by this war, eight millions of bitter enemies upon the American Continent. While time shall last, the recollections of this bloody strife will never fade from the memories of the people North and South, but will be handed down to the latest generation. The words Shiloh, Antietam, Gettysburg, Murfreesborough, Richmond, Vicksburg, and Fort Donelson are words of division and disunion, and will serve to bring up emotions of eternal hate. If it were true, as was alleged by a distinguished Senator from Ohio (Mr. Wade), in a speech in Portland in 1855, 'that he believed that no two nations on the earth hated each other at much as the North and South,' how much more true is the remark now, after they have been arrayed in such bloody contests. It is the object of the sword to cut and cleave asunder, but never to unite. What union is there between Russia and Poland, between Austria and Hungary, between England and Catholic Ireland, where the sword and the bayonet for centuries have been employed? Instead of conferring national strength, they are sources of weakness to countries that held them in subjection, and which would this day be stronger without them than with them.

Mr. Chairman, these lessons of history are full of warning and example. Much better would it have been for us in the beginning—much better would it be for us now—to consent to a division of our magnificent empire and cultivate amicable relations with our estranged brethren, than to seek to hold them to us by the power of the sword. Here let me advert to the common, yet perfectly glaring and apparent error, that to part with our jurisdiction over eleven States involves the destruction of our Government. The statement of the proposition demonstrates its absurdity. As well might one say, who had a farm of two hundred acres of land, that he had lost his title deed to all of it because, by some misfortune, he had parted with fifty. In losing the South, not one function of our Government over us is surrendered. It remains over us as completely sovereign as it ever did. Here let me say, as the experience of my individual belief, that if it had been understood in the North, as in the South, that by the terms of the Federal compact a State had a right to secede from the Union, this disruption would never have occurred. Had the North so understood the matter there would have been upon its part a forbearance from the exercise of extreme measures, and a desire not to press its Southern sisters to the wall, that would ever have maintained the Confederacy unbroken. It was the prevalence of the idea of the Consolidationists in the North, that the Southern States had no right to and would not secede, that tempted them to that fatal policy that has sundered the Confederacy.

It is said that no confederacy can exist by a recognition of this principle, but such was not the view of the fathers of our Government; it was not the view of Jefferson and Madison, in their immortal resolutions of 1798 and 1799.

It has been said, Mr. Chairman, that it would make a confederacy a rope of sand, but if so it is strange that the Southern Confederacy, where it is recognised, should hold together through such a bloody pressure as we have applied to it for the last three years; it is a strange rope of sand that endures all that.

But to return, Mr. Chairman. As will be judged, perhaps, by the tenor of these remarks, I am reluctantly and despondingly forced to the conclusion that the Union is lost, never to be restored. I regard all dreams of the restoration of the Union, which was the pride of my life, and to restore which even now now, I would pour out my heart's blood, as worse than idle. I see neither North nor South any sentiment on which it is possible to build a Union—those elements of union which Mr. Adams described have by the process of time been destroyed. Worse, yes worse than that, Mr. Chairman, I am reluctantly forced to the conclusion that in attempting to preserve our jurisdiction over the Southern States, we have lost our constitutional form of government over the Northern. What has been predicted by our wisest and most eminent statesmen has come to pass; in grasping at the shadow, we have lost the substance; in striving to retain the casket of liberty in which our jewels were confined, we have lost those precious muniments of freedom. Our Government, as all know, is not anything resembling what it was three years ago; there is not one single vestige of the Constitution remaining; every clause and every letter of it has been violated, and I have no idea myself that it will ever again be respected. Revolutions never go backward to the point at which they started. There has always been a large party in this country favourable to a strong or monarchial government, and they have now all the elements upon which to establish one. They have a vast army, an immense public debt, and an irresponsible Executive. Ambitious to retain power, he is a candidate for re-election, and as Commander-in-Chief, it is charged (whether true or false I shall not undertake to decide), that he has already used the army in the Florida expedition to advance his chances of success. One of the Generals he has decapitated (General Fremont) has entered the field to dispute his claim to a continuance in power, and if the Chronicle of this city, the President's organ, is correct in its construction of the suggestions of the New York Herald, speaking of Lieutenant-General Grant, the question is already mooted whether he, in certain contingencies, at the head of the army, would not be justified in assuming the reins of government.

The very idea upon which this war is founded—coercion of States—leads to despotism; to preserve a republican form of Government under any constitution, under the prevalence of the doctrines now in vogue, is clearly impossible. These convictions of the complete overthrow of our Government are as unwelcome and unpleasant to me as they are to any member of this House. Would to God the facts were such that I could cherish other convictions. I may be denounced as disloyal and unpatriotic for entertaining them, but it will only be by shallow fools and arrant knaves, who do not know or will not admit the difference between recognising a fact and creating its existence. A man may not desire to die, but nevertheless his belief will not alter the fact of his mortality. I shall not in these remarks revive the unpleasant and acrimonious controversy of who is responsible for the death and destruction of our Republic. I do not see that any such discussion now would be productive of good. I entertain clear and strong convictions upon that point, convictions that I have no doubt will be shared in by the impartial historian of the future. For the present I am willing to let the past, with all its recollections, rest, provided we can snatch from the common ruin some of our old relics of freedom. I do not share in the belief entertained by many of my political friends on this floor and elsewhere, that any peace is attainable upon the basis of union and reconstruction. If the Democratic party were in power to-day I have no idea, and honesty compels me to declare it, that they could restore the Union over thirty-four States. My mind has undergone an entire change upon that subject. I believe that there are but two alternatives, and these are, either an acknowledgment of the independence of the South as an independent nation, or their complete subjugation and extermination as a people, and of these alternatives I prefer the former.

Mr. Chairman, I take little or no interest in the discussion of the question which many of my political friends would make an issue, as to how this war shall be prosecuted, its manner and object. I regard that as worse than trifling with the great question. I do not believe there can be any prosecution of the war against a sovereign State under the constitution, and I do not believe that a war so carried on can be prosecuted so as to render it proper, justifiable, or expedient. An unconstitutional war can only be carried on in an unconstitutional manner, and to prosecute it further under the idea of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Stephens), as a war waged against the Confederate States as an independent nation, for the purpose of conquest and subjugation, as he proposes, and the Administration is in truth and in fact doing, I am equally opposed.

I will say further, Mr. Chairman, that if this war is to be still further prosecuted, I prefer that it shall be done under the auspices of those who now conduct its management, as I do not wish the party with which I am connected to be in any degree responsible for its results, which cannot be otherwise than disastrous and suicidal—let the responsibility remain where it is until we can have a change of policy instead of men, if such a thing is possible. Nothing could be more fatal to the Democratic party than to seek to come into power pledged to a continuance of a war policy—such a policy would be a libel upon its creed in the past and the ideas that lie at the basis of all free governments, and would lead to its complete demoralisation and ruin.

I believe that the masses of the Democratic party are for peace, that they would be placed in a false position if they should nominate a war candidate for the Presidency and seek to make the issue upon the narrow basis of how the war should be prosecuted. For my own part, as I have already indicated, I fear that our old Government cannot be preserved, even under the best auspices and under any policy that may be now adopted; yet I desire to see the Democratic party with which I have always been connected preserve its consistency and republican character unshaken.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their papers supplied through Henry Hotze, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognised at this Office.

Subscription, 26*s.* per annum; post-paid, 30*s.*: payable in advance.

All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-office orders made payable, to J. B. Hopkins, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

The Index may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the Paper made—

At Liverpool, to Mr. Hutton, 6 Commercial Buildings, 17 Water Street.
At Manchester, F. A. Hasleham, Esq. 26 Market Street.
At Turin, to Sr. Filippo Manetta, 4 Borgo Nuovo.
At St. Thomas (West Indies), to C. W. White, Esq.

Mr. J. H. Ashbridge, Treasurer of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund, begs to acknowledge the receipt of the following additional Contributions:—

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, APRIL 28, 1864.

The Peace Party in the Federal Congress.

The better sense of the Northern people has at length found an articulate voice in the halls of Congress. A year ago Mr. Fernando Wood protested against the further prosecution of the war; but his speech was only printed, and not spoken, and no doubt, if he had attempted to deliver it in the House, the cries of the members would have rendered his words inaudible. Mr. Wood did what he could; he published his patriotic appeal, and his own party, alarmed at his boldness, shrank from him, and for a while he stood apparently almost alone. Mr. Long has just done more than ask for peace; for he has, in the House of Representatives, suggested and advocated the only possible terms of peace—the recognition of the Confederate States. Yet he has not been cried down or expelled, and, so far from standing alone, he must, we should think, be as much surprised as pleased to find how many men are ready to brave the fury of the Administration, and to support him.

The events of the last twelve months sufficiently account for the altered position of the Democratic party. From the beginning they have disliked the war; but, with the timidity characteristic of American politicians, they have feared to stem the torrent of popular passion, and, instead of opposing, have consented, and even, though most unwillingly, aided the work of destruction. But the imbecility and despotism of the Lincoln Government have goaded them into open resistance. After three years of carnage, after contracting a debt that inevitably involves repudiation and bankruptcy, the subjugation of the South is as far off as ever, and the impossibility of achieving it still more palpable. The liberty and rights of the citizens have been utterly ignored. In carrying out his electioneering scheme of reconstructing States, Mr. Lincoln has acted with a high-handed insolence that would provoke the patience of the most abject community on the face of the earth. In its foreign relations the Lincoln Government has resorted to flagrant misrepresentation, fraud, and forgery, and has made the diplomacy of the United States contemptible and scandalous. The prospect is so profoundly gloomy, that the Democrats gather courage from despair, and though they cannot redeem the past, they may do something to avert or mitigate the miseries looming in the future.

We can readily discern that the present demonstration of Democratic spirit is not a sudden impulse, but the manifestation of a growing strength and conviction. In the first year of the war Mr. Wood's speech would have insured his imprisonment or banishment. Last summer Mr. Vallandigham was tried and exiled for advocating peace as a means of restoring the Union, and for censuring the unconstitutional proceedings of one of Mr. Lincoln's generals. A few months have wrought a vast change. In New York, in the West, and even in New England, journals are published day after day in which the Administration is bitterly denounced. About seven weeks since Mr. Voorhees, of Indiana, spoke in the House of Representatives in favour of immediate peace as the only way to save the country from irretrievable ruin, but though he was so much more outspoken than Mr. Vallandigham he was not molested. Finally, Mr. Long, casting off all reserve, asked for the recognition of the Confederate States. Mr. Colfax proposed a vote of expulsion, and Mr. Harris and Mr. Wood endorsed Mr. Long's sentiments, and declared themselves ready to share his fate. Mr. Harris went so far as to express a fervent hope that the South might never be conquered, yet the Republican party could not command votes enough to expel him. The proposal to expel Mr. Long was allowed to drop, and a vote of censure was carried by 80 to 70. A majority of 10, under such circumstances, was a signal triumph to the Opposition; and that 70 members should vote that it is not censurable to advocate the recognition of the South is marked testimony to the strength and progress of the Peace party.

The protest against the war and the Administration comes from the quarter where it has always been expected by those acquainted with the circumstances and condition of the United States. Messrs. Vallandigham, Voorhees, and Long represent the great West—that section that has by far the most to lose by the ruin of the South, and nothing to gain by her subjugation. The men of the West begin to perceive that they have been the tools of New England, and have been fighting to gratify the ambition and avarice of the East, to their own commercial and political detriment. In the West, the storm has long been gathering; and the speech of Mr. Long, and its reception, will vastly encourage those who are preparing to resist the despotic rule of Mr. Lincoln, even at the cost of civil war.

We have not the least desire to exaggerate the importance of the event on which we are commenting, but still we believe it highly important, and we think that it is likely to be too little estimated in Europe. For three years it has been dinned into our ears that the North would continue the struggle so long as men and money could in any way be procured—that peace has been held to be impossible except through foreign intervention or from the complete exhaustion of the North. But why may we not derive some hope from this evidence of returning sanity? It may be a weary while before the peace party at the North acquire power to stop this desolating war. A military success, a victory by Grant, may revive the drooping war sentiment and check the efforts of the Democrats. We are aware that those in the North who desire to put an end to the bloody strife have the special difficulty to contend with, that as yet foreign Governments, and especially the Government of England, do not consider the case of the North desperate, and therefore refuse to recognise the South. We are aware that there is no precedent for a Power to be the first to recognise the independence of a nation which was lately a part of itself. Spain did not do so with respect to her revolted colonies; England did not do so when her colonies asserted their independence. Still we hail the mention of recognition in the Federal Congress as a happy omen, and though peace may be distant, we believe that it will somewhat hasten the consummation which every patriot, North and South, desires, and which so nearly concerns the prosperity of Europe in general, and the welfare of England in particular.

On to Richmond!

General Grant has assumed the chief command of the Federal army in Virginia, and it is understood that an advance will take place forthwith. Furloughs are suspended, the baggage is sent to the rear. As soon as the damages caused by the recent floods are repaired, and the roads are traversable by large armies, the new campaign against the Southern capital will be opened. Grant's plans are involved in mystery, so far as the New York press is concerned, but they are probably well known at Confederate head-quarters; and as the roads to Richmond are few, it is not likely that there will be any combination which the Southern generals have not long ago foreseen and prepared for. As usual, the Federals describe Grant's army as more numerous and in better condition than any of the forces which have hitherto operated against Lee, and 'invincible' is the mildest of the laudatory epithets heaped upon the captor of Vicksburg. But competent authorities tell us that the Federal army is very inferior in every respect, numbers included, to that magnificent host which advanced under M'Clellan in 1862; whilst it is certain that the forces under General Lee are twice as effective as when they drove the invaders from their lines on the Chickahominy to their gunboats on the James River. With a splendid artillery and abundance of ammunition, with a plentiful supply of the best rifles that the arsenals of Europe can turn out, with the prestige of twenty victories on their side, and with unshaken confidence in their skilful leader, the Confederates await the advance of the Northern army, conscious that, in everything but numerical strength, they have the advantage, and more sanguine than ever as to the result. In point of numbers, the army under Grant can hardly come up to M'Clellan's estimate of the force required for a successful march upon Richmond. That general fixed the effective strength of the army of the Potomac at 208,000 men, its aggregate numbers at 240,000. Considering that this army had to garrison Washington, to guard the Potomac from Harper's Ferry to the sea, and to garrison Baltimore, the estimate was not too high. But Grant has nothing like this effective force, and if it be his intention to divide his strength, to advance simultaneously by Fortress Monroe up the York Town Peninsula, by Goldsborough, and across the Rappahannock, he will run imminent risk of being beaten in detail. It is true Grant's army has been largely supplemented by regiments withdrawn from the South-west, whose places have been filled by negro troops, but the bulk is composed of the conscripts of the autumn of 1863, who have never been under fire, and are described as altogether an inferior class of recruits to the men who formed the army of 1862; and if M'Clellan in 1862 found his force too small, and abandoned in despair the direct advance upon Richmond, it is difficult to imagine on what reasonable grounds General Grant bases his hope of triumph. The dangers of an advance across the Rappahannock and Rapidan have been illustrated in half a dozen great Federal defeats. Bad roads and few, unfordable rivers, dense forests, a surface soil which twenty-four hours' heavy rain converts into mud almost impassable by large armies—these are the natural obstacles to the invader, which no thoughtful commander can overlook, and which to anybody but a great military genius present almost insurmountable difficulties in the way of concerted manœuvring of troops. It is, and ever will be, the weakness of the North that it must send armies into the field which only a Napoleon could handle, and must place at their head men scarcely fit to manœuvre a division. It is not possible that this unwieldy army, under General Grant, can advance through such a country as that south of the Rappahannock without giving a fatal chance to the Confederate General. We have abundant proof that if the chance is offered, it will not be refused. The position of Lee at Richmond gives him immense advantages in this respect. He cannot be forced to give battle except at his own time and on his own ground. He may defend the line of the Rapidan and inflict terrible loss upon his opponents; fall back upon an inner line of defence, strengthened by all the engineering science at his disposal; and, if driven thence, he can retire behind the works round Richmond, which can only be approached by regular siege operations. M'Clellan's disaster on the Chickahominy is not encouraging to the hopes of those who indulge in anticipations of a second siege of the Southern capital. The fate of Hooker, Burnside, Banks, and Pope ought to teach a lesson to those sanguine Northerners who believe that Grant will outmanœuvre and outfight his opponent in the field. Hitherto, Grant has done nothing to justify the confidence reposed in him. What he has accomplished he has achieved with immense superiority of force. With an army four times as strong as General Pemberton's, assisted by an enormous naval force to which the Confederates had nothing to oppose, he captured Vicksburg. He narrowly escaped utter rout at Shiloh. He was again victor at Chattanooga with an army at least twice as strong as the army he beat. But he has now to deal with the ablest generals and the flower of the Confederate army; and he must display qualities which his best friends have as yet failed to discern, if his reputation is to survive the new and terrible encounter to which he is leading the Federal army.

In the meantime, the Confederates are busy in Kentucky and Tennessee in a manner which cannot fail to tell seriously upon the issue of the general campaign. Forrest seems to have acquired a permanent hold upon Western Kentucky and Western Tennessee, and his presence there in force must prove an immense embarrassment to the Federal army in the South-west. His latest success is the capture of Fort Pillow, with its garrison of 600 men—an event not so important in itself as in the evidence it gives of the weakness of the Federals in those parts, and of the great drain upon the force in the South-west in order to keep up the strength of the main armies under Grant in Virginia and

Thomas at Chattanooga. Six months ago it would have been thought an impossibility for Forrest to maintain himself in Western Tennessee. At present he is master of the whole country between the Mississippi and Tennessee rivers; he is accumulating enormous stores of supplies; is said to meditate an attack upon Memphis; and may at any day swoop down upon the long line of Federal communications between the Western States and Nashville and Chattanooga, and work incalculable mischief to the Federal Army of the Cumberland. Strange to say, we hear of no efforts to dislodge him. General Grierson's cavalry keeps at a respectful distance. The Federal troops in Kentucky are more intent upon guarding the eastern frontier and protecting the communications with Knoxville, and Forrest carries on his raids almost unmolested. Possibly General Grant can afford to disregard this insignificant enemy; but the moral effect of these uninterrupted successes of the Confederates in Kentucky and Tennessee must greatly injure the Union cause in those States, for they demonstrate more clearly than ever the hopelessness of the task the North has set itself. If after three years of war the Federals cannot protect and hold the territory of which they were in undisputed possession during the first two campaigns, what prospect is there of subjugating the Confederate States? What inducements can they offer, even to men of doubtful allegiance to the Confederacy, to throw in their lot with the fortunes of the Union?

The Federal movements in Louisiana are still enveloped in considerable obscurity. The advance of General Banks's column, aided by its gunboats, has achieved some unimportant successes on the Red River, having captured Fort de Russy by surprise and occupied Alexandria, without a struggle. The correspondents attached to it boast of large quantities of cotton destroyed or captured, and of the speedy annihilation of the Confederate forces in Louisiana, or their flight into Texas. But the last mail or two from New Orleans to the North has brought some very sinister rumours. There are reports that all is not going well; that, instead of advancing to Shreveport, Banks has enough to do to hold Alexandria and protect himself from the Confederate attacks. It is certain that several large captures have been made by the Federals; and if it be true that a force of Confederates 12,000 or 14,000 strong, under General Dick Taylor, is in the neighbourhood, we may any day hear of a battle decisive of the fate of Louisiana for the present campaign. Under any circumstances, the results of the fighting in this State will not materially affect the main issue. And it is little less than marvellous that the Federal authorities should despatch an army of 40,000 or 50,000 men to a locality where their services are so little needed. One-half of that force might have recovered Western Tennessee, or dangerously strengthened Grant's army in Virginia.

Mr. Seward's Immigration Scheme.

It would scarcely be possible to exaggerate the significance of the measure lately proposed to Congress by Mr. Seward, with the approval of the Government of the United States, concerning the immigration of foreigners. Were the intelligence to arrive to-day that another great battle had been fought and another decisive victory achieved upon the memorable plains of Manassas, and that the Federal hosts were fleeing panic-stricken before the victorious armies of the South, the great world, dazzled by the spectacle, would regard the event as a harbinger of the final success of the Confederate cause. But to the statesman the evidence furnished by the suggested enactment of the law in question points with far more certainty to the approaching overthrow of the Federal power than would the result of any single battle however bloody, or of any single victory however decisive. In whatever aspect it may be regarded, it exhibits to the philosophical mind the features of a nation, if not in the agonies of immediate dissolution, yet bearing the most unmistakable evidences of an incurable malady. The convulsive exhibitions of physical force put forth by the dying man may deceive the uninformed, but the skilled physician knows that they are but the premonitory evidences of the approaching prostration of the vital powers. The first thing proposed by Mr. Seward is, that the Government of the United States, in order to fill up the ranks of 'labourers,' which have been so fearfully thinned by the war, shall advance the means necessary for the outfit and passage to America of European immigrants. The nature of the services which are expected to be rendered by those who may be lured by this tempting opportunity to seek their fortunes in the New World, may be readily inferred by the provision that the money thus advanced shall be reimbursed to the Government by the 'labour of such immigrants as shall accept the proffered bounty.' That the enactment of such a law would amount in effect to the establishment of recruiting stations in every seaport of Europe will hardly be questioned. It is a bold and scarcely disguised attempt to fill up the Federal armies by the virtual enlistment of soldiers wherever they may be had, whether in Ireland or Germany, in France or Italy. Although it is well known that vast bodies of Europeans have been tempted by the golden promises of Federal agents to offer themselves as food for the powder and ball of Southern armies, yet hitherto these violations of the neutrality of foreign nations have been accomplished under the disguise, however transparent, of seeking for skilled artisans and workmen to take the place of native Americans who had gone into the army. Mr. Seward now proposes to take this job out of the hands of private speculators and secret agents, and to impose this duty upon the regularly appointed officials of his Government, acting directly under his orders, in compliance with the provisions of a law specially enacted for the attainment of the same purpose, but upon a much wider field. It may hereafter become a question of grave enquiry, how far the Governments of Europe may tolerate the establishment of such a universal system of recruiting for the Federal armies within their respective jurisdictions. While they may have hitherto winked at the violation of their own laws, as well as of the law of nations, on account of the alleged difficulty of procuring legal testimony, or because the character of the enlisted 'labourers' was such that their emigration, under such doubtful auspices, was regarded as a compensating advantage, yet their self-respect, if not their material interests, may suggest grave objections to the system when put into universal practice under the sanction of a general law enacted for that specific purpose. In whatever aspect the measure may be regarded by other nations, the fact that such a scheme has been thus solemnly inaugurated by the Government at Washington proves the desperate straits to which the United States are now reduced in the effort to fill up the fast melting ranks of their immense armies. Volunteering from patriotic considerations, high bounties to tempt the cupidity of the mercenary and the necessities of the poor, and forced conscription, have each in turn been tried, and all have failed to bring forth new victims for the slaughter-fields of the South in sufficient numbers to fill up the chasms made by wounds and death. Fanatical patriotism no longer animates the bosom of the citizen, and he will not volunteer. Cupidity finds a more extended field for successful enterprise than in the ranks of Federal armies. The poor prefer moderate wages and a quiet life at home to the most extravagant bounties and the highest monthly stipend as soldiers. The great body of the people have proven by a bloody resistance to Federal authority, both in New York and the great west, that they prefer to die in the effort to avoid the forced conscription, rather than incur the privations and hazards of the camp and the battle field. Within the limits of the Federal Union, it has been for a long time apparent to outside observers that the armies cannot be recruited by any means which may be devised. The measure now proposed by the Government to procure in foreign countries that which is no longer to be had at home for love or money, or even by coercion, is an admission of the fact that if the South is to be subdued at all, the task may only be achieved by the employment of mercenary hosts, enlisted in foreign lands. It is a humiliating confession of inability to perform the task they set out to accomplish, a grave imputation upon their manhood, and a virtual admission of an intrinsically bad cause.

If the proposition of the Government had stopped short with the proposal to transfer their recruiting agencies from America to Europe, it might possibly have been regarded as a simple enunciation of the fact that the United States were unable without foreign aid to carry out the gigantic war of subjugation in which for three weary years they have been so fruitlessly engaged. If nothing else had been proposed, it might have been regarded as a simple evidence of inability to achieve the purpose for which the war was inaugurated. But the last inducement offered to foreign adventurers to accept the terms of immigration proves as plainly as language can explain, that patriotic national pride no longer exists in the American heart, and that the once proud title of American citizenship is no longer regarded as of any value even by those whose American ancestry dates back through the first revolution to the days of Colonial dependence. The Government proposes that all Europeans without distinction, who will accept of a pre-paid passage to the United States—the money thus expended to be reimbursed by the labour of the immigrant—shall be at the end of a single year's residence endowed with all the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens born upon the soil of America. When we consider the probable character, quality, and qualifications of the class of Europeans who will be likely to accept the terms thus offered, we may well conceive that if Americans ever prized the title and the privileges of citizens of the Republic, both the title and the privileges have lost their value. Never before were the rights of citizenship held so cheap by any other people; never before were the citizens of a great nation willing to consider so insignificant a service as a full equivalent for the title and rank of citizen. When we look back to the days of know-nothing-ism, but a few brief years ago, when the States which now acknowledge allegiance to the Washington Government rose, almost as one man, against the laws which secured to foreigners the rights of citizenship only after the lapse of five years succeeding their formal application therefor, accompanied by a renunciation of all allegiance to any foreign potentate or State, we may well contrast that not distant past with the reality by which we are now confronted. Then they demanded that no foreigner should be invested with the sacred name of American citizen who had not resided for a period of twenty-one years within the limits of the Republic. The popular excitement in the North against foreign-born citizens and Roman Catholics was so great, that but for the united action of the Southern States in their behalf, it is difficult to decide what would have been the result of the popular clamour against them. Now, how all is changed! The released galley-slave, the Italian brigand, the ticket-of-leave man, the European adventurer, and the European criminal, have but to accept a free passage to the hospitable shores of the Model Republic, with a guarantee that within twelve months from the date of their arrival they may deposit their votes in that 'great palladium of liberty, the ballot-box,' and stand forth in all respects the peer of the descendants of the Washingtons, the Adamses, the Jeffersons, and the Madisons. Citizenship may possess a high value in the estimation of those who have not the right to claim it, yet it is quite clear that it is held at a marvellously cheap price by those who own and may bestow it.

Southern Independence and Northern Liberty.

No European observer, who is not rendered blind to facts and deaf to principles by his passionate admiration for the wisdom of President Lincoln and the chivalrous character of General Butler, can see without surprise the confidence with which the people of the Northern States have surrendered their liberties into the keeping of those statesmen and their associates, in the full belief that when the immediate necessity is over those liberties will be restored to them, and that the men who have so long enjoyed an absolute authority will contentedly sheath the sword red with blood not spilt on the field of battle, and retire into private life, as the equals and fellow-citizens of those whom they have persecuted without warrant of law and punished without pretence of trial. To those who look on from a distance, this belief seems unreasonable, if not absolutely irrational. The exact circumstances of America are not very well understood in Europe, and American prospects are consequently judged by the rules of historical experience. We know that hitherto no nation has found it possible to abdicate freedom at pleasure and resume it at will—that those who have once tasted the sweets of tyranny are seldom willing to resign it—that those who have long usurped a power beyond the law have not been in haste to yield to the law its rightful supremacy; and we are prone to believe that what has been will be again, and that the experience of the Old World will be repeated in the New. Americans know little of any history but their own, and are disposed to claim for themselves a superiority to the errors and an exemption from the dangers of less gifted nations. They conceive themselves favoured by Providence with an absolute immunity from the disasters which, in former instances, have always attended aggressive ambition and too extensive dominion; and as in former days they refused to believe that the Union could ever be shaken, and as now they believe that it cannot be finally destroyed, so they look forward less with hope than with certainty to the quiet resumption of those privileges which for the present they have been content to lay aside. They are confident that when the immediate peril which has induced them to permit the exercise of despotic power by the President has passed away, that despotism will cease of itself; or that if it do not, they will be able at any moment to re-enter on the enjoyment of their suspended rights, and put down the usurped authority which now exists only by their permission. It is this feeling which induces the people of the North to endure without remonstrance excesses of power as gross as those which twice provoked their English ancestors to open rebellion. They are content that during the war the Government should have the power of crushing domestic opposition; they are willing to give it every facility which it declares to be necessary for the efficient prosecution of its purposes; because they entertain no doubt that they are consenting not to an abrogation but to a suspension of liberty—are creating not a despot but a dictator.

It must be admitted that they have some reason for this opinion. The power which the Federal Government has exercised has rested undoubtedly upon the consent of a majority of the people, and, though enforced by military violence upon the minority, has not military strength for its foundation. Thus far, at least, the army could not be depended upon, if it were necessary to act against the people at large. It will support the Government, so long as the war lasts, against those who avow themselves, or who are alleged, to be opposed to the war. But it is not attached to the President, nor to any of the generals in whom he has confidence. They have done nothing to merit its attachment; they have not led it to glory, but to shame; under their guidance it has achieved no victories, it has reaped no laurels, it has sustained many defeats and endured much suffering. A general who has led a great army to victory, and whose successes have added subject provinces to the dominions of his country, may become dangerous to the commonwealth by his hold on the affections of the army; but no military tyranny can subsist on a foundation of disgrace and disaster in the field. Military despotism is not to be exercised by a President whose military administration has been incapable and unfortunate beyond all example, or by generals who have never won a pitched battle. If, when the war is over, either Mr. Lincoln or General Fremont were to attempt to perpetuate by force the system of government which has hitherto prevailed, he would probably find himself deserted even by the army. So far, therefore, as present circumstances may guide our anticipations of the future, it seems probable enough that the conclusion of peace will crumble to pieces the foundations of the usurped authority of the Federal Executive, and leave it perhaps weaker than ever. The army is sick of war, and is even now with difficulty held together. Peace would entitle the disgusted volunteers and discontented conscripts to their discharge, and nothing is less likely than that they would forego that right in order to sustain a Government which has deserved and incurred their indignation by its reckless waste of their lives, and their contempt by its unparalleled blundering. A Government without an army cannot send free citizens to prison without trial, or impose its own candidates on disaffected constituencies. Should President Lincoln, under such circumstances, escape impeachment, and succeed in retaining his office till the end of a second term, he would probably be the weakest, as he would certainly be the most unpopular, chief magistrate that has ever filled the seat of Washington.

It is not to be supposed that, after so long a period of suspended animation, liberty would prove to have suffered no injury, and would revive in the same vigour and perfection as in former days. The people have been accustomed to the sight of tyranny. They have ceased to consider the personal freedom of citizens as a right sacred and inviolable. They have learned to endure the spectacle of political persecution—to see opposition put down by force, and the dominant idea of the hour enforced on dissentients by martial law. They have seen statesmen of high repute imprisoned and banished for opinion's sake. They have become habituated to the presence of armed men at the polling booths. They have been taught to look with patience on such outrages as the arrest of a judge by order of a military officer, and the trial of civilians before a drumhead court-martial. The effect of lessons like these is not effaced by the mere overthrow of the Government that taught them. The political demoralisation which such scenes, enacted by Government, and witnessed with calmness or with approval by the people, inevitably produce, will not fail to bear fruit. Personal liberty is no longer inviolable; the majesty of the law has lost its sacred character; and we may look to see mobs exercising the right of proscription claimed at present by the Government, and lawless violence on the part of the people, proving that the example of lawlessness set by the Executive has not been thrown away. But it is probable that, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, the anticipations of the North may prove more correct than those of Europe, and that, the war once over, it may relapse into more than its former feebleness, and find its sphere of action more limited than ever. What else may happen—what possibility there may be of closer union or of further disruption—we need not now conjecture; we admit the probability that, when the Northern people are left to settle accounts with their Government, they will be able to recover from its hands the liberties they have hitherto been content to leave there.

But it is manifest that this is only possible because it is utterly impossible that they should achieve the end for which they have consented to forego the present enjoyment of liberty. It is defeat which has saved them from bondage; it is by the failure of their hopes that they have escaped from the dangers they rated so lightly. Had Mr. Lincoln been a skilful ruler—had he had the luck to find good generals and the honesty to support them—had Providence fought on the side of the heavier battalions, and the conquest of the South crowned the efforts of the Federal armies—what would have become of Northern liberty then? The Administration would have been enormously strengthened by the prestige of success, and the unthinking majority would have submitted cheerfully to the will of those who had accomplished its one ardent political wish, and restored, if not in constitutional integrity, yet in territorial extent, the long-idolised Union. The army would have been devoted to those who had led it to victory, and would with satisfaction and pride have remained under arms, glorying in its trade, and full of contempt for the civilians who had borne no share in its triumph. The maintenance of a great army would have been a matter of necessity. Every condition of the problem would have been different, every circumstance of the case would have been reversed, and the liberties of the North would have been placed at the mercy of those who had succeeded in crushing out the independence of the South. All the blood which the North has shed, all the sacrifices it has made, all the treasure it has wasted, have been directed to its own enslavement; and it is only because they have been spent in vain that the possibility of freedom still exists for those who have so ill deserved it. History often recalls to us the poet's warning anent rota Dis exaudita malignis; but never was Providence more gracious to an erring people than when in mercy He disappointed the aspirations of the North for the recovery of the Union.

It is strange that so few men in the North have seen, what has been patent to all Europe, that the conquest of the South, bringing with it the necessity of administering by martial law a subject country, would have been necessarily fatal to the Republican Constitution of the Free States. The truth would seem obvious enough; and yet we could count on our fingers the public men at the North who have understood it, and who have in almost every instance suffered captivity or exile for daring to be wiser than their fellows. Had it proved possible to subdue the South, how could she have been governed? The fiction of a Unionist party held down by Secessionist violence speedily disappeared; the fact of a small Unionist minority in certain localities also disappeared before the advance of the Federal marauders, and under the rule of Butlers, and Mitchells, and Turchins. If the South had yielded to superior force, the conquerors would have had to deal with two elements of difficulty and danger, either one of which would have sufficed to task their skill and strength to the uttermost. There would have been the Southern whites, resentful, desperate, full of the sense of unpardonable wrong and the bitterness of undeserved defeat, rebels to the core, and ready to raise the flag of rebellion on every hopeful occasion—a Poland to be ruled not by a Czar at the head of half a million of bayonets, but by the citizens of a Federal Republic. How could Republican institutions have been shaped to meet the necessity of such a situation as this? Then there would have been the negroes, entitled, by the promise of their conquerors, to a freedom for which they were totally unfitted, and, if freed, entitled to claim an impossible equality. How could they, with the President's proclamation fettering the discretion of the victors, have been retained in slavery? and yet what could have become of them as free and equal citizens of a Republic? Granting to the Abolitionist all his wildest assertions as to the perfectibility of the negro, and his capacity of becoming the equal of the white man, the present fact of an enormous and almost infinite inequality remains unquestionable; and to have forced on two races thus placed in close physical proximity, but at a vast moral distance from each other, that political equality which belongs to freemen under a Republican Constitution, would have been to insure endless misery for the negro and endless difficulties for the Government. To provide for the negroes, as to keep down the whites, an arbitrary Government with martial law would have been indispensable; and he must be thoroughly incredulous or thoroughly ignorant of all political philosophy and historical experience who conceives that one and the same Government could have performed the duties of a limited Federal Executive in one half of the territory of the Union, and of a military despotism in the other half. The conquest of the South would not only have enabled the Federal Government to make itself absolute, or rather to perpetuate its present absolutism, but would have made such a course imperative; and, as has always hitherto happened, in trampling out the independence of its foe the North would effectually have strangled its own liberty.

Nor would the people of the North have acquired, in the extension of their territorial dominion, any real compensation for the terrible sacrifice at which it would have been purchased. What do they want with an extended empire? To a nation which already possesses four or five times as much land as its present population can possibly cultivate, an extension of territory brings neither extended power, nor increased wealth, nor any other gratification than that of vanity. The North possesses abundance of land to employ and feed a population of a hundred millions; and this without anything like overcrowding, and without even bringing land of inferior quality into cultivation. Hitherto, its population has only followed the course of the great channels of water communication; nothing but the construction of railways is needed to open up for profitable cultivation lands quite as rich and as favourably situated as those which are at present occupied. And an industrious and prosperous population, settled between the lakes and the Ohio river, will necessarily form a more powerful nation than would the same numbers if spread over the continent from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. The loss of the Southern territory will diminish nothing of the splendour of that destiny to which the Yankees lay claim; it will not dim in the slightest degree the brightness of that future which so dazzles their eyes. They will still have a larger territory than they can subdue; more wealth than they can fairly and fully employ; room for a larger population than, probably, can conveniently dwell under the protection of a single Government. Their strength will be all the greater for its concentration; their prosperity all the surer for the confinement of their energies to a climate wherein the white man can work without injury and without competition. They lose nothing in losing Southern territory; if they have run the risk of losing their fair share of Southern trade, this is not because the South insisted on political severance, but because they chose to resist it—not because the Union is dissolved, but because they have chosen to place between themselves and their neighbours the remembrance of a cruel, wanton, and devastating war. The fact of vicinity, and the geographical position of the two countries, would secure to the North, if ever a good understanding should be established, a large and profitable trade with the South. More than this she ought not to ask; more than this, in substantial value, even absolute conquest could not give her.

BUTLER'S RULE AT NORFOLK.

We desire especially to direct the attention of the reader to the fact that the report of the Rev. Mr. Armstrong's examination, which we publish elsewhere, is General Butler's own report. We faithfully reprint it directly from the New Regime of March 29, the 'official journal of the Department,' edited by one Clark, a member of Butler's staff. It is evidently, therefore, the authorised version of a conversation in which Butler appears to have admired himself so much that he gave it to the world as his portrait, drawn by himself. The sequel of the story is told in the following order, which we cut out from the same journal:—

Head-Quarters, Provost-Marshal's Office,
District of Virginia, Norfolk, Va., March 9, 1864.

Owing to the vacancy of the pulpit of the Presbyterian church of this city, caused by the deposing of its late pastor, the Rev. James D. Armstrong, D.D., by the action of the Commanding General, the Rev. C. L. Woodworth, Chaplain of the 27th Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, will officiate as pastor until further orders. It is not doubted that the true loyalists of the congregation will approve of this change, and cheerfully co-operate in the usual services of the church. The church officials will continue on duty as usual in their respective spheres.

Chas. M. Whelden,
Lieutenant-Colonel and Provost-Marshal.

Approved,
By command of Brigadier-General Wild,
Geo. H. Johnston, A.A.G.

The episcopal authority of a Provost-Marshal can only be understood by reading the subjoined, of a somewhat earlier date:—

General Orders, No. 3.

Norfolk, Va., Feb. 11, 1864.

All places of public worship in Norfolk and Portsmouth are hereby placed under the control of the Provost-Marshals of Norfolk and Portsmouth respectively, who shall see the pulpits properly filled by displacing the present incumbents and substituting men of known loyalty and the same sectarian denomination, either military or civil, subject to the approval of the Commanding General.

They shall see that the churches are opened freely to all officers and soldiers (white or coloured) at the usual hours of worship, and at other times if desired, and they shall see that no insult or indignity be offered to them, by word, look, or gesture, on the part of the congregation.

The necessary expenses will be levied as far as possible, in accordance with the previous usages or regulations of each congregation.

No property shall be removed, either public or private, without permission from these head-quarters.

By command of Brigadier-General E. A. Wild.

Geo. H. Johnston,
Captain and Assistant Adjutant-General.
(Official)

Hanford Struble, Lieutenant and A.D.C.

While the Rev. J. D. Armstrong is put to hard work at Fort Hatteras, and the Rev. W. Wingfield is serving out his sentence (commuted from street-sweeping), the persecution of women and children continues. The wife and child of the last-named clergyman are kept alone in a house under an armed guard, are allowed no communication with any one, nor to leave the house under any pretext. Again, take the following from the Norfolk and Portsmouth Old Dominion, of March 11:—

Held as Hostages. Mrs. Murden and Mrs. Weeks, ladies of Elizabeth City, N.C., were brought to this city and committed to gaol, Saturday, to be held as hostages.

These ladies are wives of officers in the Confederate army, and are held as hostages for the return of certain negro soldiers captured by guerillas. Is there any precedent for this in modern warfare?

Where the General Orders and Provost-Marshal's Orders, which govern these unfortunate towns, are not absolutely brutal, they are sometimes ludicrously childish. Take the following:—

Provost-Marshal's Office,
Portsmouth, March 15, 1864.

Rev. Chas. E. W. Dobbs,
Court Street Baptist Church.

Sir,—On Sunday last, at the reading of the prayer in the morning service for the President of the United States, Mrs. Susan Williams, a member of the congregation, behaved in a very improper and disrespectful manner. Complaints were made at this office, and Mrs. Williams was arrested. She was released upon writing the enclosed humble apology, which you will please read from your pulpit for the benefit of the parties offended, and at the same time admonish the disloyal of your congregation that, hereafter, a mere apology will not atone for so grave an offence as that committed by Mrs. Williams.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
Daniel Messinger,
Provost-Marshal.

Wherewith follows the poor woman's apology, that 'she meant no disrespect to the minister who prayed, or to the President in authority, or to those in authority for whom he was praying.'

From an order for the disposal and relief of the poor, we extract the following:—

If any one, able to work, lacks a visible and honest means of support, and is desirous of living at an expense to the United States Government, such person is informed that street-paving, under guard, will be offered as a means of earning his daily bread honourably.

An order for the destruction of dogs may somewhat puzzle our readers. It reads:—

General Order, No. 6.

Norfolk, Va., March 7, 1864.

Let every fourth dog in this district be killed.

The Provost-Marshals of Norfolk and Portsmouth will see this order executed.

By command of Brig.-Gen. E. A. Wild,
George H. Johnston,
Captain and Assistant Adjutant-General.

Chas. M. Whelden,
Lieut.-Colonel and Provost-Marshal.

Still another, not less characteristic than the preceding, must for the present conclude our selection. Altogether, the file of dingy, dirty, ill-printed papers before us tells a tale of vulgarity and malignity such as, we venture to say, cannot be paralleled by any page in the records of tyranny.

Special Order, No. 75.—Extract.

Norfolk, Va., March 31, 1864.

Charles W. Butts, Attorney-at-Law, so called, having applied contemptuous and abusive language to me, and an officer of my staff, the Provost-Marshal of Portsmouth, and having used this means to undermine our authority, and to obstruct the Military Government of this district, can no longer remain within the limits of this command. Let him not be seen here later than eleven o'clock at noon of Sunday, April 3, 1864.

Edward A. Wild,
Brigadier-General Commanding.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York: April 12, 1864.

THE RED RIVER EXPEDITION—THE ENGAGEMENT AT CANE RIVER—COTTON STEALING—THE PROJECTED MOVEMENT AGAINST RICHMOND—THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION RESPECTING SLAVERY—THE OBJECTIONS TO IT—IT WOULD BE IMPOTENT—THE CURRENCY QUESTION—THE FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES OF THE GOVERNMENT—THE MONROE DOCTRINE—THE IMPORTANCE OF THE RESOLUTION OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—MR. SEWARD'S POLICY AND HIS CORRESPONDENCE WITH MR. DAYTON—HOW THE LINCOLN GOVERNMENT WILL ENDEAVOUR TO CONCILIATE THE PEOPLE—THE SERIOUS DILEMMA THAT IS INVOLVED.

We have conflicting accounts of the progress of the Red River expedition into the interior of Louisiana. Telegrams from Federal sources viâ Cairo and the land route have reported a battle on the 28th ult. at Cane River, a few miles beyond Alexandria, in which the Union troops achieved a decided success, and were pursuing the routed rebels. The direct accounts from New Orleans of April 2 do not confirm this. They agree that there had been a severe conflict, with great slaughter; but leave it doubtful whether the United States troops had made any advance. There are, on the contrary, rumours from Confederate sources that it was repulsed, and would have to turn back. [illegible] Orleans [illegible] of Confederate [illegible] the rear of the Federal [illegible] Federal steamboats from Alexandria [illegible] at Alexandria [illegible] night, from apprehension [illegible] federates. The [illegible] very small. [illegible] and the planters are completing the [illegible] ferring the total loss of the cotton [illegible] stolen by the Yankees. There is said to be a [illegible] the conduct of the army officers and the navy [illegible] expedition in the matter of cotton robbery. The army, having a crowd of civilian followers, with greenbacks and other facilities for converting cotton into currency, want the cotton tenderly dealt with, especially what is in the hands of such as may profess loyalty, that good speculations may be made out of the traffic in tears and in pardons. The navy are for [illegible] at once, without all this ceremoniousness. It is [illegible] policy, and not of principle [illegible] that a Southern man has no right to have anything of which he can be dispossessed by contrivance or force.

Commodore Farragut has withdrawn from the attack on Mobile, conceiving that it is not to be taken without the co-operation of a large land force, which it is not within the range of the present plans of campaign to give him.

The main interest of the war is concentrated in the projected movements of General Grant against Richmond. Not much faith can be put in plans of campaign [illegible] from Washington City. In half a dozen instances before, these have been shown to have been paraded with the design to deceive. But there are [illegible] in the movements of troops and preparations, which cannot be disguised, to make it extremely probable that it is the intention of General Grant to make a combined attack against Richmond in overwhelming force, by several columns at once, of which the main and strongest will be by way of the Peninsula, the old route selected by General M'Clellan, and rejected by the Administration until now overruled by the energetic disposition of the new Lieutenant-General, to whom the whole direction of the war is intrusted. The Confederates are evidently preparing for such a campaign, and are hopeful of successfully repelling it, as they did that of M'Clellan. The North seems to have great confidence in the military genius of General Grant, but he is not held in much estimation by the Southern Generals. They think him a good fighter, who has been favoured by fortunate accidents and the blunders of his adversaries, but that his star will pale before that of Lee, in whom the South has unlimited faith. They say at Richmond that Grant is destined to a greater defeat than M'Clellan, and a greater downfall than Pope, Burnside, or Hooker. There is a good omen in this confidence. Nevertheless, the friends of the South will hold their breath with intense anxiety for the issue when the mighty struggle commences.

In Congress they are legislating as though the victory were accomplished, the South at their mercy, and the power of the Union extended over all the Southern States. The Senate has just got through a long debate on the slavery question by adopting (38 to 6) a resolution proposing to the States an amendment of the Constitution for the immediate abolition of slavery. To make this amendment a part of the Constitution requires two-thirds of both Houses of Congress, and a ratification by three-fourths of the States. It is not certain that the House of Representatives will agree, because more than one-third may be of opinion that an amendment to the Constitution, adopted in time of war against ten or eleven States which are from any cause prevented from having any share in the decision, would be, if the Union is ever restored, a fraud and a robbery as to people of those States, loyal and disloyal alike; and, if the Union is not restored, a useless and senseless demonstration, which will have contributed to make the breach irreparable.

It is further a serious objection to many, that the amendment cannot be ratified without the sanctioning of the monstrous frauds and usurpations of the Executive in the creation of spurious States by military authority, to the destruction of the most important relations of the old States towards each other and towards the general Government. The number of States which will be required to ratify the amendment is 29, or is certain to be when the new Western territories are admitted, as they will be at the present session of Congress, making the whole number of States 38. The number of States represented in the Federal Congress is 25, and if they are unanimous in ratifying the amendment, with all the three new States, they will make only 28. So the design cannot by any possibility be effected without recognising and counting as a 'lawful State' at least one of the proconsular governments which Mr. Lincoln has set up, by the aid of his army, over a minority of the population in some subjugated district of a Southern State. There is no portion of the President's conduct in office against which the opposition within his own party is more decided than against the usurpation of the functions of a legislator in the attempt to recreate States out of the fragments of the subverted sovereignties of members of the old Union. There is so much discontent on that topic, and it blends itself so intimately with the opposition to Mr. Lincoln's plans for reelecting himself by those agencies, that I think it possible the scheme will be defeated in some way before it comes to the point where so momentous a question may depend on the formal recognition or peremptory exclusion of a State or States created in this way.

But, after all, it is a most absurd assumption that slavery in the Southern States is to be effectively abolished by a constitutional amendment which can have no possible effect until they are subjugated and the Federal jurisdiction is extended over them, which in the present aspect of things is a contingency so remote as to make the legislating on that the merest of political farces, and only serious as it involves the forcible destruction of slave rights in the border Slave States, which by force or choice adhered to the Northern side in this struggle, and are rewarded by being summarily despoiled of five hundred millions of property. In the South it will have no more effect than any other war measure which carries spoliation by the power of conquest, and will be as arrogant and as impotent as an amendment of the Constitution would be, authorising Congress to 'regulate the currency' by making greenbacks a legal tender in Europe.

This currency question is hourly growing more embarrassing to the Government. Greenbacks depreciate in comparison with gold, in spite of the devices and struggles of the Secretary, who is floundering through a circle of contrivances to keep up the credit of the Government, and at the same time multiplying [illegible] A Treasury [illegible] from Washington [illegible] The reliance of the Secretary [illegible] is on his authority to borrow and his power to issue more irredeemable paper. The resource [illegible] negotiating of the 10-40 loan for $200,000,000 [illegible] in the market at five per cent. interest payable in gold, the principal redeemable also in gold at any time, at the pleasure of the Government, after ten and before forty years. The necessity and the [illegible] of the Secretary are that, in the present relations of currency to gold, a five-per-cent. stock will not be readily taken up, and it has not been, even with the steady inflation going on for some time past. With gold ranging from 166 to 172, not more than three-fourths of a million are taken up daily, which is not one-third of the daily increase of the debt. On the other hand, an expansion of the currency, enough to float his loan, will be necessarily followed by a rise of prices, and an increase of the expenditure of the Government by many millions in all that it has to pay out, except for fixed salaries. Even if the whole loan should be taken, it would not be more than sufficient to discharge accrued obligations; and, at the best estimate, at the end of sixty days the Government will again be just where it is now, and the channels of circulation further swollen with a redundant paper money. The Secretary is bewildered with the prospect, and well he may be. There is no possible support for this fabric of public debt but immense and immediate taxation, and taxation which will be immensely and immediately productive, and Congress is evidently afraid to tax boldly, and doubtful whether any system can be devised which will not produce discontents and combinations to obstruct its operation, prove fatal to the political prospects of those who vote for it, and give the signal for agitations which may end in the repudiation of the debt.

If Grant meets with a reverse in this campaign, the whole fabric will cave in. If he has a success, it may last a while longer; but there is not such a success possible, within the range of calculations, as will save this Government from financial ruin, and the people from a fearful convulsion.

In the midst of these portents of internal troubles, the American Congress and people have suddenly roused themselves into excitement about their interests in Mexico. The Monroe doctrine, which has been quietly put aside, since the coming in of this Administration, as a dangerous subject to deal with before the war is over, has been forced into a prominent place by a resolution brought forward by a member from Maryland, and unanimously adopted by the House of Representatives, and hailed by journals of all classes as expressing the sentiments of the country, declaring that the American people do not consent to the recognition of an Empire in Mexico.

To understand the force of this declaration, it must be considered that in the American Government the House of Representatives has nothing to do with the relations towards foreign Powers. Communication with other Governments is exclusively an executive function. It was decided in the cases of the Panama mission instituted by Mr. Adams, and the Turkish mission instituted by General Jackson, that the President alone originates missions. He nominates all Ministers; the Senate has the power of approving or rejecting nominations, but not naming Ministers or originating missions.

But though the House resolution is theoretically a nullity as to foreign Governments, it is to be noted as a public fact to aid in the forming of an estimate of the value of public engagements, which depend ultimately for their execution on the power of public opinion over Administrations.

Mr. Seward's administration of the State Department is open to attack for having offended the popular sentiment. Immediately after commissioning Mr. Corwin to Mexico, he wrote to him (August 1861) to refrain from renewing the assurances given by the preceding Administration to Mexico, that the United States would support its nationality and independence against all foreign intervention. The pendency of Mr. Seward's little war with the South was the cause assigned for postponing the Monroe doctrine to a more convenient season.

'Prudence,' wrote Mr. Seward, 'requires that, in order to surmount the evils of faction at home, we should not unnecessarily provoke debates with foreign countries, but rather repair, as speedily as possible, the prestige which those evils have impaired.'

French intervention, of which Mr. Corwin warned Mr. Seward in vain, came soon after this, perhaps hastened by fuller developments of Mr. Seward's policy of abstention. The project of an Empire was next ventilated in the public journals, but Mr. Seward wrote that there was no danger of that. 'It had been discarded.' Finally, the Empire came, and during the whole of the series of events which ended there, Mr. Seward only put forth the Monroe doctrine and the American idea in the form of advice and suggestions to France, that it would be found 'neither easy nor desirable' to establish 'a permanent foreign or monarchical government' in Mexico; that the 'normal' state of Mexican opinion would be against it; that the people of the United States would be disturbed about it; and that it would, by political necessity, lead to unpleasant differences between France and the United States, and 'other' American republics: it 'would sow the seeds that might ripen into a collision.'

Notwithstanding these gentle expostulations, France went on, and the Empire became a fact. As events were hurrying it on, Mr. Seward, still very desirous not to come into collision with France while his domestic troubles lasted, further separated his Government from any specially American interest in Mexico, by directing Mr. Dayton to inform the French Cabinet that the United States claim no interest in Mexico more than in any other foreign nation at war.

He accordingly wrote on September 26, 1863, as follows:—

'The United States hold in regard to Mexico the same principles that they hold in regard to all other nations. They have neither a right nor a disposition to intervene by force in the internal affairs of Mexico, whether to establish or maintain a republic or even a domestic Government there, or to overthrow an imperial or a foreign one if Mexico chooses to establish or accept it.'

The French Cabinet seems to have wanted a more specific engagement, and propounded a distinct question to Mr. Dayton in a conversation held with him by M. Drouyn de Lhuys on October 8. The account of it was sent forward by Mr. Dayton to Mr. Seward on the 9th. It is worth noting that between the despatch of Mr. Seward, dated from Washington, September 26, and the conference with M. Drouyn de Lhuys at Paris, there is a space of but thirteen days—just the period for a quick arrival by mails—and the response is sent back the next day. Mr. Dayton reports:—

'M. Drouyn de Lhuys went on to say that the dangers of the Government of the Archduke would come principally from the United States, and the sooner we showed ourselves satisfied, and manifested a willingness to enter into peaceful relations with that Government, the sooner would France be ready to leave Mexico, which France would in any event do as soon as it with propriety could; but that it would not lead or tempt the Archduke into difficulty, and then desert him before his Government is settled. He added, France could not do that. He said that the early acknowledgment of that Government would tend to shorten, or perhaps to end, all the troublesome complications of France in that quarter.'

Mr. Seward was equally prompt in answering this despatch. The reply is dated October 23, just fourteen days afterwards. It is a renewal of the assurances that the United States have no objections on principle to the recognition of any Government that may be established in Mexico. He says:—

'The United States cannot anticipate the action of the people of Mexico, nor have they the least purpose or desire to interfere with their proceedings, or control or interfere with their free choice, or disturb them in the enjoyment of whatever institutions of government they may, in the exercise of an absolute freedom, establish.'

In respect to the specific recognition asked for Maximilian as an indispensable condition, without which France cannot leave Mexico, Mr. Seward simply replies, not yet, because the war was not yet ended in the subversion of the former Government; and for this reason 'the United States are not at liberty to consider the question of recognising a Government which in the further chances of war may come into its place.' But he concludes thus:—

'The United States, consistently with their principles, cannot do otherwise than leave the destinies of Mexico to the keeping of its own people, and recognise their sovereignty and independence in whatever form they themselves shall choose that this sovereignty and independence shall be manifested.'

This rapid interchange of notes, two being interchanged each way at intervals of only fourteen days for each, shows the importance assigned to the understanding which was desired by both sides. It is perfectly plain that Mr. Seward renounced all ground of opposition to the establishment of a monarchical Government by foreign interference, except as to the question of the time when it should be considered to be actually established.

In this position of affairs, the popular branch of Congress, transcending its proper functions as a branch of the Government, pronounces, by a unanimous vote, that the recognition of an Empire in Mexico is not in accordance with the sentiments of the people. The declaration was moved by Mr. N. Winter Davis, of Maryland, a violent partisan of war and abolition, but a very decided adversary of Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward. It contains an unquestionable vote of censure on the position to which Mr. Seward has advanced in the question, and adroitly took hold of a popular passion so successfully that the only course left for the friends of Mr. Lincoln to adopt was to join heartily in the enunciation of the principle, and look subsequently for the means of averting its consequences from the heads of the President and Secretary. The ready expedients are to insist that Mr. Seward has only meant to temporise and stave off collision until the civil war is terminated and the United States are in a condition to resume their old position; and that, in reserving the question whether and when the Empire is sufficiently established to be entitled to be recognised, Mr. Seward covered enough ground to keep the control of the matter in his own hands. In confirmation of this view it is now said that Mr. Seward has made haste to caution Mr. Dayton not to give the French Government any assurance of the recognition of Maximilian.

There is in all this very serious consequences, which the promoters of this movement did not seriously consider. The popular branch of Congress has been hurried into a formal declaration that the condition on which alone the French Government rests the security of the Government of Maximilian from the hostility of the United States, without which security France cannot quit Mexico, will not be accepted by the American people. The Administration shrinks before the national manifestation, and if it did not, and should have the hardihood to exercise the constitutional functions of recognising the Empire, it could no longer be accepted as a measure of peace, or satisfactory evidence that the Empire is safe from United States hostilities. I am at a loss to conjecture how Mr. Seward is to make his peace with the Emperor, or to divert that sagacious monarch from taking the steps which he may think necessary to put the barrier of a friendly people between the threatened Mexican Government and the menacing North.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

New Orleans, Louisiana: April 2, 1864.

INFAMOUS TREATMENT OF MRS. DARLING—THE DEFENCES OF MOBILE—SHERMAN'S EXPEDITION—NO COTTON OBTAINED FROM THE RED RIVER REGION—ELECTION OF DELEGATES FOR A 'FREE STATE CONVENTION'—ESCAPE OF CONFEDERATE OFFICERS FROM FEDERAL PRISONS—THE 'DEFENDERS OF THE MONROE DOCTRINE.'

Many of your English readers must be familiar with the name of General Darling, a gallant Englishman who was killed at the battle of Murfreesboro, where he commanded a brigade in General Bragg's army. Though not bred to the profession of arms, he showed rare fitness for command, and his advancement, which was rapid, was owing solely to his distinguished services. He was colonel of the 5th Confederate States (Regulars) Regiment, but at the time of his death held the rank of Brevet Brigadier-General. Though he offered up his life for the Confederate cause, General Darling did not (so I am informed) throw off his allegiance to the British Crown. The widow of this brave and high-souled Briton has been a prisoner in New Orleans for the last three months. It may seem singular that this lady should have been held in durance for so long a period. It will appear still more singular—if any act of capricious tyranny could by this time excite our special wonder—when it is known that Mrs. Darling was deprived of her personal liberty without any process of law, martial or municipal, and that, too, after having purged herself of every taint of suspicion, and taken the so-called alien oath of neutrality. Mrs. Darling arrived here from Mobile December 14, 1863, in a schooner sailing under a United States flag of truce. The schooner was, of course, under the command of Federal officers, so the coming of Mrs. Darling and some half-dozen other passengers was necessarily by consent of the officers. Upon their arrival here the passengers were sent to prison, whence they were taken the next day before a military commission composed of two colonels and a major. Contrary to any warrant or authority—except that of military despotism—and without any explanation, this commission put Mrs. Darling upon her oath, and then demanded that she should reveal all she knew regarding the defences of Mobile, the condition and location of the Confederate armies—in short, everything she knew respecting the 'rebellion' that might be of interest to the enemy. To impose an oath under such conditions and for such purposes was treacherous and base. The commission knew that Mrs. Darling's Confederate passport pledged her in honour not to tell anything she knew respecting the very matters about which they were questioning her; and their respect for plighted faith must be small if they supposed that the oath which they surprised their prisoner into taking absolved her from the prior and equally binding parole of honour. Had they succeeded, I suppose they would have spoken of it as a 'smart Yankee trick.' Mrs. Darling adhered to the obligations of her passport, and declined to answer the questions of the commission. She, however, concealed nothing respecting herself and her object in coming to New Orleans, which was to take passage for Liverpool viâ New York, and, when asked, readily subscribed to the 'alien oath of neutrality.' It is in these terms:—

'I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that so long as my Government remains at peace with the United States, I will do no act, or consent that any be done, or conceal any that has been or is about to be, that shall aid or comfort any of the enemies or opposers of the United States whatever.'

Though she subscribed without hesitation to the above oath, she was sent back to prison, but the other prisoners were discharged. Mrs. Darling concluded there must be some mistake on the part of the guard in reconveying her to prison, and after much expostulation induced her gaoler to enlarge her prison bounds to the St. Charles Hotel. She had been at the hotel but a few hours when she was again arrested, and taken before Colonel Beckwith, then acting as Provost-Marshal of the city. The colonel, who is an officer of the old army, and, it might be added, ipso facto a gentleman, received Mrs. Darling with much courtesy, and upon being told of her examination before the military commission, and of her having taken the 'alien oath,' promptly ordered her release, and expressed his regret for having caused her arrest. But Mrs. Darling had not yet escaped the clutches of the military power. On the following day she was taken by a military guard to the office of General Bowen, Provost-Marshal-General of the Department of the Gulf. Here she was kept standing, while one of General Bowen's staff insisted upon a cross-examination, which he conducted in a style exceedingly rude, if not positively insulting. He wanted to know 'what she came to New Orleans for, anyhow.' 'Was she sure her husband was dead?' Was she 'the woman that trunk belonged to?' (pointing to one of Mrs. Darling's trunks, all of which were still kept from her). He continued in just such a strain as this, asking many other equally irrelevant and heartless questions relative to the gallant dead, when his chief, General Bowen, entered and directed that Mrs. Darling be turned over ('turn her over' was his expression) to Major Porter. Bowen was one of the Commissioners of the New York City (Metropolitan) Police, and when Superintendent Kennedy was on trial, before the Board of Commissioners, for his outrageous treatment of Mrs. Brinsmade, the General was understood to defend his course, and was one of the majority who voted for and succeeded in effecting his acquittal. Mrs. Darling was accordingly 'turned over to Major Porter,' and ordered to report to him daily until further notice. She called upon General Banks and demanded her release or the reasons for her detention, but in vain. The General talked vaguely about her having travelled to Mobile in company with President Davis; of her 'rebel sympathies and superior intelligence,' and consequent 'dangerous character;' of her intention to be in Liverpool early in January, of the urgent necessity for the same, as was learned from one of her letters, and of his suspicions that her going to Liverpool had some connection with the Laird rams; and, finally, that in his judgment Mrs. Darling should be detained in New Orleans until her news or instructions for the rebels abroad should become stale and profitless—three months, he thought, would not be too long. And so for three months Mrs. Darling was kept here as a paroled prisoner, defraying her own expenses at the hotel, and reporting herself daily at the office of Major Porter, of the 8th New York Regiment. Most of General Banks's charges were so silly as to need no reply. But as to the Laird rams, he was assured that her going to England and the necessity for her being there early in January was solely to attend to her private affairs, particularly a lawsuit, involving property to the amount of $25,000, which was to be decided about the period referred to.

I cannot conjecture how General Banks can justify the detention of this lady and the retention of all her papers, including even a journal of her private affairs. It is said that Mrs. Darling intends to lay her case before Lord Lyons, with a demand for indemnity of pecuniary losses. Though a prisoner, she was obliged to pay her expenses at the hotel during her three months' detention, and the lawsuit was decided against her owing to her non-appearance, as Mrs. Darling learned by a letter she received here last week. This hapless lady left New Orleans for New York some days ago, and is at length free from the capricious and absolute despotism that reigns in the department of the Gulf. Before leaving, she showed General Banks the letter which announced the result of the lawsuit. The General, who is remarkable for his lip-service, expressed much regret, and declared that, had he known the real object of Mrs. Darling's return to England, he would not have prevented her departure. But he did know, and this excuse is an after-thought that cannot extenuate his arbitrary conduct.

Farragut makes but slow, if any, progress in his attack upon the water defences of Mobile. He has not yet tried his guns upon Fort Morgan or Gaines, and the regular bombardment of Fort Powell has ceased for the present. The Admiral is waiting for the ironclads, but I believe none of those promised him are ready for sea. We have a report from the fleet that the ram Tennessee, the most powerful of the Mobile ironclads, sank near Grant's Pass on the 1st ult. It is said that the day was boisterous, and 'that a squall struck her, and she, being very low in the water, heeled over and went down. Two feet of her smoke-stack can now be seen above the water where the great ram once lay at anchor.' The letter conveying this intelligence, and from which I have quoted the above, is of the date of the 20th ult., and is published in one of the 'loyal' city journals—two circumstances that throw a doubt upon the correctness of this report. Complete files of Mobile papers, from the 1st to the 18th ult., have been received here, but no mention is made by them of this disaster. It is possible that a steamboat or other craft may have gone down during a squall, and the Yankees, with that quick credulity which shows when the wish is father to the thought, jumped to the conclusion that the sunken craft was their dread antagonist, the 'rebel ram Tennessee.' Even if the Tennessee is gone down, she can easily be raised.

It is stated that there is some apprehension among the officers of Farragut's fleet that the enemy will use means to sink or destroy some of their vessels by torpedoes. The famous Davis, the pilot, who made the attempt to blow up the Ironsides, is said to be in Mobile at present, and his presence there may create these fears and bode some mischief. In order to prevent a surprise, the watch is doubled at dusk, and continues, with occasional relief, till dawn. Reflectors light the stream for some distance, to prevent the approach of any dangerous missile from the enemy.

We have no news of the operations along Red River other than that from the Federal head-quarters. Past experience teaches us how to interpret Federal war-bulletins.

All the troops that could be spared from Texas, New Orleans, and the Attakapas county (Louisiana), together with 10,000 men from Sherman's command, are now up Red River, the whole under command of Banks. Porter's Mississippi (river) squadron of gunboats is cooperating with the army, the boats of lightest draught having succeeded in getting over the shoals at Alexandria. One of the Federal transports was wrecked in endeavouring to get over the shoals. The Confederate cavalry are still active in the neighbourhood of Alexandria. The evening papers yesterday gave reports of a battle having been fought thirty-five miles above Alexandria on the 28th ult. Of course the 'rebels were routed.' These reports are given on the authority of the officers of a steamboat from Alexandria But the same officers tell to others a very different story; and it is very generally reported and believed that the Federal army was defeated and driven back to Alexandria with a loss of 800 killed and wounded. We are in telegraphic communication with Alexandria, and if a Federal victory had been achieved on Monday or Tuesday, we should have been told it before Friday, April 1.

This 'Union victory' looks very like a joke of the season. We are receiving no cotton from the Red River region. Letters received here from officers of Banks's army say the people burn their cotton as the army advances. As there is no cotton to be had, it is probable the expedition may soon return.

The second act in the Restoration farce—the election of delegates to a 'Free State Convention'—came off on Monday last. The candidates elected, with one exception, merit no consideration either socially or politically. They might as well aspire to seats in the House of Commons as pretend to represent the people of Louisiana. How then shall we characterise the high crime of these men in attempting to mould the social and political institutions of the whole State for generations to come? It will prove a barren fraud, and so let it pass. Since March 4 seventy-five Confederates, nearly all of whom were officers, have escaped from the Federal prisons in this city. This is a good offset for the escapes from Libby Prison. The French brig Marie Félicité, Captain Babardy, from Havre, January 25, was wrecked near the Grand Gosier Island off Pass-a-l'outre, on the night of the 24th ult. The vessel and cargo are a total loss; the passengers were saved. The remains of the late Lieutenant Thomas Gibbes Morgan, who died while a prisoner on Johnson's Island, have been brought to Baton Rouge for interment. He was a member of a well-known Louisiana family. A large number of British subjects, the crews of captured blockade-runners, are in prison here, and are likely to remain in durance. The acting British Consul, Mr. Coppell, declines to take any interest in their fate. The military authorities continue to seize the negroes for labour on the plantations. If the negro is now a 'freedman, a man, and a brother,' why seize him like an escaped convict, and force him to labour? A new secret order, called Defenders of the Monroe Doctrine, has been established here. It has the support of numbers of General Banks's officers, and its primary aim is the overthrow of the French arms in Mexico. As was anticipated in a previous letter, the Confederate authorities have refused to receive Mr. Demegre within their lines. Even were Mr. Demegre a welcome guest, the Confederates would, as in the case of Mr. Vallandigham, decline to allow their territory to be made a Cayenne for the victims of Yankee tyranny.

PARIS TOPICS.

Paris: April 26.

Public opinion in France begins to grow, I will not say threatening, for France has a serene contempt for petty annoyances, but at least cross, on the subject of the resolutions of the Northern Congress against the Mexican Empire. The blind self-sufficiency of the impotent fraction of a Union which was powerful in its day, will not do that which diplomacy has failed to do. The news of the protest of the Congress against the establishment of the Mexican Empire was received here with a shout of derision. The only effect of the resolutions has been to increase the feeling of ill-will towards the United States, which has in the last two years made progress in some classes of French society. 'The Moniteur of this morning announces the Senate's decision as having been taken 'in conformity with the desire of the Government.' The harmonious relations of Washington with the Tuileries have not been interrupted by an incident which Mr. Lincoln has turned to good account by seizing the opportunity thus offered him to prove his friendly feeling for France.

While London has been vying with New York in demonstrations of enthusiasm, as the late Mr. Braham, teste Byron, used to say, the French press has been sparing neither of praise nor blame, as they saw in the honours paid to the Italian condottiero the voluntary homage of a free people to a hero of liberty, or the flunkeyism of a great aristocracy confiscating the newest lion to their own profit, and then sending him back to his island. The Pays has a capital story suggested by the Garibaldi reception, which, from internal evidence, has every appearance of being only a story; and, as it may therefore be new to your readers, though its scene is supposed to be in England, I shall transcribe it with abridgment. In the reign of George IV., the King of the Sandwich Islands sent an embassy to salute the Majesty of England. The members of the embassy were in due course presented at the English Court, on which occasion they performed their most complimentary dances. On their return to their hotel, they found a gentleman in irreproachable black, with white tie, waiting for them. He had come to explain to them the Parliamentary system, and how in England kings reign but do not govern. The real sovereign of Great Britain is the English people, and in a word he recommended that, having visited His Majesty the King, they should now pay their court to their Majesties the electors. So the ambassadors, edified as to their duties, suffered themselves to be conducted to a great room which was crammed with miscellaneous royalties. Here the gentleman with the white tie respectfully requested that, in accordance with the Court etiquette of the Sandwich Islands, they would perform their national dance; after which he reconducted them to their hotel, announcing that a fresh batch of the electoral body would receive them the next day. This went on for a fortnight, till at length the ambassadors, tired above all by the insolent familiarity of the public, complained to Sir Robert Peel, who, on making enquiries, learned that their Excellencies had been made a show of by the gentleman with the white tie, 'whose name it was Barnum.' The Pays then goes on to say that even so Garibaldi was shown for money as a 'great attraction' at the Crystal Palace—the most colossal success, as the money-taker is said to have asserted, since Blondin. Why was there only one representation? The story is capitally told in the Pays.

The proceedings of the Conference are looked to rather with curiosity than interest, for the general impression here is that nothing will come of it unless it be transformed into a general congress. There are many who still flatter themselves that this will be its dénouement, but, though it be the wish, it is not the expectation of the greater number. The general feeling is very strongly against Prussia, but there is as little inclination to interfere by force of arms in favour of Denmark on this side of the Channel as among the governing powers in England. Some of the papers go so far as to warn the Government against entering into any engagement of this sort, certain as it would be to find itself at the last moment left in the lurch by Great Britain. The Russell Administration of Foreign Affairs has brought things to such a pass, that the alliance of England is now as much dreaded as it once was sought after.

The fluctuations of the last ten days in the French money market are by no means to be accepted as indicating any political event. Since the measure taken some four or five years ago by which the outside speculation, the free trade in speculation, was put a stop to by the suppression of the coulissiers, the Bourse has become the champ clos in which the two rival parties in finance fight it out at the cost of the general public. There is always a compact phalanx ready to attack every great project brought out by the opposite party, and thus the Mexican loan has furnished the occasion for a display of all the worst characteristics of the Bourse. The fluctuations of the French Bourse are no longer determined by any cause appreciable by the world at large. At this moment the best informed are equally in the dark as to the issue of the present struggle between bulls and bears; and the startling fluctuations of the last few days convey only one moral, which points to their utter insignificance as a barometer of public opinion.

AN APOLOGY FOR FORGERY.

The only reference to the fact that the 'Report of Mr. Mallory' is a forgery, yet made by the journal which first reproduced the Report in England, is sufficiently curious to be placed on record. Assuredly it is a most ingenious attempt to distil precious medicine from noisome weeds. We copy from the Daily News of 22nd inst.:—

THE FORGED REPORT OF THE CONFEDERATE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

To the Editor of the Daily News.

Sir,—It appears certain that the alleged report of the Confederate Secretary of the Navy is a forgery. No words of course can be too strong to express the criminality of such an imposture, or the amount of damage which it does to the cause which it was intended to serve. But the yell of exultation which is raised by the enemies of America here, as though the mendacity of the American Government and nation and the untrustworthiness of everything that emanates from them stood confessed at last, though not unnatural, is entirely misplaced.

The American nation must be judged, at the present moment, not by the standard of peaceful times, when the moral perceptions of men are undisturbed, but by the standard of civil war, when all that is most violent, basest, most insane in human passions is stirred up from its depths, at the same time that the higher qualities, at least a certain class of them, are manifested perhaps with more intensity than ever. That was, in effect, a civil war, of which the greatest observer of antiquity said that it changed the moral vocabulary of Greece, and made innocence mean crime and crime innocence where party was concerned. Under such circumstances the acts of depraved or infuriated men are by no means to be taken, without further evidence, as tests of the character, much less of the ordinary character, of nations.

Let us look at the period of our own history which bears the closest analogy to the present crisis in America. The famous 'Icon Basilike' is unquestionably a forgery, committed for the obvious party purpose of stirring up the feelings of the nation in favour of the Royal Martyr. It was the work, in all probability, of an ecclesiastic of some eminence, who afterwards founded on it a claim for reward. It had great currency and produced great effect. The proclamation which purported to emanate from the exiled court of Charles the Second, offering rewards and honours for the assassination of the Protector, was also, in all probability, a forgery, in the genuineness of which, notwithstanding, both parties seem to have believed. These forgeries, committed by unscrupulous partisans, and rendered current by the public excitement, do not throw any doubt in the eyes of historians on the veracity of the authentic state papers of the period, or cause us to mistrust the official accounts of Naseby and Worcester. Much less do they lead us to set down the English as a nation of habitual liars.

After all, though the authenticity of the report is denied by the Confederate Government, the destination of the vessels in the Mersey, the only charge to which, so far as appears, it was the object of the forger to give currency, remains undenied, and rather receives confirmation from having been so pointedly brought under the notice of the Confederates, and allowed by them to pass without repudiation.—I am, &c.,

CATHOLIC CHURCHES BURNT BY NORTHERN TROOPS.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—A statement made in the second column of the first page of the last Index, relative to the immunity enjoyed by 'Catholic churches' from destruction at the hands of the Northern army is not quite correct.

You can scarcely have forgotten the burning of the Roman Catholic churches at Jacksonville, Florida, Jackson, Mississippi, Frederick, Missouri, and a dozen others, by Northern troops during the progress of the war.

Yours, &c.,
A Priest.

PORTRAIT OF GENERAL BUTLER, DRAWN BY HIMSELF.

THE EXAMINATION OF REV. W. ARMSTRONG.

[The subjoined appears, precisely as here given, in the Portsmouth New Regime, of March 29. The New Regime styles itself 'the Official Journal of the Department' of Major-General Butler, and is edited by a member of his staff.]

General. I have read a report, Mr. Armstrong, of an examination of yourself, by one of my aides-de-camp, in regard to the question of your loyalty. Now I need not say to a man as experienced as yourself, that taking the oath of allegiance is only a manifestation of loyalty—that as a man might join your church and still be a very bad man after so doing, so a man may take the oath of allegiance and still be a very disloyal man.—Rev. Mr. A. If you will allow me to make a statement to you, I will do so, or I will answer such questions as you please.

General. Make your own statement, sir.—Mr. A. The view with which I took the oath was this: I believe the Military Commander has a right to demand of the citizens at any time that they shall take a parole. I regard Norfolk as for the present a conquered city; indeed, I have had no idea that the Confederates would again take it, and that if it ever again did become a part of Virginia, it would be by treaty at the end of the war. I wished to act in accordance with the scriptural injunctions, to obey 'the powers that be,' and I believed the United States to be 'the powers that be.' I took the oath with the intention of keeping it so far as my actions were concerned. My feelings, of course, I cannot control. My words and actions I can.

General. That brings me, sir, to a matter to which I wish to call your careful attention. Your unrevealed thoughts I can only get by asking questions. Now, sir, I want to ask you a few questions. Did you in any way advise, consult with, or give any information to Mrs. McIntosh in relation to selling any property in Norfolk?—Mr. A. Not that I recollect.

General. Let me try and quicken your recollection a little. You know her?—Mr. A. Yes, sir.

General. She is a sister of Captain McIntosh of the so-called Confederate States Navy?—Mr. A. His wife; she is a member of my church. She was about selling her property.

General. Wait one moment. Don't you remember whether you advised her about selling it in any way?—Mr. A. I talked with her. I don't recollect what I said. I believe there was a conversation about her selling her property and removing to Baltimore,—no, not about selling her property. She told me, as her pastor, that she was going to remove to Baltimore.

General. Did you then and there say to her, that she had better not remove or sell her property, because the Confederates would soon have the city of Norfolk, and her property would then be worth more, or words to that effect? Answer me that question, now, without mental reservation or equivocation.—Mr. A. No, sir. I urged her not to go away from Norfolk, on account of her church.

General. Did you say anything like it?—Mr. A. No, sir.

General. Did you say anything as to the time when you thought the Confederates would have Norfolk?—Mr. A. No, sir.

General. Anything of the sort?—Mr. A. No, sir.

General. Well, sir, you may proceed. I will hear the rest of your statement.—Mr. A. Well, in conducting the exercises of the sanctuary, I have read the prayer that was asked before the war, with the addition of a prayer for peace.

General. You pray that God would sustain all rightful authority, or words to that effect?—Mr. A. No, sir. I have not made that prayer for eighteen months.

General. You pray for the authorities?—Mr. A. I pray for the authorities over us; and I publicly explained to my congregation that, in so doing, we were praying for the President of the United States.

General. Do your people so understand it?—Mr. A. They do. I have publicly explained it.

General. Have you, since taking the oath of allegiance, or at any other time, checked one of the members of your congregation when he was praying for the President?—Mr. A. Have I checked them?

General. Chided them in any way or form of words?—Mr. A. No, that I recollect.

General. I beg your pardon, sir; it is not a matter of recollection. It is a thing you cannot forget.—Mr. A. No, sir.

General. Did not one of the members of your congregation pray for the President of the United States, and did not you say that it had better not be done; that there were two parties to please here?—Mr. A. Never, sir.

General. Nothing of the sort?—Mr. A. Nothing of the sort.

General. I perceive that in your former examination you declined answering this question: 'Do you call yourself a loyal man in letter and spirit to-day?'—Mr. A. I do not decline to answer now. If I were to put my own interpretation upon it, I should say I am; but I don't know, sir.

General. Well, sir, perhaps I can teach you. Now, sir, what is the name of that gentleman who had taken the oath, and, while coming out of the Custom House with you, made the remark that he 'would like to spit upon the Northern Yankees?'—Mr. A. Mr. Charles Reid. I declined to answer on my former examination because I had not his consent to tell, sir; but since then I have seen him, and he has given me his consent to mention his name.

General. Where is Mr. Reid?—Mr. A. He is in Norfolk.

General. (To an Aide.) Telegraph to Colonel Whelden (Provost-Marshal, Norfolk), to arrest Mr. Charles Reid and send him here. He lives on Main Street.

General. He stated that as he came out from taking the oath?—Mr. A. Yes, sir.

General. With the oath fresh on his lips and the words hardly dry in his mouth, he said he 'wanted to spit in the face of the Northern Yankees?'—Mr. A. Well, General, he took it with the same view as I did.

General. I agree to that, sir.—Mr. A. I meant to say——

General. Stop, sir. I don't like to be insulted. You said, sir, that that infernal Secessionist wanted to spit in the faces of loyal men of this Union, and that you took the oath with the same view as he did, or rather he took it with the same view that you did—it makes no difference which. I agree, sir, that you did. I have treated you, sir, during this interview, with propriety and courtesy up to this moment, and yet you, sir, here tell me, in order to clear this vile wretch who shall be punished as he deserves, that you took the oath to my Government with the same view that he did. Mr. A.—Well, sir, it was a mortifying fact to confess that we were a conquered people; and it was the irritation growing out of that fact.

General. You have not helped it, sir. You had better not go on in that direction any further, sir, for your own sake. Now, sir, while you did preach a very virulent sermon upon 'The Victory of Manassas,' at the recommendation of the Confederate Congress, have you ever since preached in your pulpit a sermon favourable to the Union cause, or one that would be likely to please the loyal and displease the disloyal?—Mr. A. No, sir, I never have.

General. You have said you 'do not think this a wicked rebellion.' Do you still hold to that opinion?—Mr. A. Yes, sir.

General. You have not opened your church upon any of the days recommended by the authorities. I want a more explicit answer, sir, than you have given previously. You know whether you have or not. How is it?—Mr. A. I should have to answer, sir, that I did. There were prayer-meetings held in the church. No addresses were made. There was a prayer for peace.

General. You said you 'would not willingly open your church to any recognised minister of the Gospel from such denominations as before the war you would have exchanged with, did you know he would pray for the Union, and against the rebels'?—Mr. A. Yes, sir.

General. You said you looked upon the hanging of John Brown as just and right because he interfered with the peace of the country?—Mr. A. Yes, sir.

General. Very good, sir. Now, then, would you look upon the hanging of the prominent rebels, Jefferson Davis for instance, as just and right? You know the rebels have interfered with the peace of the country and have caused rivers of blood to flow where John Brown only caused pints. What do you say to that?—Mr. A. I would not, sir.

General. Are your sympathies with the Union or the Confederate cause?—Mr. A. With the Confederates.

General. You do not think that Davis, Wigfall, Slidell, and their former colleagues are traitors, and you do think that if they so desired they should again resume their seats in Congress?—Mr. A. I don't think they are traitors. I don't see why they should not again take their seats in Congress.

General. I don't see, sir, what good the oath has been to you.—Mr. A. I thought the oath was an oath of amnesty.

General. You took the oath, sir, for the purpose of having the United States protect you, while you should by your conduct and your life aid and comfort the rebels. It is an oath of amnesty to those who take it in truth, and come back repentant to the United States. You are a Presbyterian. A man comes to you; you are about to take him into communion. You say to him, 'You have heretofore been a wicked man?' He says, 'Yes, sir.' You ask him if he has experienced a change of heart. He says, 'No, sir.' You ask, 'Are your sympathies with us or with the devil?' He says, 'The devil.' You ask, 'Which would you like to have prevail in this world, God or the devil?' He says, 'The devil.' You ask, 'Where are your friends?' He says, 'With the devil.' Then you ask him, 'Do you think you can join the church with your present feelings?' He replies, 'I think I can, to get the bread and wine at the altar.' Think of it, sir, anywhere else, and as a man of Christian professions, saying nothing of Christian practice. I call upon you to think of it. Sworn to be loyal and true to the United States, here you are with your sympathies against them. You, sir, are a perjured man in the sight of God. It is an oath of amnesty to those who truly repent, precisely as Christ shed his blood for those who repent, but not for those who would crucify him afresh. For you, sir, it was not an oath of amnesty. I should be just as wrong in receiving you, sir, as a loyal man, as you would in receiving such a man as I have described into your church. (To an Aide.) Make an order that this man be committed to the guardhouse, in close confinement, there to remain until he can be consigned to Fort Hatteras, there to be kept in solitary confinement until further orders; and send a copy of this examination to the officer in command there.

OUTRAGE ON A BRITISH SUBJECT.

(From the Times, New York Correspondent.)

It appears that on the 21st of March, 1863, a British blockade-runner, the steamer Nicholas I., was captured off Wilmington, North Carolina, by the United States' gunboat Victoria, taken charge of by a Lieutenant Ivison, or Everson, of that vessel, and a prize crew, and ordered to New York for adjudication. One of the firemen on board, named James O'Neill, 45 years of age, a native of Dublin and a British subject, was asked by the chief engineer of the captor to volunteer to work as fireman, or rather to continue to work as fireman, till the prize reached New York, and promised wages at the rate of a dollar and a half a day. O'Neill consented, and the engineer having been ordered to get up steam about ten o'clock on the morning of the capture, he worked until two o'clock, under the superintendence of a first-class fireman, named Gurdon, sent on board from the Victoria. At that time the prize was brought to anchor off Wilmington, and O'Neill stepping to the ventilator to cool himself, told Gurdon that quantities of gunpowder and salt were stowed in the bows of the vessel, and that it would be advisable to inform Lieutenant Everson of the fact, in case any of the crew should be careless in smoking or in going about with lights. Gurdon was of the same opinion, and left O'Neill below while he reported the circumstance to the officer. In a few minutes Lieutenant Everson made his appearance, drunk, and wildly excited, and seeing O'Neill called out to him to keep back, or he would shoot him. O'Neill had no time to reply before the Lieutenant discharged a pistol at him, the ball from which entered the left thigh, severing one of the arteries. Gurdon indignantly remonstrated with the Lieutenant for shooting a man who had been working hard and doing good service, but the Lieutenant made no other remark than 'It's all right,' and left the man to his fate. By Gurdon's promptitude and care the wound was bound up till the surgeon arrived. O'Neill had fainted from loss of blood, and was taken on deck. A tourniquet was applied, and he was removed on board the Victoria. After remaining there for five days he was sent to Fortress Monroe, and thence to the hospital at Norfolk, where he was subjected to the painful operation of having the artery tied, and lay upon his back helpless for 62 days. As soon as he was able to crawl about by the aid of a stick he was transferred from the hospital to the Brandywine storeship at Fortress Monroe, and kept a close prisoner in irons, until the doctor, after two days, seeing his utter helplessness, had the irons removed. He remained in prison in this ship from June 15 to November 13, when he was again put in irons, placed on board the transport ship Newbern, and conveyed to the navy-yard at Brooklyn, preparatory to his consignment at Fort Lafayette as a prisoner of State. In this dungeon he was confined in a casemate with two other prisoners—one named Andrews, charged with being a ringleader in the New York anti-conscription riots in July last. He was locked up night and day, allowed neither exercise nor fresh air, nor permitted to leave his cell even for the calls of nature. This particular casemate was called 'the doomed cell.' He obtained his liberty early in March, through the representations of Lord Lyons, to whom the facts were officially transmitted by the British Consul at this port; but his wound, and the subsequent cruelties he experienced, have seriously, and, perhaps, permanently, injured his health. He has not recovered the use of his leg, is quite unable to work, and totally destitute.

Lieutenant Everson, on being called upon by Admiral Lee, his superior officer, to explain his conduct, had nothing further to say than that O'Neill had a keg of gunpowder in his hands, which he was about to cast into the furnace to blow up the ship and all on board, when he shot him to prevent the catastrophe. He still persists in this statement, though it has no foundation but in the temporary insanity of his own intoxication and alarm at the time, and is disproved by the evidence of Gurdon and the other firemen who witnessed the circumstance.

RECEPTION OF RETURNED PRISONERS.

SPEECH OF THE PRESIDENT.

(From the Richmond Enquirer, March 16.)

Richmond opened wide her arms yesterday. Four hours the hills at Rocketts bloomed with beauty, and the streets about the Navy Yard were alive with throngs of pleased, expectant, joyous-hearted people. The glittering muskets of a battalion shone in their midst, and the music of a band added to the attractions of the scene. At half-past one o'clock, two steamers loaded with Confederate soldiers just released from Northern prisons, after ten months of cruel captivity, appeared, coming slowly toward the wharf. Cheers from the shore and cheers from the boats arose. As the boats touched the wharf, the prison-worn 'heroes of many a fight' were seized upon by a thousand ladies or more, and welcomed with Virginia warmth and womanly enthusiasm. The military presented arms; the band did its best; the people cheered. Everybody did something, or said or shouted something that evinced overflowing, irrepressible, indefinable gladness. The prisoners were then escorted up town. The march was a triumph. When the large crowd of returned soldiers and citizens had reached the Capitol Square, a halt was made at the Washington monument. President Davis then made his appearance among the returned soldiers, and was received by them with rapturous cheers and waving of hats. In response to the general wish, the President took a position on the Washington monument and addressed the returned soldiers, who crowded around him with eager desire to hear what he had to say.

The President said:—

Friends and Fellow-soldiers. I welcome you to your native land. When I have heard of the sufferings you have endured, and the indignities to which you have been subjected, while helpless prisoners of cruel captors, my heart has yearned for you with a father's deep sympathy and affectionate solicitude; it has burned with indignation at your wrongs; but it has also pulsated with an unspeakable pride and exultation at the fortitude you have evinced under the severest trials, the integrity you have preserved amid the most insidious temptations, and the calm trust you have never ceased to repose in the righteousness of your country's cause.

A colour-bearer among you, when captured, secreted his battle flag in his bosom, and possessed it through a long captivity, until the proud moment arrived when, standing on the deck of a Confederate vessel, he gave its folds, amid the cheers of his comrades, once more to the light of his native skies. With a no less jealous care, through the long weary months of a vile imprisonment, you have kept entwined around your heart of hearts an unfading love of that sacred emblem, and your faithful guardianship earns for you the admiration of your Government, and is hailed by the plaudits of your grateful countrymen.

You have passed through many bitter trials. You know there are many more in store for you. You have followed that flag with unfaltering steps on many a bloody field. You will follow it again with no less enthusiasm, as each day makes it more precious, and sheds a new radiance on its bright folds. To the spirit that has carried you forward to so many heights of victory in the past, will be added the inspiration of new wrongs and outrages, that will strengthen your arms and nerve your hearts to a resistance that nothing can overcome in the future. Your brother soldiers have awaited your coming with painful anxiety. They will welcome you with open arms. You will tell them, by the camp fires, of the horrors of your long captivity. You will contrast your sufferings with the generosity with which their prisoners have been treated at our hands, and, though you have felt, many times, this broad distinction, you responded to the sentiment of your comrades at home, that we must never forget what is due to ourselves as a civilised people, though the enemy have nothing to claim.

Your words will excite them to an unconquerable determination. They will arouse you to the highest pitch of martial enthusiasm by accounts of their glorious deeds in your absence. Together you will be stimulated to renewed exertion until you plant our banner on the heights of Southern Independence, and deck it with the rich fruits and fragrant flowers of an enduring peace.

You will find your families suffering less than you have been led to suppose. You will find much of our territory devastated, but the people still true to the spirit of '76. You will find the old State of Virginia, baring her bosom to the storm, with lion heart and eagle eye defiant as ever. So long as she has a crust you will share her hospitality. After a short respite you will be called again to the front. I know you will come.

May God bless you all.

The South commercially independent of the North.—Commercially considered, the South has of course suffered more than the North. With a blockaded seaboard, the trade of the South became almost extinct. In one respect, however, the war has not been unproductive of good effects in the South. Instead of being simply the exporters of a raw material which a coloured population prepared for the market, the Southerners have now become manufacturers. The necessities of the present war compelled them to develope their industrial resources, and they have now learned to supply themselves with those articles for which they were previously dependent upon the Northern States. The Southern population desired political independence, but the experiences of the present war have taught them the necessity of equally making themselves commercially independent of their Northern neighbour. Morning Post, April 26.

Europe and the Confederate States.—Colonel L. Q. C. Lamar, who lately visited this country, delivered an address last month at Milledgeville, Georgia, on 'The Sentiments of Europe towards the Confederacy.' Colonel Lamar said that he found amongst all intelligent classes a strong sympathy for the South, and an earnest admiration of Southern statesmanship and Southern valour. The Governments of Europe were deterred by political considerations from recognising the Confederate States. That of Great Britain was sensitive of any act that might incur the hostility of the United States. France was deterred from recognition by other Powers holding back. The Russian Government alone avowed any partiality for the United States. The German populace, misled by the agents of New England, has recruited the Northern armies. The Pope has declared the nationality of the South an accomplished fact. The financiers of London took the Confederate loan, while they refused to touch that of the United States, which was a substantial evidence of confidence and a financial recognition.

Lincoln's Re-election.—The late elections in the United States indicate that the Lincoln party is still triumphant, though not overwhelming. It carries the elections generally, though by an insecure majority. Lincoln personally seems to have a great start over his rivals for the Presidency in his own party. The Republicans of the various State Legislatures are very generally nominating him, and with alleged unanimity. Thirty or forty newspapers have also declared for him, while only five or six (mostly German) have come out for Fremont, and three or four for Chase. Add to this the immense patronage of Lincoln and the vote of his army, which is given by word of command, and it would seem that he is pretty secure from the rivals of his own household. If dethroned, it will be by a Democrat, and it will either result from an increased dissatisfaction with the war, or he will be defeated through distractions among his friends, just as he was elected by division among his opponents. As some offset to the foregoing, however, we see it stated by Wendell Philips, that only five United States Senators are in favour of Lincoln's re-election. So far as we now see, we do not think that Lincoln's defeat, except on principle, is a result to be desired. If the war against us is to be persevered in, better that it be by one worn and wearied with the labours and chagrins of four years, than by a successor who would come to the task with fresh ambition, unchilled ardour, and, perhaps, a higher capacity. Lincoln, by his own account, must have very nearly his fill of the war, for he says he is the most miserable man alive. The fable of the fox and the flies teaches that it will probably be better for us if he be kept at his post, rather than bring in a new man, with a fresh set of retamers, to pursue the same line of policy. Richmond Sentinel, March 18.

Spirit of the Confederate Army.—The following resolutions were adopted by the Second North Carolina regiment with respect to the re-enlistment of its members for the war:—'Whereas, having noticed the patriotic course of many of the regiments in the Confederate armies, who are voluntarily enlisting for the war, we deem it our duty to send them forth a brotherly greeting and welcome them into our ranks: Therefore '1. Resolved, That, having, at the commencement of hostilities, enlisted for the war, we have seen no reason to regret our choice: but, on the contrary, the continued cruelty, barbarity, and vindictiveness of our malignant foes, as well as our leafless roof trees, deserted firesides, and desolated homes, make us more and more resolute in our determination to continue steadfast until the end. 2. Resolved, That we declare ourselves enlisted in the cause of Southern rights and Southern independence as long as one armed foe shall remain on our soil. That we declare ourselves in for the war, without conditions, and this we do most cheerfully, as is our bounden duty. 3. Resolved, That we send a warm and fraternal greeting to our friends at home, and bid them entertain no gloomy apprehensions for the future, but put the ban upon all croakers, malcontents, speculators, and skulkers from the battle-field; for history will never record that the minions of tyranny, oppression, and fanaticism can ever subdue the freemen of the South, if true to themselves. 4. Resolved, That we have full confidence in those in authority over us, and that the liberality manifested by our commanders, and the successful efforts they have made to supply our necessities, are an earnest of their increasing care in our behalf, and should, and do, receive our heartfelt thanks.'

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL & COMMERCIAL.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

Wednesday Evening.

The prospects of the money market are not unsatisfactory. True, the quotation for discount is supported at 7 per cent., and the price for the present is not likely to go lower; but if it does not advance, it will be held to be favourable, especially in the face of the introduction of such numbers of public companies. The Russian loan of 6,000,000*l*. and the Mexican loan of 12,000,000*l*. have neither of them proved great successes, because the public have properly imagined that if they had encouraged them, it would have led to a serious drain of bullion, and this, in the existing state of things, would have been extremely prejudicial. Home and local enterprise has been so much encouraged that it is felt it would be dangerous to adventure in foreign loans, and though, on other occasions when money is more completely abundant, support may be given to them, it is very evident they are not popular just at present. If we secure favourable crops this year, we may be enabled to struggle through without a panic; but if there should be the least doubt of the sufficiency of the harvest, the immediate result would be a reaction in prices, and a general state of depression at the Stock Exchange. The mania continues in the direction of Bank, Finance, and Credit Companies, and in consequence of this, a rapid absorption of money is going forward, which will support the terms for discount. It is not, however, thought that the rate will for the instant advance, particularly if foreign loans shall continue to be eschewed. The terms for first-class paper may be called 6⅞ to 7 per cent.; the general quotation is 7 per cent. Money in the Stock Exchange on English securities is worth 4 to 5 per cent.; higher rates are paid in the foreign stock and share settlements, in consequence of the employment of capital in carrying over stocks and shares to the middle of next month.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English stock market has shown rather more buoyancy during the last two or three days, in consequence of the more favourable aspect of the money market, but in the earlier part of the week the brokers were deterred from operating freely in consequence of the apprehension that the Bank rate of discount might have been further advanced; that fear, however, appears now, in a great measure, to have subsided; and with a continuation of very fine weather, there is more disposition evinced to do business. Consols closed this evening at 91½ to 91⅝ for money and 91⅝ to 91¾ for the account, which is an improvement of ¼ per cent. on the price current this day week. Exchequer Bills are rather less firm, being now down to 10*s*. to to 4*s*. dis. The Foreign Stock Market has been less animated, the causes which have created a speculative movement in some of the stocks, particularly Mexican and Greek, having subsided, and prices in those cases exhibit a declining tendency. Spanish, however, show a slight improvement. Greek closes at 24¾ to 25, being a fall of ½ per cent. Mexican 45½ to 45¾, showing a decline of ⅞ per cent. Spanish Passives 35¾ to 36¼, being an improvement of ⅛ per cent., and the Certificates 12¼ to 12¾. Turkish six per cents. (1854) 89 to 90, and those 1862 69 to 69½, being a decline in the former of ½ per cent., and in the latter of 2 per cent.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The Confederate loan has advanced this week, the latest quotation being 57½ to 58½.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The continued favourable accounts with regard to the progress making by the Confederate armies are telling seriously upon the value of all the American Federal Government and railway securities. The brokers appear to keep quite aloof as respects this description of property, and the only dealings appear to be on behalf of persons wishing to get rid of the stock they hold, and purchasers are only to be found where lower prices are accepted. The transactions for some weeks past have been gradually declining, and they have been this week less than for a very long time past. They comprised Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section, at 79, 78, and 77½, ditto, Pennsylvanian section, at 76, 75½, 75¼, and 75, Erie shares, $100, all paid, at 64, ditto, fifth mortgage, 65, Illinois Central seven per cent., at 65, ditto, $100 shares, $90 paid, 22 dis., and Pennsylvania Railway, second mortgage, 85.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion and specie movements still continue of an unfavourable character. During the week there has not been any gold sent into the Bank, but there have been withdrawals to the extent of 82,000*l*. for transmission abroad. The arrivals of specie have reached 586,935*l*., 529,895*l*. being from the West Indies and the Pacific, and 57,040*l*. from New York. The specie shipped by the steamer for the East which sailed to-day, amounted to 114 205*l*., of which there was in gold 17,000*l*. for Alexandria and 38,765*l*. for Bombay. The amount of silver was 61,840*l*. The silver market has been very quiet, there being scarcely any demand for India, and the transactions have consequently been on a very limited scale. The bar silver brought by the last West Indian packet has been sold at 61[illegible]d. per ounce, being a decline of ⅛*d*. from the price [illegible] the previous arrival. Mexican dollars have been [illegible] and the price remains unchanged. About [illegible] is on its way from Melbourne [illegible] Dover Castle, and the Red Rover. There is also [illegible] on its way from New Zealand by the [illegible].

Liverpool, Wednesday, April 27. Although the sales of cotton this week have been beyond what [illegible] extent, the dealings have not been so animated as they were last week but on the whole prices continue to be well supported. There have been more enquiries for American descriptions, which are rather scarce, and they consequently command better prices. The sales this week have amounted to [illegible] bales, of which 30,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present time have been 706,020 bales, against 610,310 bales the corresponding period [illegible]. There have been imported this year 712,[illegible] bales, and to the same date last year 400,076 bales. The exports so far this year have reached 107,685 bales, [illegible] 1864 they were 109,165 bales. There have been taken for consumption this year 472 300 bales, last year [illegible] 318,300 bales. On speculation this year, 105,[illegible] have been taken, whilst in 1863 the amount was [illegible]. The computed stock at the present time is 311,260 bales [illegible] the same period last year they were only 365,0[illegible] bales. The latest quotations were: Middling Orleans, 27*d*. to 28*d*.; Mobile, 27¼*d*. to 27¾*d*.; Uplands, 26½*d*. to 27*d*.; and [illegible] fair Egyptians, 27½*d*. to 28½*d*.

Business at Manchester during the past week has shown rather more animation, but the dealings to a considerable extent have been limited in consequence of the high prices demanded by the holders of almost all descriptions of goods. For all kinds of yarns made from good cotton particularly long stapled yarns for shipping, there have been increased enquiries, and the qualities also made from the lower [illegible] of cotton have improved, and nearly all descriptions of yarn must be quoted about 1*d*. per pound dearer. There is no [illegible] [illegible]

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. Ashbridge, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by Henry Hotze, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. Brewer, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and Daniel Hubbard, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

BUST OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE only Bust extant of the President of the Confederate States, modelled by Volk, at Richmond, and the most faithful Likeness of this eminent Statesman, has been kindly lent by the owner for reproduction for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund of Liverpool. In conformity with the intentions of the donor, the Bust has been registered under the Designs Act, and a number of casts (quarter size), limited to 500, are offered to the public at the following rates.—

Plaster	5*s*. 0*d*.	Carriage free to all parts of the United Kingdom.
Ditto Enameled	7*s*. 6*d*.
A l'Ivoire (composition of Wax and Plaster)	10*s*. 6*d*.

The Bust may be seen at the studio of James Redfern, Esq., 29 Clipstone Street, Fitzroy Square, W., who will also receive orders to execute it in marble; and at the Index Office, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

The proceeds of the sale of the 500 casts being for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund, all orders must be addressed, and money orders made payable, to Mr. Henry Hotze, 17 Savile Row, W.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL STONEWALL JACKSON.

THE ONLY AUTHENTIC AND FAITHFUL LIKENESS YET PUBLISHED.

MESSRS. W. WALKER & SONS, 64 Margaret Street, Cavendish Square, London, W., beg to inform the Public that they have lately been furnished by the Hon. J. M. Mason, of the Confederate States, with the only Original Likeness of the late lamented General Thomas Jefferson Jackson, photographed from life a week before the General received his fatal wound. From this Likeness (enlarged by Photography) Messrs. Walker have executed a SPLENDID LIFE-SIZE PORTRAIT, beautifully finished in Chalks by Mr. Walker, Senior, the Historical Stiple and Mezzotint Engraver. This Portrait remains emphatically as The Likeness of the illustrious General. It has been seen and highly approved by many Southern Gentlemen who knew the General personally.

Messrs. Walker now intend publishing immediately (by Private Subscription) Two Sizes of Photographs taken from the Original Life-Size, and highly finished in Sepia. Both of these Portraits will be mounted on India Paper, and will bear underneath a facsimile of the Genuine Autograph of General Jackson, taken from an Autograph letter received by a friend in London a few days before the news arrived of the General's death.

PRICES TO SUBSCRIBERS, TO BE PAID FOR ON DELIVERY.

PLAIN GILT MOULDING FRAMES FOR ABOVE.

LARGE SIZE . . . 10*s.* 6*d.* | SECOND SIZE . . . 7*s.* 6*d.*

A few copies enlarged from the Original, and highly finished in Chalks by Mr. Walker, Senior, will be executed by order only, and, on account of the labour and time necessarily bestowed upon each by Mr. Walker himself, can only be supplied at 10*l.* 10*s.* each.

By an arrangement entered into by the Messrs. Walker with Mr. Mason, Half of the Nett Profit of the publication of the above will be handed over to Mr. Henry Hotze, Commercial Agent of the Confederate States of America in London, to be applied to the relief of the Southern prisoners confined in the Federal American States.

The Original Drawing and the above Portraits from it can be seen by applying at Messrs. W. Walker & Sons' Studio, Blockade-Running Statistics.

NASSAU, N.P.: March 17, 1864.

RUNNING the blockade became a business in this port in November 1861. Thinking that reliable statistics of this important trade will be not only of interest to the commercial community, but equally so from a political point of view, as affording a standard for measuring the efficiency of the blockade, I subjoin a table carefully compiled and corrected up to the date of March 10, 1864. This table comprises the names of all steam-vessels belonging to this port which have run or attempted to run the blockade from this port between the dates mentioned, the number of round trips and runs made by each from and to this port up to March 10, or until lost or captured. Where vessels belonging to this port have made trips to or from other ports, the number of such trips so far as known is also given, but my figures in this respect are of course not so complete as in the case of arrivals and clearances here. You will please observe that most of the boats here enumerated were wholly unfit for the purpose to which they had been hastily applied under the inducements of the large profit, and are very different from those which have been more recently built, and expressly for blockade-running. Still, even now it is by no means an uncommon thing for a five or six-knot boat to make several successful trips, while the better class pass the blockading squadron almost as carelessly as if none such existed, frequently in open daylight. The average life of a boat, which from the subjoined table would appear to be about five runs, is therefore in reality much higher, and may be safely estimated, with proper management, to be at least four round trips, or eight successful runs.

Taking all the craft, good, bad, and indifferent, together, you will find that out of eighty-four steamers, eleven only failed on the first run, thirty-seven have been captured, and twenty-five lost from various marine accidents, while twenty-two are still safe, after having paid themselves many times over. But perhaps the most striking way of explaining the annexed table to the ordinary reader is to say that of 425 attempts to run the blockade from this port alone, 363 have been successful, and only sixty-two (or about one in seven) unsuccessful. If, as should fairly be done, the number of trips made by the same vessels from other ports be added, the proportion becomes still more favourable to the blockade-running interest. I need only add that of the vessels enumerated several have changed their names at various times, in which case I have identified them under one name, generally the last.

Schooners, about 100 arrived.

* Several of the vessels enumerated in the above have made runs from other ports, which are not indicated in this list.

The following vessels are now in port, viz., Rose, Mars, Alliance, Will o' the Wisp, Druid, Star.

The recent regulations framed, under the Act of Congress, by the Confederate Secretary of the Treasury have caused great commotion here. Many persons express themselves very strongly on the subject; but there are not wanting many blockade-runners, heavily interested in the trade, who yet heartily approve and defend these regulations, seeing in them the re-establishment of Confederate credit abroad and relief of the currency at home. To some extent, however, these enactments may for the present reduce the business of this port, especially as regards English orders. The stock of goods now in the market is estimated at the Custom House at 1,000,000*l.*, and the prospective demand not so flattering as before the issue of the late regulations. Private letters from the Confederacy bear evidence of the buoyant spirits and high hopes of Government and people. The results of the ensuing campaign are looked for with an absolute confidence which never existed in the most prosperous tide of Southern fortunes. The great, and probably last, trial of strength, is spoken of in somewhat the spirit of Cromwell's soldiers, who 'rejoiced greatly at the prospect of a battle.'

AFTER a long period of dulness, during which business, like old age, has been forced to live upon the memory of the past, symptoms are at last becoming manifest of a reaction. The late restrictions imposed upon the blockade business, the news of which we received towards the close of 'last moon,' fell like a bomb-shell in our midst, and caused the wildest consternation. The notice was so short, the law itself so comprehensive, and at the first blush so unfair, that it served to put an effectual stop to trade, and turn us all into a community of political wranglers; the aid of the local press was invoked in the discussion, and a series of correspondence enshrined in its columns characterised by considerably more feeling than depth of argument. The vessels in port were detained, and really it looked at one time as though the prophecies of the croakers were about to be realised, and the phantom Commerce vanish from the scene. At length, however, the arrival of the Coquette (Government boat) and Syren on Monday morning last turned the current of public opinion. The new law, like many other bugbears, was found not half so terrible on closer acquaintance, and, despite a little continued grumbling, really advanced several steps towards popularity. There are certainly some of its provisions that will require alteration, in order that small vessels may not be taxed disproportionately. Otherwise it is well calculated to benefit both the Government and the shipper. The consequence is that every one interested seems determined to make the best of it, and we hear no more threats of boats being withdrawn; while the letters that have gone forward to detain new boats in Europe will all doubtless be recalled either this or the ensuing mail. This happy change of sentiment is not a little influenced by the news of the rapid improvement in the Confederate currency, gold in that locality having inversely emulated its action in the Northern market, being rapidly on the decline, reaching 1,400—the last dates with a lower tendency. If gold is to be considered a political barometer, the Confederacy is evidently in a happy condition. My own opinion is that its commerce will hereafter be conducted on a firmer basis than ever. Three years' experience has demonstrated the fact that blockade-running is highly profitable, the average of success and losses continuing constantly the same, notwithstanding the renewed efforts of the North to destroy it. Fortunes will not probably be acquired so easily or rapidly as in the early period of its history, but better profits will be realised commensurate with the risks. At all events the merchants of Nassau will be great gainers by the new order of things, as it is now necessary that all cotton brought out must return half its value in goods, instead of being buried in the pockets of the fortunate speculator as formerly.

The news received by the Coquette and Syren is of the most flattering nature. The Confederate armies were never in better condition as regards numbers, clothing, provisions, and munitions, than at present. The suffering that marked the early history of the war has entirely disappeared, and the comfort of the Confederate soldier is now, perhaps, as effectually secured as that of his Northern rival. The apparently strict and harsh laws enacted by the late Congress seem to be not only cheerfully, but enthusiastically, acquiesced in; and a spirit of confidence pervades their journals and the private correspondence received here, that can only be the reflex of a general spirit of confidence in the result of the coming 'shock of arms.'

I conversed yesterday with a gentleman direct from Johnston's army, who speaks of it in the most satisfactory terms with regard to numbers; while Longstreet's army, also greatly enlarged, is in a position from whence he can join either Johnston or General Lee, in Virginia, in seventy hours. A great battle is expected in Virginia during the present month, that will probably be the first really decisive action of the war; and as the time rapidly approaches, our hearts throb with renewed anxiety for the fortunes of the gallant little nation. But she has already braved many storms, and the same God rules above that smiled upon her in the darkest hour of her need.

A very important addition to the late Regulations on Blockade-running, of especial interest to the holders of Confederate Cotton Bonds, will be found under the head of our Commercial and Financial Intelligence.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

General Banks's expedition up the Red River has met with a signal check, if not a total defeat. On April 8, it had reached Grand Ecore, some fifty miles below Shreveport, the Confederate State capital and military depôt. General Taylor had fallen back to Pleasant Hill, where he made a stand against the Federal cavalry, who imagined they were driving him before them, but who suddenly found themselves attacked in 'overwhelming numbers,' and were driven back in disorder upon their infantry supports. This force was commanded by General Stone, who was so signally defeated at Ball's Bluff in 1861, for which he suffered a long imprisonment. The panic of the cavalry is said to have demoralised the infantry, and the retreat became a rout, in which the cavalry trains and all the artillery were lost. The loss of the advance is put down at 2,000, and that of the Chicago division, in killed and captured, is put down at 3,100. While the fourth division was falling back in disorder, the third division, numbering only 1,800, came up, and was immediately routed. Finally, the Nineteenth Army Corps, 7,000, came up and formed in line, checked the pursuit of the Confederates, and enabled the Federals to save a portion of their trains and fall back to Grand Ecore.

Confederate papers report the destruction of two gunboats by torpedoes. Nothing has been heard from General Steele's column, from Little Rock, Arkansas, which was intended to cooperate with General Banks. It will be observed that the Federals loosely admit a loss of over 5,000, and not 2,000 as first stated, while the Confederates estimated it at 14,000. It is probable that the expedition, every way a failure, will be abandoned, and that General Banks will attempt to return with his shattered forces to New Orleans, pursued by Generals Kirby Smith and Taylor and the victorious Confederates. The hospitals at Baton Rouge were filled with the Federal wounded.

The Peruvian, via Greencastle, brings New York telegrams to April 23. The rout of General Banks's expedition was confirmed. A rumour that he successfully attacked the Confederates on the 9th was not confirmed by later dates from New Orleans. The army had retreated to Alexandria, and Commander Porter's fleet of gunboats and transports was fiercely assailed on its return down Red River. Several of the transports barely escaped capture.

The operations for driving the Federals from the coast of North Carolina have commenced. Fort Gray, near Plymouth, at the mouth of Roanoke River, was attacked by the Confederates under General Ransom on the 17th without success. On the following day a Confederate ram sank three out of five Federal gunboats, and held the mouth of the river, while the fort was closely invested. A fleet of gunboats had been sent from Fortress Monroe to the relief of the garrison; but it was believed that both Plymouth and Newbern would be taken.

The Federals have evacuated Pilatka, Florida, and another transport has been sunk in St. John's River by Confederate torpedoes.

The armies of General Lee and General Grant were supposed to be moving; but the Government had stopped despatches from Virginia. Deserters reported that Longstreet was moving down the Shenandoah Valley, and that Lee's army was supplied with ten days' rations.

The apprehension of an invasion of the Western States had induced the governors of four States to go to Washington to advise the President to call out 200,000 six months' volunteers. The Governor of New York had proffered the State militia to guard the coast from the expected visits of the rams of the Confederates.

A Confederate force, estimated at 2,000 to 4,000, commanded by General Forrest, aided by Brigadier-Generals Chalmers and M'Cullough, attacked Fort Pillow on the Mississippi river, in Tennessee, 70 miles above Memphis, at sunrise, April 13. The fort was commanded by Major Booth, and its garrison consisted of 200 Tennessee volunteers and 100 negroes, aided by a gunboat on the river. A summons to surrender having been refused, the fight began, and lasted till four o'clock, P.M. The Confederate forces charged and carried the outer defences in the face of a murderous fire, and the garrison was driven to the river battery. General Forrest then sent another summons to surrender, which was refused, and the fort was taken by assault. Of the 600 who defended the fort General Sherman states the killed at 300. The Federal wounded were placed upon a steamboat and sent to Cairo.

All is silent within the Confederate lines in Virginia. When earnest work begins, the North is left without information. General Mosby, indeed, captured a Federal train on the 16th, near Fairfax Station, burning the wagons and carrying off the horses. There was a rumour at the last moment that General Lee had crossed the Rapidan, and there was a strong apprehension that he would not wait for the movements of General Grant, but himself take a vigorous initiative. Conscripts arriving at Richmond were sent forward to the Rapidan without delay, and General Lee's army is supposed in New York to number not less than 90,000.

One of the New York bounty brokers is confined in Fort Lafayette on charges of swindling soldiers to the amount of $400,000.

Forgery appears to be the favourite and most effective weapon of the Yankees. It now appears that a letter, reported to have been sent to the 'bogus' Governor Hahn of Louisiana, by Confederate prisoners in Indiana, asking pardon and endorsing emancipation, was a vile Federal forgery, concocted in New Orleans to influence the Louisiana prisoners.

Secretary Chase, in operating in New York to raise the market value of his greenbacks, produced a panic in stocks. By suddenly throwing $16,000,000 in gold upon the market, he forced the sale of about the same value in railway and other stocks, causing many large failures and heavy losses. After all it was but a momentary expedient which he may not be able to repeat.

The invasion of Kentucky, and of the Northern States on the opposite bank of the Ohio, is still insisted upon by the correspondents of the Northern press as one of the chief objects of the Confederates in the opening campaign. General Morgan, the Raleigh (North Carolina) Confederate says, 'is about to undertake one of the boldest expeditions he has ever yet made, which, if successful, will be productive of great good to our cause.' The Louisville Journal reports that a Confederate brigade of two thousand men, under General Jones, had entered Kentucky through a gap in the Cumberland Mountains. General Forrest is reported to have disbanded three Kentucky regiments in the western part of the State, that they might scatter over the country and stir up the elements of disaffection. The banks are sending their money to Covington, opposite Cincinnati, on the Ohio, for safety, and the whole State is filled with hope and fear, agitation and alarm. There can be little doubt that the dashes and raids of small bodies of Confederate cavalry and mounted infantry are but the precursors of more important movements. We are told that, among other indications, Kentucky soldiers in the Confederate army have written to their friends, advising them to sell their horses and cattle to Union men, since they would all be taken in a short time by the advancing Confederates. The New York Herald says: 'We do not see what should prevent such a force, united in Kentucky, and supplied by plunder, from operating on the communications of our force at Chattanooga, so as to compel its retreat, with Johnston at its heels.'

For the first time since the war began, we find the Northern press, Republican and Democratic, filled, at the commencement of a campaign, with forebodings of disaster. 'It seems to us easier,' says the New York World, 'to state reasons for fearing that the country is on the verge of a terrible catastrophe, than for believing that the hour of its redemption draweth nigh. If General Grant's campaign should result in disaster, who does not see that the country would be at once overtaken by a financial tornado, prostrating everything in its path?' The Springfield Republican, a Government paper, makes, if possible, a more gloomy record. It says: 'Things begin to look squally. A Government dollar is worth but 55¼ cents; speculation is running up the prices of the necessaries of life, even faster than the Government paper runs down; the wealth of the country is passing from the many to the few, and the labouring classes are becoming dispirited and sullen.' The nation is spoken of as 'passing through terrible struggles.' The New York Times, the organ of Mr. Seward, and advocate for the reelection of Mr. Lincoln, storms at Congress, and asks if the state of the country is caused by their 'imbecility or treachery.' The New York Journal of Commerce, one of the most reliable and conservative of American journals, says: 'Ruin is before us as a people, a nation, a Union, if we go on under present guidance, with the principles which now prevail in the halls of Congress and the President's house. All the promises and prophecies of the men who lead the Radical party are but a repetition of just what such men promised and prophesied for other nations in other times, and the end always was, as it will now be—destruction.'

It is useless to speculate on what a few weeks may decide—the results of the campaign in Virginia—but it may be doubted if any possible success of General Grant can save the North from repudiation, bankruptcy, and ruin.

Who will be President? Nothing but military success will secure the nomination of Mr. Lincoln, and that, if of a decisive character, might lead to the nomination of General Grant. The dissatisfied Republicans propose to hold a convention at Cleveland about May 20. General Fremont, unless he can be bought off with a command suited to his ambition, will run for President even if Lincoln is nominated. It is proposed to make him General-in-Chief of the negro forces. The great interest of the New York Sanitary Fair appears to have consisted in voting, at a dollar a vote, a sword to one of the two popular Generals, M'Clellan or Grant. Eleven thousand votes had been cast, leaving a majority of a few hundred for M'Clellan, which would be increased, it was expected, by votes and dollars sent from the army of the Potomac. General Grant, it was reported, wished to give his rival an important command, but had been overruled by Mr. Lincoln, who said, 'Anything but that.'

General Butler, superseded in military command by General Baldy Smith, still reigns a petty civil despot at Fortress Monroe, where it appears by a report to Dr. M'Cormack that men have been confined on bread and water for fifty days at a time, and, but for the aid of their fellow-prisoners, would have died of starvation.

We are informed in two lines of telegram that the Federals have been driven from Big Black River, with the loss of several hundred prisoners. The State of Mississippi must now be clear of Federal troops, with the exception of two or three towns on the Mississippi river.

The official report of the capture of Paducah states that a quantity of stores were taken, a steamer was burnt in the dry dock, and fifty prisoners brought out. General Forrest says that he held the town for ten hours, 'and could have held it longer, but found the small-pox raging, and evacuated the place.'

While the Confederates have been represented as wearing out their railways without being able to replace them, it appears that they have established extensive rolling mills for railway iron, locomotive manufactories, and are making carriages for all their needs. They have even built new lines of railway in Georgia and North Carolina, to complete internal communications. Railway iron is manufactured at eight different places in the South, and locomotives are built at Macon and Atlanta by workmen brought from Scotland.

The British barque Saxon, captured by the Vanderbilt at the Cape of Good Hope, has been released by a decree of Judge Betts, of New York, and Mr. Donovan, the United States officer who shot Mr. Gray, has been put on trial for murder at Philadelphia.

If the last report from Virginia prove to have been true, that General Longstreet was moving down the Shenandoah, General Grant is flanked before he has made a move, and may be obliged to march back to Maryland instead of 'on to Richmond.'

The defeat of General Banks's Red River raid must be considered a merited retribution. The correspondents of the Northern press describe the progress of the troops as being accompanied by acts of the most wanton vandalism. The houses on the route were robbed of their valuables, and the floors and hearthstones dug up in search of such as might be concealed. Elegant mansions were wrecked, and works of art maliciously destroyed. More revolting crimes and outrages were perpetrated on helpless women and negroes. The worst acts were done by the soldiers who had been engaged in General Sherman's raid into Mississippi—they were practising the lessons learnt in that wretched expedition.

After violent fluctuations, the price of gold at New York on April 23 was 77 per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

The bill of indictment in the case of the Queen v. Rumball (case of the Rappahannock), was preferred before the grand jury of the city of Westminster yesterday. Mr. Justice Crompton as senior judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, charged the jury last week by way of anticipation, but the charge had reference to the Bill presented yesterday. The learned judge observed that the tribunal of the grand jury before him was peculiarly fitted to deal with State prosecutions. The prosecution was against Mr. Rumball, under the Foreign Enlistment Act, which enabled the Crown to prosecute such cases in the Queen's Bench at Westminster. The first question for them under the second section was whether the defendant had engaged any persons in the foreign service, or induced any one to go abroad with the view of being so engaged. Then as to the seventh section, his opinion was that an equipment not necessarily warlike would be within the Act, if it was made out that the equipment was for warlike purposes; nor need the intention be proved by the particular character of the equipment. It was not necessary to wait for a complete equipment. If, then, the defendant was in any way concerned in such equipment, the jury should find a true Bill. His Lordship took the same view of the law as did Mr. Baron Channel in the Alexandra case.

It is not necessary to discuss the facts of this case which will be put forward in a complete manner in the report of the approaching trial. It may, however, be well to remind our readers that in November last the English Government sold a steamer called the Scylla, that the parties who purchased her executed certain repairs upon her at Sheerness, and that subsequently she steamed across to Calais, and entered that port under the Confederate flag. The charge against Mr. Rumball is that he enlisted men to serve on board a Confederate ship of war, and that he also was concerned in her equipment for a warlike purpose. Mr. Rumball was an employé in the Government dockyards at the time, but was discharged by the Lords of the Admiralty.

The case is appointed to be tried at bar before the Court of Queen's Bench. Such a trial cannot be had without leave of the Court, even though the parties consent to it. It is entirely a matter of discretion with the Court to grant or refuse it, unless the Crown be actually and immediately interested, in which case the Attorney-General may demand it as of right; otherwise it will not be granted, except where the matter in dispute is of great value and the cause of great importance. It was formerly granted where a judge or officer of one of the Superior Courts was a party to the suit; but in 1850 the Court of Exchequer refused such a trial in a case where an attorney was plaintiff and the Lord Chancellor was defendant. The last instance of such a trial being held was in the case of Baron v. Denman in 1848, which arose out of matters connected with the slave trade. The cause may be brought before any of the three Superior Courts at Westminster. The trial may be held in term or vacation. It is held before the full Court at Westminster with a special jury. The Court sits as in Banc, four, or at the least three, judges being present. The Chief Justice or the Chief Baron, as the case may be, sums up the evidence; and if any question of law arise either collaterally or as forming a part of the case, each of the judges delivers his opinion upon it seriatim. A Bill of exceptions lies to the Exchequer Chamber upon the reception of improper evidence, and each of the presiding judges may on the trial make such observations to the jury upon the whole case by way of direction as he considers to be requisite. In other respects the trial at bar is similar to the trial at nisi prius. The Bill is presented to the Grand Jury of England, who may be summoned from any part of England, except the city of London, and perhaps the counties palatine, and who are charged by the Senior Puisne Judge or Baron of the Court, who receives a salary of 40*l.* per annum for this usually nominal service.

The sport which Newmarket last week afforded was marked by one peculiar feature. In two races all the interest of the general public was concentrated, and of these but one satisfied expectation. The residue had charms for the owners of horses and the money-seekers alone. Enthusiasm can only be created when a gallant veteran appears again on the field of his former glories, and demands admiration by his noble bearing and the prestige of his victories; when animals of illustrious parentage first bring to the trial the uncertain promise of their blood and form; or when the dazzling prizes of Newmarket, Epsom, and Doncaster attract the flower of the English turf at the most prime hour of their youth. We then, following a natural impulse, shall ask our readers to concentrate their attention on the contests for the Two Thousand Guineas and One Thousand Guineas Stakes, and to disregard the thirty-eight other races, not as contemptible, but as eclipsed by the superior lustre of two great lights. Of the vast plain which constitutes Newmarket Heath, the course marked out by long usage for the Two Thousand occupies the most choice portion. It is one mile and seventeen yards in length; the greater portion of it undulates in so slight a manner as to deserve the name of a dead level; it has no curve or bend whatever, and its turf is such as the world cannot match. Yet, as though to attain perfection in its conformation, it falls towards the middle of the sixth furlong for the space of one hundred yards, and rises again with a gradual incline to its termination. It at once demands the highest combination of speed and endurance, it scarcely admits of accident, it offers no hindrance to the sweeping stride of the largest racehorse. The prize this year was worthy of the course, for the winner was to secure to his owner the sum of 4,500*l*. Beyond, however, the magnificent prize and the exultation of victory, there was the solution of a problem of no mean interest. It is much to decide the merits of the three-year-old horses at Newmarket—it is more to unravel even partially the greater problem of Epsom. It was, then, no marvel that such a race, combined with the charms of the grand old Heath and made doubly attractive by the most serene of skies, should have drawn together royal princes and dukes, nobles and commoners, and ladies of rank, in numbers never exceeded at Newmarket.

For the race, out of the eighty-nine horses nominated, thirteen came to the post. Of these a few demand a word of comment. Fille de l'Air, esteemed throughout the winter the most deserving of popular favour, had raised to the highest pitch the hopes of Count de Lagrange and his adherents. She had won last October the Criterion Stakes, and had defeated with consummate ease such horses as Coast-Guard, Prince Arthur, and Ely. Up to the hour of the race she had maintained her position in the market, and seemed destined to secure the enormous sums which fame declared had been risked upon her prowess. Yet some looked only for the antitype of Hospodar and Stradella, and others thought that nature and human care had done but little for the growth of the lauded daughter of Faugh-a-Ballagh. Next there was Mr. Hill's Copenhagen, by Newminster, who never yet had engaged in the struggles of the turf, but whom the confidence of his owner and the money of his supporters had placed at the short odds of 5 to 1. Yet he was fated to bring no more success to his worthy owner than the ill-fated Trumpeter or Pitsford, who, fourteen years ago, succumbed at Epsom to the mighty Voltigeur. Then there was Historian, the son of Stockwell, of no pretensions to the public eye or ear, in the cold shade, with the odds of 40 to 1 laid against him, but withal a horse that may yet gain renown. Hollyfox, by Voltigeur, the property of Lord Falmouth, and the sole representative of the great John Scott, was also despised at the odds of 50 to 1. Mr. Merry reserved the Scottish Chief for the prize of Epsom, and sent Sir Roger, the son of Saunterer, and brother of Rogerthorpe, vainly to struggle at Newmarket. Then, also, there were the two champions of Lord Glasgow. One of these was a marvel to behold. The son of Young Melbourne, and thereby grandson of the immortal Melbourne, boasting also Orlando for his maternal grandsire, he seemed to carry in his form the history of his magnificent lineage, and the promise of a noble posterity. He would have worked a conversion in the most sceptic calumniator of the English racehorse. Standing sixteen hands and one inch in height, with knees and hocks of immense size, with back, and barrel, and arms equal in might to the drayhorse, he seemed to require the hunting-field for the display of his powers. Yet another glance showed the most perfect shoulders, detected an activity that was almost gay, a precision in step unsurpassed by the best of palfreys. Indeed, he was a grand horse, and, as he moved in all the pride of conscious superiority, excited the hope that the English turf had produced the compeer of the unrivalled Stockwell. Still, he had a dangerous opponent, for Mr. R. Ten Broeck is a man justly to be feared when he is confident, and Paris might raise the confidence of the least sanguine of men. At Goodwood he had defeated horses of good repute—he was in the most perfect condition—he was the picture of elegant yet robust beauty. His lineage was traced through Mildew to Slane and Royal Oak. The race itself was interesting. All the horses were despatched to an excellent start, and the pace at once became terrific. Poor Fille de l'Air was beaten in the first four hundred yards, and struggled on with hopeless enterprise, while Sir Roger could scarcely be considered in the race at all. The remainder galloped in a compact body for about six furlongs. At the descent of the ground Paris was galloping wide of the ruck, on a line with Hollyfox, Historian, and General Peel, while Copenhagen and the rest of the field gave way in despair. In truth, the race was at an end. It was not difficult to perceive that General Peel was restrained only by the vigorous efforts of his rider, cautious not to press so large an animal down even a moderate descent. The scene, however, changed at the foot of the incline. With the speed of lightning Aldcroft set the General at his full effort, and the gallant horse with his sweeping stride ascended the elevated ground with a speed that defied his antagonists. Nothing could be more admirable than the rush with which Fordham sought to save the day, nothing more excellent than the gallant effort of Paris. General Peel passed the judge a length in advance; Paris defeated Historian by the same distance; and Hollyfox was a neck behind Historian. The race was run in one minute forty-eight and a half seconds. General Peel has, by his victory, become first favourite for the Derby, at the odds of five to one. The Scottish Chief is at seven to one, and Cambuscan at twelve to one.

On Thursday, April 28, the race for the One Thousand Guineas Stakes took place. The contest is confined to fillies of the age of three years, and bears much the same relation to the Oaks at Epsom as the Two Thousand bears to the Derby. Fifteen fillies came to the post, and many of these were, in point of blood, of the highest stamp. Moreover, to the eye, they were by no means unworthy of the rich prize of 3,500*l*. at stake. The most attractive were Molly Carew, daughter of Wild Dayrell and of Alma; Sardinia, daughter of Stockwell and Ferrara; Becky Sharpe, the sister of Buccaneer; Amicula, the daughter of Pocahontas, and the sister of Stockwell, Rataplan, and King Tom. The odds at starting were three to one against Sardinia, five to one against Mr. Merry's Masquerade, and six to one against Molly Carew. The race was run at a most indifferent pace, all the fillies of renown were defeated most ingloriously, and the winner turned up in Tomato, the daughter of King Tom and Mincemeat, and the property of Baron Rothschild. The Baron was also second with Breeze, thus rivalling the feat of Lord Stamford last year. Mr. J. Scott's Tooi Tooi was third. The distance of the course was 7 furlongs and 210 yards, and one minute and fifty-three seconds were consumed in traversing it. From this fact, and from the forward position of Breeze, it is clear that the field for the race was extremely bad, and exhibited a striking contrast to the Two Thousand horses.

The great event of the present week has been the race for the Chester Cup, which was won by Flash in the Pan, a rank outsider. Little Stag was second, and Tippler third.

THE Channel squadron, under Admiral Sir C. Dacres, C. B., is ordered to the Downs. All officers on leave of absence have been commanded by telegram to join their ships immediately. The Warrior, 40, iron frigate, arrived at Spithead on Saturday, and after filling up with coals and provisions, and shipping stores and provisions for the other ships of the squadron, sailed again to rejoin the fleet. The French squadron is expected in the Downs, and it is probable that the combined fleets will at once enter the Baltic.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON was confined to his house during last week by a violent attack of gout. The noble Lord, however, was present at a Cabinet Council on Saturday last, and at a second Cabinet Council on Monday.

MESSRS. FLETCHER, HULL & STONE, of Liverpool, have received information that the commission to Egypt for evidence in the matter of the steam-rams El Toussin and El Monassir has been executed, and that the commissioners will return to London this week. It is expected that the trial will take place on May 29.

THE Confederate war-steamer Georgia, Captain Evans, arrived in the Mersey at 4 o'clock in the morning of Monday last, and anchored opposite the landing-stages. In the afternoon her powder and shell were removed according to the harbour regulations, and she was taken into one of the Birkenhead docks. She mounted six guns and had a crew of 60 men. It is confidently asserted at Liverpool that she has been brought thither to be sold. Her commander and officers were on Tuesday night entertained at dinner by the Liverpool Southern Club.

SOME months since we gave a full account of the plan and operations for placing Calcutta in immediate telegraphic communication with London. On Monday, intelligence was received at the India Office that the cable was landed at Fao on March 29. Its junction with the Turkish line was effected on April 8. The line between Irak and India is completed and works well, and communication between Bussorah and Kurrachee is made in five minutes. The Persian line will be completed in July.

THE Earl of Ellenborough has introduced a Bill into Parliament with reference to capital punishment. It enacts that no sentence of death shall be carried into execution 'without the authority of one of the Secretaries of State.' Every judge after sentence of death is to make a report thereof to the Secretary of State, and thereupon the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and certain members of the Privy Council are to meet and advise Her Majesty. If Her Majesty desire to be present, the great officers of State are to be summoned. The Secretary of State will after much such meeting receive the orders resolved on. The Bill is confined to England, and does not affect the royal prerogative of mercy.

MR. FRANK SMEDLEY died on Sunday last in London. His novels, 'Frank Fairleigh,' 'Lewis Arundel,' and 'Harry Coverdale's Courtship' have achieved a great and well-deserved popularity. Few men have possessed in so remarkable a degree the power of describing English country life, and none have drawn such vivid and charming pictures of the noble animals which afford to English gentlemen delights unparalleled in other countries.

IT is officially announced that the Rev. Samuel Crowther, a pure-blooded negro, born in Africa, is to be ordained Bishop of Niger. He will be the first Anglican bishop of his race and colour.

The Court granted a rule nisi to set aside the proceedings.

IN the year 1833 Mr. George Hutchison, a cashier in the Bank of England, died, leaving two children, a son William, born 1822, and a daughter born in 1818. A Mr. Smee was trustee and executor to the will of Mr. Hutchison, and also guardian of his children. Mr. Smee had a son who married the daughter of the testator. In 1843 William Hutchison went to the University of Cambridge and became a student of Trinity College. In 1845 he went to Italy, and there made the acquaintance of Dr. Faber, who was a member of the University of Oxford. Shortly afterwards Mr. William Hutchison informed Mrs. Smee, his sister, of his intention of embracing the Roman Catholic religion; and, in answer to such information, he received from Mr. Smee, his sister's husband, a long letter couched in the most violent language, and replete with abuse of the religion which the writer called 'the Papacy,' and to which he had long ago prophesied that the Puseyites were going. Two other epistles followed, in which the friends of Mr. Hutchison were spoken of as 'relentless inhuman demons,' and Dr. Faber denominated as an 'ambitious villain' and 'a debased man.' The letters were also full of righteous denunciation and Scriptural quotations. However, inasmuch as the writer complained that his business had been impaired by the action of Mr. Hutchison, the reader might be tempted to think that worldly considerations were not entirely put out of sight. In December 1845 Mr. Hutchison joined the Roman Catholic Church, and in August 1847 was ordained a priest. In 1848 Dr. Newman established the community of the Oratory near Birmingham, and the 'Wilfridians,' of whom Mr. Hutchison was one, joined the Oratory. Subsequently the members were divided, and Dr. Faber, Mr. Hutchison, and others came to London and established themselves in King William Street. In 1850, the community removed to Brompton. Mr. Hutchison occupied himself all this time in works of charity and devotion; he established ragged schools near Holborn, and in Charles Street, Drury Lane, and personally superintended them. In 1855, he travelled in France and Belgium, and went to Rome. In 1856, he again went to Rome to make arrangements with the Pope about the business of the congregation. In 1857 and 1858, he travelled in the East, and subsequently published some letters and documents relating to his travels. From that time, with the exception of visits to Filey and to Switzerland for the sake of his health, he resided in the Oratory at Brompton, and in that at Sydenham till his death in July 1863. By his will, dated July 1860, he left his property to Dr. Faber, and in case of non-survivorship to the Rev. Charles Bowden; Dr. Faber survived his friend, but died a few months afterwards. This will was disputed by Mr. Smee, on the ground of infirmity of mind and undue influence; and the case was heard last week in the Probate Court. The Rev. George Ballard was called as a witness in support of the will, and gave some interesting information with regard to the Brompton Oratory. He stated that it was one of the few religious orders in which no vows were taken beyond those of the priesthood. There was no distinct vow of poverty or obedience, and the members could withdraw from the community at their pleasure. All the members contributed a small annual sum by way of commons; with that exception, they had the perfect control of their own property. Any questions as to the common property of the society were decided by the votes of a majority of the members. The deputies were elected by ballot triennially. The congregation could dissolve itself by a unanimous vote. The Superior was elected by ballot every three years. The members signed no rules. The Superior could not enforce obedience, or direct penance or mortification. He exercised a moral power only. The witness also said that Dr. Faber was a man of considerable distinction and ability, and of remarkably pleasing manners, and was very much beloved by men of both religions. Dr. Faber and Mr. Hutchison were much attached to each other; but the influence of Dr. Faber would not supersede the exercise of private judgment. This witness also spoke to the state of Mr. Hutchison's mind at the time of the execution of the will. Sir Henry Holland, who met Mr. Hutchison on Mount Carmel, and the Rev. George Williams, Senior Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, who has published many books and reviews of great merit on Palestine, and who had been in frequent communication with Mr. Hutchison on the subject of such publications, gave evidence establishing the competency of the testator. Sir James Fergusson, M.P., Mr. David Lewis, and the Rev. Mr. Rowe gave similar evidence. The defendant and two medical men gave evidence in support of the theory that Mr. Hutchison was incapacitated from making a will, but the Court pronounced for the will, and condemned the defendant in costs. The property left amounts to about 5,000*l.*, Mr. Hutchison having spent the bulk of a fortune of 40,000*l.* in works of charity and for the purposes of the Oratory.

In the Upper House of Convocation, on April 20, the Bishop of Oxford moved for a Committee to report on a gravamen brought up from the Lower House on the subject of a condemnation of a book known as 'Essays and Reviews.' His Lordship said that the question of a condemnation by the House had been allowed to slumber pending the prosecution of the book before the Court of Arches. He did not think that it would be understood that there was any intention on the part of that House to frown down opinions, or to assert that men of active and enquiring minds were to be stifled in their pursuit of truth. But clergymen of our Church seemed to be bound, as long as they held a commission in the Church, to teach what the Church taught, neither more nor less; and if a man in such a position could not say what the Church said, it was only right that he should say what he thought in some other place. It was not under the notion of compelling thought under authority that he considered this action desirable. Such a course would be most mischievous; but the Church, as a Church having a definite faith, gave clergymen the power of teaching upon conditions, the leading condition being that they had satisfied themselves of the correctness of that faith, and bound themselves by subscription to teach that faith, and that they were precluded from teaching what was contrary to that faith. The Church had reason to complain when her ordained clergy put forth publications which denied, as he believed this book of 'Essays and Reviews' denied, miracles as being real and true, the inspiration of God's Word as being anything ascertainable so as to convey authority to the mind of the receiver. He might go on to say, that while he for one should deprecate speculation on the state of the accursed, and confine himself to using the words of our Lord and of the universal Church—not attempting to explain anything beyond that—he was not bound to give a new theory if those words were contradicted, but simply to assert that they meant what their plain literal meaning implied. He would not attack any person, or desire to put down opinion by authority; but he did most earnestly desire to protect the Church from complicity with false teaching in the persons of her ministers.—The discussion was resumed on the following day. The Bishop of London addressed the House, and 'held that this gravamen was only the petition of certain individuals, and not the work of the Lower House. The report which came from the Lower House was in fact the report of one individual. Of all the foolish productions it had ever been the misfortune of controversy to call out, this was the worst, and was more calculated than anything he had ever seen to injure the Christian faith, inasmuch as it consisted of extracts from the volume in parallel columns with extracts from the articles and formularies of the Church. The sooner that document was committed to the flames, the better. The Committee, if appointed, would be asked to pronounce a synodal judgment. That judgment must be judicial, or else nugatory. If it differed from that of the Privy Council, it would be an impossible attempt on the part of the House to override the Council. Nothing was more dangerous than the feeling that it was necessary to do something. Men had not faith enough to believe that God who had watched over the Church would continue to watch over it still, and they came forward with their petty and temporary devices in order to aid God, which He was able to do well enough for Himself. He must express his conviction that in quietness and confidence the strength of the Church of England lay in this age, and that persons in their high position should not be parties to the increase of an agitation which he feared had already done some harm. It was a most painful thing that every deacon throughout the country had been called upon to subscribe that melancholy declaration. He rejoiced to know that the clergy of the diocese of London had maintained their calmness throughout all the recent storms. He did not think that the Church was in danger because the highest court of appeal had said that a clergyman was not legally liable for holding that statements with regard to physical science in the Bible were not the inspired word of God, nor did he believe that the Church was in danger because a clergyman might think that God in His infinite mercy might find a means of escape for lost souls.' The Bishop was understood to refer to Dr. Pusey as the 'one individual,' and to allude to the Oxford Declaration, which was drawn up by way of protest against the judgment of the Privy Council, and circulated for signature among the clergy. The words of that document have been given in our columns on a former occasion. The question before their Lordships was, after a long debate, put to the vote, when five bishops (viz. Oxford, Llandaff, Salisbury, Gloucester, and Bangor) voted for the appointment of a Committee, and five (viz. London, St. David's, Lichfield, Lincoln, and Ely) voted against the appointment. Thereupon the Archbishop of Canterbury gave a casting vote in favour of appointing the Committee.

THE CONTINENT.

The victory at Düppel was followed by a short breathing-time for the victors to exult over their conquest, and heap honours on the commanders in this strange game of war where the success of one side was certain, and for the vanquished to bury away their dead out of their sight and concert if possible a new scheme of resistance. Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia and Field-Marshal von Wrangel have been respectively made Colonels-Proprietors of the 7th Austrian Hussars and 2nd Cuirassiers, an honour somewhat similar to that of the colonelcy of an English regiment in the old days when the regimental clothing was a valuable source of income to its commander. On the other side the city of Copenhagen is stricken with mourning; as in Egypt after the dread night of the Passover, 'there is not a house where there is not one dead;' a grand military funeral has been celebrated, in which Bishop Monrad officiated in his episcopal capacity; it was attended by the King, the Ministers, and the whole city of Copenhagen. To Major Rosen, the second in command of General Duplat's staff, the honour of a special funeral was reserved in honour of his heroic courage and devoted death; he was stricken down while attempting to rescue his wounded general from further peril.

In the meanwhile it has been necessary to take some decisive steps with regard to the Danish army, or what is left of it after the decimation of Düppel. The first step taken was the evacuation of the island of Alsen. Little by little its defenders were withdrawn; the first three battalions were transferred to the Island of Fünen on the evening following the capture of Düppel; the guards followed shortly after, finally the head-quarters were moved; now one division only of two or three thousand men with twelve field-pieces is left, rather to assert the right of possession than to offer any effectual protection. A very short deliberation must also have made it manifest to the Danish Ministry that if Düppel was untenable, Fredericia is at least as much so. Though well fitted for withstanding the artillery of twenty years ago, with solid well-built bastions and all the requirements of the past generation of engineers, it cannot stand for three days against the modern gun-practice; more particularly is it deficient in casemates, so that the garrison and town would be alike exposed without protection to the Prussian shells, which would be poured in with fatal accuracy at a distance of two miles. Under these circumstances nothing remained but to withdraw the defenders: all the more valuable war matériel was removed, and the remaining guns spiked; the garrison has retired into the island of Fünen; the Allied forces may advance and occupy the whole of Jutland at their leisure. Of this permission the Prussian forces have not been slow to take advantage; all but a small portion of the north of the peninsula is now in their hands; they have levied a contribution of 100,000 thalers towards the cost of the war; the inhabitants have refused to pay it, and Field-Marshal von Wrangel has consequently sent eleven of their number as hostages to Prussia. His next step will, we suppose, be to sell the remaining inhabitants into slavery—at least that was the common practice at the time when the taking of private citizens as hostages was a recognised principle of warfare.

We have had occasion to remark upon the threatened appearance of an Austrian fleet in the Baltic, and to observe that the threat was some little time in being realised. The course of events has again brought forward a report of this intention; it has, however, been distinctly negatived by the Austrian Cabinet, who are probably quite as well aware as London politicians that such a proceeding would be to thrust their head into the lion's mouth, and to enable England to take a most satisfactory guarantee for the pacific nature of the Austrian intentions.

The external politics of Europe are at this moment focussed in the Conference of London; not only the hopes and fears, the aspirations and prejudices, but the very spitefulness and insolence, the cunning and intrigue of the different nations represented, have been displayed and exaggerated on the small arena of the Downing Street council-table. The Conference was originally postponed through the tardiness of Herr von Beust, which fitly represented the somewhat undignified procrastination of his principals; the first business meeting was abruptly brought to a close by the refusal of the German envoys to discuss the question of an armistice without further communications with their Governments. We are to believe that the Cabinets of Vienna and Berlin had never heard of the proposal of an armistice when they sent forth their representatives, or that they thought it too distant a prospect to admit of definite instructions; of course we may not conclude that they wilfully refused to give the necessary instructions in order to have another pretext for lengthening out their inglorious war. Of the many reports with regard to the question of an armistice, the only one which we need notice is that which states that no armistice will be agreed to by the German Powers which does not take off the blockade of the Baltic ports.

An unofficial Congress of Sovereigns will very probably take place at Kissingen, on or about May 15. The Emperor and Empress of Russia will repair thither on that date, and will be met there by the Emperor and Empress of Austria; it is not improbable that the King of Prussia may find himself in the neighbourhood about the same time. As to princelets and dukelets to make up the under-stratum of such a réunion, there is no lack of them in that quarter.

The Pope had occasion recently to make some remarks upon the grievances of the Church in Poland. He said that the Emperor of Russia, after having driven his subjects to insurrection, now endeavours, under the pretext of suppressing the rebellion, to extirpate the Roman Catholic religion, and transports whole populations into frozen countries, exiles bishops, and deprives them of the functions to which they had been ordained by the hand of the Pope. His Holiness continued: 'Nobody will venture to say that I wish to maintain revolution by these necessary protests. I protest in order to satisfy my conscience, and that I may not one day hear the Sovereign Judge ask, "Why didst thou remain silent?"' This address of the Pope, which is generally called an improviso, has produced a great impression in Rome; the energetic language, enhanced by the most magnificent voice in Europe and a dignified even apostolic presence, was well calculated to enforce the admiration of his supporters, and the respect of those who refuse to acknowledge his power. The Russian chargé d'affaires has asked for an explanation of the Pope's allocution; Cardinal Antonelli has in answer to him defended the right of the Pope to make such remarks if they seem necessary to him. We may observe here that Mgr. Felinski, the Archbishop of Warsaw, has published an order discontinuing the use of mourning in the churches of his diocese.

The Re Galantuomo, the Italian frigate, concerning which fears were lately expressed, has touched at Gibraltar, and taken in coals. She suffered severely from heavy weather in the Atlantic, lost one of her masts, and sprang a leak; she was obliged to throw all her lower-deck guns overboard, and it was probably while in this condition that she was spoken with somewhere north of the Bermudas. She is now on her way to Naples.

A new Ministry has been formed in Greece by M. Balbi, who takes the Presidency of the Council and Ministry of Finance; M. Angerino is Minister of the Interior; M. Papazaphiropulo Minister of Justice and Public Worship; M. Zimbrakaki Minister of War; M. Canaris Minister of Marine; M. Caligas Minister of Foreign Affairs. The question of the Ionian elections has come before the National Assembly, and has been satisfactorily settled. Count Sponneck, the Danish adviser of His Majesty George I., appears to have aroused some opposition to his conduct; we must hope that this is only the reflection of the odium which the Foreign Ministers of the late King of Greece seem to have so richly merited.

Disturbances have taken place at Tunis of such magnitude as to warrant the appearance of English, French, and Italian ships of war on the spot. The army has revolted, and on the 25th instant had encamped at a distance of one day's march from the city. The Bey has taken some measures to appease the public indignation, one of them being a reduction of the capitation-tax from 72 to 36 piastres per head, but he still refuses to dismiss two of his Ministers against whom the popular cry is mainly levelled. The imperial and suzerain Government of Turkey has sent one or two vessels of war to act in concert with those of the Western Powers in defending their respective fellow-citizens. By the latest advices we learn that the insurrection is becoming general; 20,000 Bedouins have cut off the communications between Tunis and the provinces, and occupied Kirvan.

Some time ago General Narvaez attacked the Spanish Government with some bitterness for having taken no steps to wrest Gibraltar from English domination. Any future diatribes on the part of that gentleman will be spared if the scheme of M. Laya be carried out; he proposes to cut a vast canal through the Spanish territory, joining the waters of the Atlantic and Mediterranean, and thus rendering the possession of the naked rock useless. Schemes not a whit more extravagant than this have been received favourably by the public. M. de Lesseps is perfectly sanguine as to the ultimate and permanent success of the Suez Canal; nor were the Federals of America particularly astounded at the proposal once made and actually attempted to divert the waters of the Mississippi from below the walls of Vicksburg. Four or five millions sterling will pay the little bill, a sum no doubt easily raised in a country of such affluence as Spain; and then the advantage of humbling England must be considered as worth some expenditure.

We regret to have to announce the death of M. Meyerbeer, the author of 'Robert le Diable,' 'Les Huguenots,' 'Le Prophète,' and other operas known throughout the whole world of music. This illustrious master was born at Berlin in 1794; he showed early talents for music, and was a fellow-pupil of Weber under the Abbé Vogler at Darmstadt at the age of 15. In his style he has carried the power of sound, per se, to its highest allowable pitch, and has thus paved the way for the modern German school of music. While at times he terrifies his audience with the amazing breadth and volume of sound in which he exults, he can also charm them to tears by the delicate manipulation of his subject and the exquisite pathos of his melody. He lived and died in the Jewish persuasion, like Halévy, his brother and competitor, whom he has followed so closely to the grave.

The Paris Moniteur is known as the type and principal of official papers. It contains the official documents, decrees, &c., the report of the debates, telegraphic despatches and explanations of them, reports of any remarkable doings in French society, and a general padding of anecdotes and faits divers somewhat of the 'enormous gooseberry' class. An abridgment of this journal, containing little more than the two latter items, has lately been issued in an evening edition for the sum of five centimes.

The draft of a law has been read in the French Legislative Chamber proposing to deal with the coalitions of workmen, or trades' unions. The law on this subject has varied a great deal during the last seventy years, beginning with an absolute prohibition of such coalitions in 1791, and modified by a relaxation in favour of deliberative meetings of workmen in the year XI. of the Republic, and afterwards in the year 1849. The committee now appointed to report on the matter nominated M. Emile Ollivier as their spokesman. This gentleman, though in the Opposition, has displayed great fairness in his statement of the case. He recapitulated all the history bearing on the question, examining into the motives, both political and social, which influenced former legislators. He came to the conclusion that all prohibition should be removed from the association of workmen, whether for purposes of deliberation or for 'strikes,' in the assurance that the misery attending all unjust strikes would soon teach the artisan class the necessity of using their liberty and not abusing it. The principal speakers on the question have been M. Jules Simon and M. Garnier-Pagès. The latter was well answered on behalf of Government by M. Cornaudet. The debate on the principle of the Bill has closed, and the articles or details of the Bill have been carried by the usual majority.

The Protestant Church of France has not been less troubled with variance of opinion than its more powerful sister in England. M. Coquerel, a Protestant minister in Paris, well known to the visitors of that city for his singular eloquence and persuasiveness, has expressed certain opinions which show a decided 'proclivity' for the doctrines of M. Ernest Renan; M. Coquerel is further known to be a personal friend of the latter gentleman. These circumstances have given the ruling elders of that Church occasion to censure their pastor's views, and to suspend him from the further use of their pulpit. M. Guizot, a leading member of that Church, has expressed himself strongly on the subject, declaring that a line must be drawn somewhere to mark the limit of orthodox religious speculation. We may record here that M. Renan is about to add to the 'Vie de Jésus' the 'Vie de St. Paul' and 'Vie de St. Jean.'

AN insurrection has broken out in Algeria, not however of much importance. The French journals, while they see nothing extraordinary in the event, express some dissatisfaction with Marshal Pelissier, the Governor of Algeria, to whose apathy it may, according to them, be largely attributed. The Marshal has addressed a circular to the Arabs, in which, after declaring the intention of France to punish insurrection, he utterly repudiates any desire on the part of his Government to abolish Arab chieftainships and native offices; he refers them in confirmation to the Emperor's letter of February 3, 1863, in which His Majesty says he is 'the Emperor of the Arabs as well as the Emperor of the French.' By the last advices, dated April 27, the French troops were masters of the situation in the southern division of Oran, and no possibility existed of any further spread of the insurrection. The French army has, however, suffered severe losses. A sudden attack was made on a party of about 600 men under the command of Colonel Beauprêtre by an overwhelming force of natives. After seven hours' heroic endurance under fire, the loss of the French amounted to 200 under the head of 'killed' alone, among whom were 5 officers, viz. one colonel, two captains, and two lieutenants; the party was in fact literally cut to pieces. The Marabout Si-Seliman was killed by Colonel Beauprêtre with his own hand at the beginning of the affray.

IT appears that the Emperor of the French, however anxious to see his empire expand to its just proportions under the invigorating influences of peace, is fated never to see the temple of Janus close its gates. Scarcely is the affair at Mexico concluded before the Arabs in Algeria revolt; and even before that revolt is checked, we find another Power claiming to measure arms with the first military Power in the world. Who is this, we may ask, who thinks himself worthy of so high an honour? What battle-fields can he name, what victories can he show blazoned on his battle-flag, as pledges and credentials of his right to cross swords with a French soldier? Or, on the other hand, what woful tale of injustice can he relate, what persistent course of tyranny and despotic insolence, what outrages on humanity can he bring forward to justify him in so desperate a step, and to enlist our sympathies against the high-handed oppressor? Alas for the requirements of logic, for the expectations of common sense! It is General Banks, the despot of New Orleans, the emancipator, the enslaver, the bully of peaceful citizens and of women, the worthy successor of Butler—who declares that the Monroe doctrine has been outraged by the French conduct in Mexico—that American liberty is compromised by the substitution of order for anarchy in that country—that war with France is inevitable. The 'Defenders of the Monroe Doctrine' have their mystic lodge in New Orleans, with pass-words, grip, and ritual; they number among their brethren the officers of the Federal army; they acknowledge as grand patron General Banks himself; they look to a war with France as the natural and necessary end of their aspirations. Eager to accept any aid, without regard to its nature or quality, they suffer Michael Hahn, the notable 'Free' State Governor of Louisiana, the puppet and creature of General Banks, to say that, 'if ever one nation was justified in going to war with another, we (i. e. the Federals) would be justified in going to war with France.'

THE Unità Cattolica gives the text of the allocution addressed by the Pope to the Emperor and Empress of Mexico, before administering to them the Communion in the Vatican. In the course of it his Holiness says: 'In the name of God I recommend to you the prosperity of the Catholic people who have been intrusted to you. Great are the rights of the people, and they must be satisfied; but greater and more sacred are the rights of the Church, the spotless spouse of Jesus Christ, who has redeemed us with his blood—that blood which is now to crimson your lips. You will, therefore, respect the rights of the people and of the Church, and will thus labour for the temporal and spiritual welfare of your subjects.'

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THE MERSEY STEAM-RAMS.

On Friday, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Derby moved for the production of the correspondence between the Government and Messrs. Laird. This correspondence has already been published by Messrs. Laird, and the object of the motion was merely to bring the subject under the notice of the House.

After commenting on the previous refusal of the Government to produce the correspondence, and protesting against the course that had been pursued with other correspondence of refusing it to one House and granting it to the other, the Earl of Derby adverted to the position of the Messrs. Laird. They are young men, now conducting one of the largest shipbuilding establishments in the world, being at this time constructing an iron-plated steam frigate for the Government. The father of these young men, on retiring from business, was elected member for Birkenhead in opposition to a strong supporter of Her Majesty's Government. His Lordship then adverted to the correspondence which he held in his hand, and from which he read copious extracts. It will be remembered that Mr. Adams made repeated remonstrances about the rams to Earl Russell, and on September 1 received an answer that the Government could not interfere because 'there was no legal evidence against M. Bravay's claim, nor anything to affect him with any illegal act or purpose.' On September 3, Mr. Adams wrote a more pressing letter, and next day Earl Russell informed him that these matters were under the consideration of the Government. On September 5, Mr. Layard wrote to Mr. Stuart (representing the British Government in Washington during the absence of Lord Lyons) that orders had been given to prevent the rams leaving the Mersey, and he adds, 'Mr. Adams is not yet aware that orders have been given to stop the vessels; you may inform Mr. Seward confidentially of the fact.' And Mr. Adams was kept in the dark until the 8th, when he too was informed that the rams should not leave the Mersey. It was about this time the correspondence with Messrs. Laird in reference to the vessels commenced. On September 4, they wrote to the Collector of Customs at Liverpool to say that as many rumours were afloat about the rams, inducing frequent and unusual visits from the Surveyor of Customs, they would save further trouble by promising to give a week's notice of their intention to deliver them over to the owners. This note also stated that one vessel would not be ready for a month, and the other for nearly two months. The Collector of Customs thanked Messrs. Laird for the communication, which he felt certain would be highly satisfactory to the Board of Customs; 'and,' said the Earl of Derby, 'I here take the opportunity of saying that throughout the whole of this correspondence all those who had to deal with these gentlemen—the authorities of the Customs, Captain Inglefield, Admiral Dacres—one and all express in the strongest language their entire and absolute reliance on the good faith of the Messrs. Laird.' On September 5, the firm wrote to the Foreign Office (in reply to a letter of enquiry) that although it was unusual to give up the names of parties for whom ships are building, yet in this case they had obtained the permission of the owners, and that the vessels were being built for Messrs. A. Bravay & Co., of Paris, and that they were to be delivered in the port of Liverpool. Mr. Laird, sen., told him (the Earl of Derby) that he had built fifty vessels for the English and foreign Governments, and that his contract invariably was to deliver in the port of Liverpool unless requested to do otherwise by the English Government. Upon receiving this information, Her Majesty's Government directed the naval attaché to the Embassy at Paris to wait on M. Bravay. He did so, and reported himself perfectly satisfied with the bonâ-fide ownership of M. Bravay. On September 8, Messrs. Laird informed the Collector of Customs at Liverpool that it was their intention to take the El Tousson for a trial trip, and that after the trial the vessel would be brought into the Birkenhead Float, where it was intended to complete her. The Collector replied that he could not allow the trial trip without the leave of the Government, and on the 17th again wrote to the firm, saying that the trial trip would be allowed, 'relying upon the honourable engagement which has been given by you that the ship shall, after the usual trial trip, be brought back again to Liverpool, and shall not leave without a week's notice.' Meanwhile, Messrs. Laird had received a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, informing them that the vessels 'are not to be permitted to leave the Mersey until satisfactory evidence can be given of their destination, or at least until the enquiries which are now being prosecuted with a view to obtain such evidence shall have been brought to a conclusion.' The Earl of Derby denounced this proceeding as utterly unwarranted by law, and one for which there was not the slightest justification. He could understand a seizure, for that would involve a trial, and give the parties an opportunity of vindicating their conduct, but detention until guilt or innocence was proved is 'inconsistent with the first principles of English law and justice.' The Government ought not to call upon a person to prove his innocence, but is bound to prove the guilt of the accused. The Attorney-General admitted that the Government had taken that course to prevent an evasion of the law, and to this Sir Hugh Cairns had replied by saying, 'Well, then, the answer on the part of Her Majesty's Government is, "We have violated the law for the purpose of vindicating the law."' No lawyer in the House of Lords will 'venture to say that Her Majesty's Government were justified in detaining the vessels without cause shown, and for an indefinite period.' On September 19, two days after permission had been given for the trial trip, the Secretary of the Treasury informed Messrs. Laird that though Her Majesty's Government were convinced that they would do all in their power to honourably fulfil their engagement, they feared that an attempt might be made to seize the vessel, and therefore the trial trip would not be allowed, 'except under provision against any forcible abduction of the vessels.' Was the vessel to be seized by the hands of Messrs. Laird, or by other vessels making an attack upon this powerful ram, and carrying her off to sea? At that time the whole Channel fleet was in the Mersey, and an unusually large population was crowding the river who could not be peaceable witnesses of any such attempt. On the 19th Admiral Dacres was visiting his Lordship at Knowsley, and 'a message came to say that there was not a moment to lose, for that he (Admiral Dacres) was charged by Her Majesty's Government to take measures to prevent the escape of the steam-rams.' Admiral Dacres went to Liverpool, was treated with the greatest openness and candour by the Messrs. Laird, and returned to Knowsley. 'It occurred to me then,' said his Lordship, 'and it occurs to me now, that the gallant Admiral was sent on a fool's errand.' On the 21st Messrs. Laird wrote to the Government that they were not aware of any attempt being made to seize the vessels; but under such circumstances, and as the vessel was incomplete and the river Mersey crowded, it would be better to defer the trial trip. They added: 'In the meantime, we trust that Her Majesty's Government will be able to obtain further information as to any project that may exist to deprive us of our property.' On September 24, the Government informed Messrs. Laird that the trial trip was to be allowed. On October 7, the Government informed Messrs. Laird that as the trial trip 'has been abandoned' (it had been postponed, not abandoned, by Messrs. Laird), it became necessary to take additional measures of precaution. A Custom-house officer was to be placed on board the vessel, with authority to seize her if any attempt was made to remove her from the float or dock where she was then stationed, and Her Majesty's ship Majestic was to afford any necessary aid or protection. It was added that these precautions were not taken from any distrust of Messrs. Laird, nor to prevent the completion of the vessel, but for the purpose of preventing an attempt that might be made by other parties to seize the vessel. Messrs. Laird offered no objection, and the Custom-house officer came on board. What was the position of the vessel at the time? She was in the dock in the midst of other vessels, the dock gates could not be opened except at particular times of the tide, and she had not her steam up nor fuel on board. The authorities might have adopted the simple expedient of removing the rudder, or displacing some portion of the machinery, so that it would have been impossible to remove the vessel suddenly. 'Could anything be more ridiculous than the apprehension of the seizure of such a vessel in its incomplete state in the middle of the port of Liverpool?' On October 9, the Government wrote to say that in consequence of information as to the probable abduction of one or both of the vessels, they had ordered the seizure of both of the vessels. The second vessel was a mere hulk, without masts, funnel, or steering apparatus. She was lying in the private yard of Messrs. Laird, and could not be floated out of the dock unless the sluices were opened, the keys of which were in Messrs. Laird's custody. His Lordship then showed the connection, from the papers that had been submitted to Parliament, between Mr. Adams's remonstrances and the proceedings of the Government in reference to the steam-rams. Although the rumour about the seventy men discharged from the Florida being intended to seize one of the vessels was unfounded, yet there can be no doubt that the alarm of the Government was genuine. The Government thought it necessary to have the Liverpool and a gunboat, as well as the Majestic, to watch the steam-rams; and when it was proposed to withdraw the Liverpool, a first-class ironclad was despatched to Liverpool in an incomplete state, and was within an ace of foundering in the Channel. So far as this alarm was caused by the presence of part of the crew of the Florida, it was manifestly uncalled for. When those discharged seamen arrived at Liverpool, Captain Bullock was not there, and they applied to a firm for payment of their notes, and payment was refused on the ground that the said firm was not liable. Then the men—'these dreadful depredators, conspirators, and incendiaries, who, in their mad love for the Confederates, were about to venture on a deed of unparalleled audacity—went to the United States Consul.' That person sent them to a lawyer, who, on September 17, made a formal demand on the firm supposed to be liable for the wages, and, after an action had been commenced, the affair was arranged and the men were paid. [We call special attention to these circumstances. On September 24 Mr. Adams wrote to Earl Russell: 'I am credibly informed that seventy or more of the men belonging to the insurgent vessel the Florida, formerly the Oreto, nearly all of them British subjects, have been sent over from Brest, and are now in Liverpool. They were provided with a letter to the person acting on behalf of the insurgents at Liverpool, a copy of which is herewith transmitted. . . . . I have further reason to believe that under this sentence is intended a transfer of many of these men to one of the ironclad war vessels now in preparation at Liverpool, with intent to carry on war against the United States.' Yet we now learn from Earl Derby that seven days before this, on September 17, Mr. Carr, the attorney of the United States Consul, was acting for the men against the Confederates. The inference is too plain for evasion. When Mr. Adams sought to frighten the Government about the men having some connection with the ironclad vessel, he knew that he was concocting or giving currency to a falsehood.] On October 24, Messrs. Laird were informed that the trial trip could not take place 'that week or within any other suitable time,' and, on the 27th, that the vessels were detained for a breach of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and that the workmen would be removed. The subsequent proceedings were extraordinary. The vessels were perfectly secure in the docks, but they were moved into the estuary, where there was no other protection than the guns of Her Majesty's ship. Messrs. Laird represented that taking the vessels into the river at that inclement season involved a great risk of damage, but the Government paid no heed to the remonstrance. On October 29, Messrs. Laird sent a formal protest to the Admiralty, the Foreign Office, and the Treasury, in which, after detailing the circumstances, they wrote: 'We need hardly say that we hold the Government responsible to us for the large pecuniary loss we shall sustain by these arbitrary proceedings.' On December 7, Messrs. Laird again remonstrated, representing the risk the vessels incurred, and enquiring if the Government had insured or intended to insure them against fire and loss by sea. This led to a proposal from the Government to the effect that the vessels should be insured provided Messrs. Laird would agree to repay the cost if the vessels were adjudged to them! Messrs. Laird declined to do this, as the risk arose from their being taken from their docks and moored in the river. Several letters were sent by Messrs. Laird, and on January 20 'a response is vouchsafed from the Treasury, saying Her Majesty's Government would do what from the first they were bound to have done—namely, provide against the risks from fire and other dangers whilst the vessels remained in possession of Her Majesty's Government.' On January 12, Messrs. Laird made a proposition to the Government to the effect that the vessels should be placed in the Birkenhead Docks, at the top end of the Great Float, about a mile from the entrance, the Government retaining possession by an armed force. In that case, Messrs. Laird would complete their contract, and put additional fittings on board of great value. If the vessels were forfeited, they would be more complete: if they were released, they would be ready for delivery. By this Messrs. Laird showed they were not conscious of any guilt, and it was a proposal by which the Government could not lose and might gain. But the only reply was an absolute refusal. 'It was a self-stultifying policy on the part of the Government.' On January 25, Messrs. Laird called the attention of the Government to the fact that, though the vessels had been seized for several months, no steps had been taken to bring the matter to trial. On February 3 they wrote again, and said they were informed by their legal advisers that the case might have been brought to trial in November or January. On February 8 they were informed that an information would be filed in a few days, and that it was necessary to send a commission abroad for the purpose of collecting evidence. 'To send,' said his Lordship, 'a commission abroad for the purpose of collecting evidence on February 8! Why, four months before the Government had actually seized these vessels on a charge of violating the Foreign Enlistment Act, and a month before that they had illegally detained them upon no evidence or information whatever, and at the end of four months they inform the owners of these vessels, which had been lying through the whole winter unprotected in the open estuary of the Mersey, whereby they had been prevented from completing their contract, that they are about to send out a commission for the purpose of obtaining evidence.' His Lordship then referred to the Mallory Report forgery, which he considers 'one of the most extraordinary transactions that ever occurred in the history of diplomacy.' It was a clumsy forgery, though it took in Her Majesty's Government and the Attorney-General. It was addressed to the House of Representatives, and not, as is usual with such reports, to the President. It stated five rams were ordered in England, whereas only two were ever held or assumed to be building for the Confederates. It entered into no details whatever about the internal management of the Naval Department, which was the main object of the reports of the Secretary of the Navy. 'Lastly, it gave information, as from the President, that these rams had been ordered by persons sent from Richmond in the early part of the year 1863. If that was so, the expedition displayed in their construction must have been something surprising and unheard of, because they were represented by the United States Consul to be ready for sailing in the month of August, and if the agents sent from Richmond in the early part of the year arrived in England, looked about them, gave their orders, had them executed, and got the vessels launched and ready for sailing in the month of August, it is the most astounding feat in shipbuilding ever heard of.' On the strength of this forgery Mr. Crawford was sent to remonstrate with the authorities at Richmond. Fortunately for the Government, the Federals would not let him proceed on his mission and make these remonstrances, which he (Earl Derby) 'was mischievous enough to wish he had been permitted to make.' This forgery was a grave matter, and ought not to have been treated lightly by Earl Russell. Mr. Seward ought to have made enquiries before accepting the report as genuine, and he had the opportunity of doing so. The forgery first appeared in a very obscure paper in Washington (the Star), and was thence transferred to the New York Times, which 'is notoriously the organ of Mr. Seward' and 'is under the control of Mr. Seward.' After reading from the Philadelphia Age an article severely censuring the forgery, his Lordship observed: 'I thought it but right to bring these statements under your Lordships' notice, to show the light in which the matter is viewed by some persons in America, and I must express my disappointment that not even the last despatch from Lord Lyons contains any expression of feeling with respect to the discreditable trick which was played on him. We do not even know up to the present moment whether any apology has been made to Her Majesty's Government for, to say the least of it, the credulity with which Mr. Adams and Mr. Seward have laid themselves open to be charged.' In conclusion, he said: 'I have brought forward this subject, not for the purpose of protecting the Messrs. Laird against any consequences to which they may be fairly liable, or entering into the question whether they have or have not been guilty of a violation of the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act. All I desire is that justice may be done. I have no wish that persons should be permitted to violate the law with impunity. I hope the noble Earl will continue in the same course which, he says, he has always adopted, of dealing with all parties with the utmost impartiality. I am anxious to see an equitable neutrality preserved between those who are engaged in the unhappy conflict raging on the other side of the Atlantic. But, while I entertain these views, I do not like to find legal proceedings unjustly and unnecessarily delayed, and I am desirous of seeing all Her Majesty's subjects enjoying the full benefit of that protection which the laws of the country were framed to confer.'

Earl Russell began by submitting two propositions to their Lordships: first, that it was desired to maintain friendly relations with the United States; and, secondly, that the power of going to war was a prerogative of the Crown, and Messrs. Laird had 'no right to go to war with any Power in friendly relations with Her Majesty.' He then argued that if the rams were building for the Confederates and got out, it would incur a risk of war with the United States, that Messrs. Laird were building the rams, and therefore that Messrs. Laird were trying to go to war with the United States. He was not surprised that the Confederates, in their struggle for independence, should do all they could to hurt their enemies, but he was surprised that Englishmen — Messrs. Laird, Messrs. Miller, and Messrs. Fraser — should do all in their power to give the United States just cause of war. Be it remembered, this is only Earl Russell's opinion — an opinion from which it appears judges and juries differ.] He did not regret detaining the rams in the least. His Lordship said: 'Only suppose that instead of Foreign Secretary I had been Home Secretary, and that I had information, on which I could rely, that a treasonable plot was about to break forth — that parties meditating high treason were on the eve of completing their bad designs against the internal peace and welfare of the kingdom. Under such circumstances, I should have no hesitation for a moment in desiring that those parties should be detained. The information might be wrong, but if I felt I had reason to believe it, it would be my duty as Secretary of State to take the reponsibility of directing the apprehension of the parties.' [This was the only part of his Lordship's speech that touched upon the question at issue, and, we submit, it tells against the Government. No doubt the Home Secretary can and ought, in case of treason, to 'detain' and 'apprehend' parties upon his warrant. That he can do legally, but what follows? Can the parties be detained for months upon suspicion, and without any evidence being offered of their guilt? Surely Earl Russell does not think the Habeas Corpus is suspended in this country as well as in the United States. The persons so apprehended would be forthwith brought to an examination that would give them an opportunity of rebutting the charges brought against them. The complaint against the Government is that in the case of the steam-rams they did not proceed according to law and equity, that they did not seize the vessels as they had a right to do, but detained them, and so prevented the owners getting any redress, and that when they did seize it was without evidence, and that months elapsed before they took any steps to submit the case to a court of law. If Earl Russell would act by persons as he has done with the rams, we ought to be infinitely glad that he has no control over the liberty of the subject.] His Lordship gave his reasons for believing the rams were destined for the Confederates, and justified the precautions that had been taken by reciting an account of the departure of the Alabama, which was ordered to be seized the day she left. His Lordship concluded by saying that the issue in America was whether or not 4,000,000 slaves would be emancipated. He did not sympathise much 'with either of the contending republics of the United and Confederate States.' 'It may be,' said his Lordship, 'that the result of this contest, the beginning of which we all deplored, the continuance of which we all regret — it may be that the end of this contest may see that sin, that crime, that detestable state of slavery for ever abolished from among civilised nations.' [What the question of emancipation has to do with the detention of the rams we know not, but there is one point of Earl Russell's speech we will not mock his Lordship by calling it a reply to Lord Derby's — that is curious and worthy of attention. Indeed, according to Earl Russell's former statements, it may lead to serious consequences. It will not be forgotten that on previous occasions his Lordship has been very particular to speak of the Confederate States as the 'so-called Confederate States;' and when, on April 6, the Marquis of Clanricarde moved for papers, the Foreign Secretary said: 'With regard to the motion of my noble friend, I suppose he will not depart from the usual form, and object to the introduction of the words "or extracts" after the word "copies," and also that he will not object to the insertion of the words "so called" before "Government of the Confederate States." Otherwise it might seem as if the House recognised the Confederate States, although Her Majesty has not done so.' Now, on Friday night, Earl Russell never once used the words 'so called,' though he frequently spoke of the Confederate States. We must not suppose the Earl of Derby's satirical remark — 'Perhaps I might borrow the noble Earl's own phraseology and say the "so-called United States"'—induced Earl Russell to make such an important change. It did not arise from his Lordship being too angry to think of what he was saying, for he was so guarded as to speak of Captain Bullock as 'a certain Captain Bullock.' But, whatever the cause, the fact remains that Earl Russell over and over again mentioned the Confederate States without the prefix 'so-called.' In short, he 'recognised the Confederate States though Her Majesty has not done so.' Does his Lordship want to give the United States just cause for war?]

Lord Chelmsford replied to Earl Russell, and contended that the Government had acted illegally, oppressively, and under pressure from the United States Government. After a few words from the Duke of Argyll in defence of the Government, the Earl of Derby said he had formally moved for the papers to enable him to bring the facts before the House. As that had been done, and as the papers were already in his hands, he did not care whether they were produced or not. Earl Russell said he would rather not produce the correspondence, after it had been refused in the other House. [Our readers will recollect that, during the present Session, papers refused in one House have been granted in the other.]

THE TUSCALOOSA.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Peacocke, pursuant to notice, called attention to the seizure of the Tuscaloosa. Having in our last number given a full summary of the debate in the Lords upon the same subject, a comparatively brief note of what was said in the House of Commons will be sufficient. Mr. Peacocke commented on the party zeal displayed by Admiral Sir Baldwin Walker. The Admiral wrote to the Governor of the Cape to know how the Tuscaloosa was to be treated, and was told that, in the opinion of the Attorney-General of the colony, she was to be regarded as a tender and not as a prize. Not satisfied with this, he repeated his question, and was referred to 'Wheaton.' Upon this Sir B. Walker wrote a despatch to the Admiralty, in which he said that the power of a captain of a ship of war to make every prize he took a 'tender' was likely, in his opinion, to lead to abuse and evasion of the laws of strict neutrality. 'Under the difficulties,' said Mr. Peacocke, 'which may possibly arise, it can hardly be a matter of congratulation that we have a second Commodore Wilkes commanding at that station.' The United States Consul claimed the vessel on the ground that England 'having refused to recognise the "Confederacy" as a nation, and having excluded her captures from all the ports of the British Empire, the captures necessarily revert to their real owners, and are forfeited by Captain Semmes as soon as they enter a British port.' Her Majesty's Government had thought fit to endorse the claim, and it was desirable to know if they acquiesced in the reasons which were urged in its favour. Under a good deal of pressure from Mr. Adams, Earl Russell wrote a despatch to that Minister, in which he said, 'Instructions will be sent to the British authorities at the Cape for their guidance in the event of a similar case occurring hereafter, and Her Majesty's Government hope that under those instructions nothing will for the future happen to admit of a question being raised as to Her Majesty's orders having been strictly carried out.' This promise was fulfilled to the letter. An extraordinary despatch was sent to the Governor of the Cape, which bore the signature of the Duke of Newcastle, but which was not that nobleman's despatch, for the Colonial Office was acting merely as an official channel for the transmission of the despatch from the Foreign Office. Under instructions contained in that despatch, the Tuscaloosa was seized, but those instructions were not in accordance with the principles of international law, and he (Mr. Peacocke) did not believe they were issued on the advice of the law officers of the Crown, but that they were a weak and illegal concession by Lord Russell to the demands of Mr. Adams. That the Tuscaloosa was a vessel of war when she reached the Cape was unquestionable, and it was equally certain that a captain could convert his prizes into war-vessels without taking them into port for condemnation. In the case of the Ceylon, which was an English East Indiaman captured by some French frigates, Sir Walter Scott held that it was not necessary that she should be regularly commissioned, and that it was enough that she was employed in the public military service of the enemy. Referring to the case of the Castor, which ship was not carried into port, Sir Walter Scott said: 'I think this vessel was sufficiently commissioned by the French commander on the station. This lieutenant de vaisseau and seventy men were put on board by his order in the first instance, subject undoubtedly to the approbation of the French Minister of Marine; but can I doubt that this appointment would have been confirmed by the constituted authorities at home in the present situation of the French navy?' There could be no doubt the commission granted by Captain Semmes would be duly confirmed by the Confederate Government. The case of the Georgiana was still more to the point. She was a British whaler, captured by the American frigate Essex. The American captain, without taking his prize into port or taking out the cargo, supplied her with ten additional guns and sixty men, and employed her, under one of his lieutenants, to cruise against British vessels. The force with which she had been supplied was subsequently reduced, and when she was taken, she had only four guns and fifteen men on board. In that case Sir W. Scott held that she was sufficiently set forth for war, and that a commander of a single vessel had the same authority to grant a commission as a commodore. The practice of commissioning ships taken from the enemy is so common and notorious, that the United States Captain at the Cape told the authorities there that if he captured the Alabama he would turn her into a Federal cruiser. Were we to apply this principle to a strong Power, and not to a Power unable to resent a breach of neutrality? But the instructions sent to the Cape were manifestly illegal, and would not be enforced against a great Power. Mr. Peacocke concluded by moving 'that the instructions contained in the despatch of the Duke of Newcastle to Sir P. Wodehouse, dated the 4th day of November, 1863, and which remain still unrevoked, are at variance with the principles of international law.'

The Solicitor-General contended that when the Tuscaloosa first came into Simon's Bay, she was not a vessel of war, and that under any circumstances the authorities were justified in enquiring what was her real character. He admitted the Government did not think the instructions so full and explicit as they might be, and the subject was under consideration. New instructions were about to be sent to Colonial Governors, and they would shortly be laid on the table of the House. The Tuscaloosa was an isolated case, and could not be drawn into a precedent. He objected to the resolution proposed by Mr. Peacocke, because if it were adopted it might be said, 'You have passed a resolution which, in fact, avers that, however much, and in whatever manner, the neutrality of a State has been violated, the State has no jurisdiction to restore prizes.'

Mr. Whiteside maintained that the Tuscaloosa was really a ship of war, and that her commission was not a sham as alleged by the Solicitor-General. The fact of capture entirely changed the ownership, and the captor could make what use he liked of his prize; and the effect of the commission granted by Captain Semmes was to make the Tuscaloosa a vessel of war. After sailing for five months under the Confederate flag, she returned to the Cape and was seized. Was not Lieutenant Lowe, who was in command of the Tuscaloosa, justified in saying that he was first misled and then entrapped? That she was improperly seized was proved by her subsequent release, and as she was improperly seized in obedience to certain instructions, it is manifest that those instructions were wrong.

The discussion was continued by Mr. J. Powell, Mr. Neate, and others, on the side of the Government, and by Sir J. Elphinstone, Mr. M. Smith, and others, in favour of the resolution. Whilst Mr. Shaw-Lefevre was speaking, an attempt was made to count out the House, but it was frustrated by a rush of members from the lobbies and dining-room. The Attorney-General regretted the seizure of the ship on her second visit, but defended the instructions that had been sent out. The principle contended for in the Duke of Newcastle's despatch was that Her Majesty had a right to forbid the entrance of prizes into her ports, and that if such prohibition was disregarded, she was the only judge of the measures to be taken for the vindication of her authority. The Attorney-General said: 'Well, then, is the House to affirm the resolution of the hon. member that the principles laid down in the despatch are contrary to international law? I say that if the House affirms any such thing it will be affirming that which will be derogatory to the supremacy and the sovereignty of the Queen; it will be affirming that there are Powers in time of war which have a right to set at naught, either by device and fraud or otherwise, the orders of the territorial Sovereign, not only upon the high seas but within the territory of that Sovereign; it will be affirming that belligerents may violate that territory, and at the same time claim the benefit of international law against any measures taken in vindication of the authority of the territorial Sovereign. I hope the House by its vote will protest against such a doctrine.' The debate was concluded by Sir Hugh Cairns, who denied that the Government had any precedents for the instructions sent out to the Cape; and as the Attorney-General had defended those instructions, he appealed to the House to pass Mr. Peacocke's resolution.

The House divided, and the numbers were:

For the Resolution . . .	185
Against it	219

THE MALLORY REPORT FORGERY.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Sir J. Elphinstone asked the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government had expressed any opinion on the circumstance of Mr. Seward having presented a document to Lord Lyons on the 22nd December last which on March 19 he 'felt bound' to tell him he had 'just discovered' to be 'a forgery;' and whether Her Majesty's Government communicated with the agents of the Confederate States in Europe on the subject, or with the Government of the Confederate States at Richmond, and with what result. He also wished to know whether Mr. Seward had been called upon to name the gentleman who was the author of the report.

Mr. Layard said Her Majesty's Government had not expressed any opinion upon the communications from Mr. Seward. As the hon. member was aware, there was no agent of the Confederate States in this country to whom questions could be addressed, and it was not usual to address questions to the agent of a Government which was not recognised. Every endeavour was made by the Government to ascertain whether the document referred to was genuine. There was a conflict of testimony upon that point, but as soon as it was found the document was a forgery, that fact was stated by the noble Lord in another place.

Sir. J. Elphinstone then asked whether an agent had not been despatched from the Havannah to the Confederate States in order to communicate with the Government at Richmond, and whether that agent was not refused permission to pass through the blockading squadron.

Mr. Layard.—That was so. He was not permitted to pass through the blockade.

Sir J. Elphinstone further asked whether the circumstance of an agent being accredited by Her Majesty's Government and sent to communicate with the Confederate States' Government did not amount to an acknowledgment of the Executive power of the Confederate States. No answer was given to this question.

THE CHANNEL FLEET.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Sir J. Pakington asked the Secretary of the Admiralty whether it was true that the Channel fleet had been removed from Portland to the Downs; if not, whether it was not under order to proceed from Portland to the Downs; also, whether the noble Lord was in a position to state that the ships which constituted the Channel fleet had been completely supplied with coals and provisions and other stores; and also whether the large iron ships of the Channel fleet had been in dock since their return from their winter cruise in the Atlantic?

Lord C. Paget said the Channel squadron was now in the Downs. The ships were very nearly completely supplied, and were perfectly ready to proceed to any part of the world in twenty-four hours. With respect to the iron ships, although they had not been docked since their return from their winter cruise, yet they had all been docked within a few months.

THE AUSTRIAN FLEET.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, in answer to Mr. D. Griffith, Sir George Grey said: 'Three or four Austrian ships have arrived in the Downs, and we have reason to believe that there are a few more on their passage from the Mediterranean to join them; but the Austrian Government have given the most distinct assurance to Her Majesty's Government that, for the present, the only order which the commander of this squadron has received is to protect German commerce in the North Sea, and to prevent the blockade of the Elbe and the Weser. The Channel fleet is in the Downs, and the Admiral is fully informed of the movements of the Austrian squadron. Her Majesty's Government decline to say what orders may be given in the event of different instructions being given to the Austrian squadron; especially as we have reason to entertain a confident expectation that the Austrian squadron will not enter the Baltic.'

FLOGGING FOR RAPE.

The Bill for punishment of rape was read a third time in the House of Lords on Thursday. An amendment moved by Lord Wodehouse, leaving the infliction of whipping to the discretion of the judge, was carried. The Lord Chancellor, who had consulted the judges, said that it was their opinion that to make flogging compulsory would have the effect of increasing the disinclination of juries to convict, and that it would be better to make it discretionary.

[Owing to a press of matter, we are compelled to omit notes of Parliamentary proceedings which, though of some interest, are not of paramount importance.]

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

MANCHESTER: May 4, 1864.

MESSRS. Ed. C. Egerton and J. Brocklehurst, members of Parliament for so important a borough as Macclesfield, will no doubt have heard with some interest that a majority of their influential constituents, without regard to minor political differences, met together last week in overflowing numbers, at the Town Hall, to make common cause on the side of the Confederates in their gallant and victorious struggle for separation and independence. The chair was taken by W. Bullock, Esq. The chairman, in introducing to the meeting the Secretary of the Southern Independence Association (Mr. T. B. Kershaw), observed that, however much he might congratulate his fellow-townsmen on the numbers present, he must regret for once that they had not a more spacious hall to meet in, for he was aware there was a large crowd outside who could not find room. (Mr. Kershaw was welcomed with prolonged and enthusiastic cheering.) The Chairman added that, at the conclusion of the lecturer's address, ample time would be given for debate, and, as far as he himself was concerned, 'he would stay with them until morning if the meeting desired it.' This latter proposition of Mr. Bullock's was received with great applause, and, as the event proved, the people availed themselves of it almost to the letter, for the proceedings, which were characterised by much earnestness, did not terminate until within a few minutes of midnight. Mr. Kershaw, in opening the debate, delivered an able and conclusive speech, which was listened to with the deepest attention, interrupted only by applause. He dwelt at considerable length upon the various political and other causes of secession, contrasting the high military and statesmanlike qualities of the South with the unprincipled incapacity of the North, and claiming for the Confederates the recognition of that national independence which was their right, and in maintaining which against almost overwhelming odds they had given to the world a pledge of their patriotism and capacity for self-government unparalleled in the history of nations. The lecturer also made a sensible and timely appeal to the working classes, and warned them against being duped by Mr. Seward's new scheme for recruiting the armies of the North by a bribing system of immigration. Partisans of the North were very fond of telling them that the cause of the American Union was also the cause of the English working man. It did, indeed, concern the working man, but in a sense very different from that in which the question had been artfully placed before him. Before the war the working man who emigrated to the United States, went to a country without taxation and where there was a wide territory in which land was cheap. In those days there was no national debt, or next to none, for it amounted only to about 7*s.* 6*d.* a head. But since that time the angel of death had been stalking through the land, and there had suddenly grown a debt of 600,000,000*l.*, which would entail an annual burden of 20,000,000*l.*, so that the emigrant who now took his labour to the 'so-called' United States would scarcely find so eligible a market for it as he anticipated. The lecturer concluded his address amid loud and general cheering. In the debate that followed, the opposition was of the most meagre character, and was conducted amid signs of disapproval from the great majority of the meeting. Upon a vote of thanks being passed to Mr. Kershaw, the opinion that was almost unanimously expressed was that General Grant was the last card the Federal Government had to play; that if he failed in the great campaign that was now opening, the Washington Cabinet would probably be compelled by the people themselves to give up the contest; that if, on the other hand, he should be fortunate enough to escape defeat, the war would be no nearer its end than before; and therefore that, in either event, it behoved the people of Macclesfield to urge upon Her Majesty's Government, by petition and through their representatives in Parliament, the propriety of entering into concert with other European Powers with a view to the recognition of the Confederacy as an independent nation.

A meeting has also been held this week at Glossop, and there too, as at Macclesfield, the feeling was almost unanimously 'Southern.' Mr. Brocklehurst, cotton spinner, presided.

The Executive of the Oldham branch of the Southern Independence Association are making arrangements for a grand public 'demonstration' in that town, to take place as early as possible. Mr. Cobbett and Mr. Hibbert will be invited to attend.

A YANKEE BASTILE.—Rats are abundant in Fort Lafayette. It is stated that as the unfortunate prisoners lie in their uncomfortable cribs at night they are literally covered with the disgusting vermin. One case is reported, in which the unhappy occupant of one of the cells was aroused, as by a nightmare, to find six of them revelling upon his breast, and of another who felt something nibbling at his pedal extremities, and, immediately kicking, a rat was thrown to the ceiling and fell with a thud upon the floor. This is a part of the punishment inflicted by a paternal government upon the unfortunates who incur its suspicion, or the enmity of its subordinates. Not a single prisoner in that fortress has been confronted with his accuser, or tried by his peers. Many have languished there almost from the beginning of the war.—Boston Courier, April 11.

CHARLESTON TO BE IRON-CLAD.—The indomitable energy of the American people, and their infinite capacity of adapting themselves to the circumstances in which they are placed, are well exemplified by the action of the citizens of Charleston, who now look upon a state of siege and fiery bombardment as the normal condition of their city. They are accordingly erecting an iron-clad church in which they may perform their devotional excreises undisturbed, and propose to rebuild the whole city after that style of architecture. This being done, all they will need to make them perfectly happy, during the remainder of their natural existence on earth, will be the invention of a light and portable bombproof umbrella, which will enable them to take physical exercise without fear of the iron-hail belched forth from the guns of the Union batteries.—N. Y. Atlas.

THE ALABAMA IN DANGER.—On a recent fast-day, in Boston, says the Courier, the Rev. Mr. Grimes (Baptist) rose in the assembly, and earnestly requested his Christian friends to join him in praying for the destruction of the Pirate Alabama. He then fell on his knees, and in a very boisterous prayer asked God to run her ashore, high and dry,—or, if he could not destroy her so, that He would sink her to the bottom of the sea. After praying thus he made an appeal to the audience upon the subject, and besought his Christian friends to make it the special business of the day to pray for the destruction of the Confederate Pirate.

'MARION.'*

MANHATTAN is deservedly popular in England. His letters in the Morning Herald are in their way inimitable. There is just enough truth about them to make them instructive, and such abundant humour as to make them very amusing. They reflect with wonderful fidelity the ever-changing sentiment of New York. Manhattan is a more reliable barometer of Northern opinion than the Wall Street money market, and by what he writes we can always tell whether the people are elated or depressed. His undisguised egotism, his confidential communications about his domestic concerns, and his jokes stuck in almost at random, are enjoyed by readers of every degree, even by those who profess to be scandalised by his audacity and effrontery. His talent for description is conspicuous. In half a dozen lines he portrays a man or a scene more graphically than other writers can do in a column. His portraits are caricatures, but, like Mr. Leech's caricatures, we recognise them as faithful likenesses, even if we have not seen the originals. How well he has portrayed Mr. Lincoln! When credulous folk were disposed to think that Mr. Lincoln was really 'honest Abe,' that he was a good-natured jester, and that his worst fault was imbecility, Manhattan represented him as not only of poor intellect, but cunning and unscrupulously ambitious. The progress of the Presidential campaign has borne ample testimony to the exactness of his representation.

It was with some curiosity that we looked into a novel by Manhattan. He is in one department a clever writer, but it did not follow that he would succeed as a novelist. If his novel bore any affinity to his letters, it was sure to be a miserable failure. 'Marion' is so much after the style of the Manhattan letters, that no one would have been in doubt as to its authorship if it had been issued anonymously. Yet 'Marion' is by no means a failure, because it is by no means a novel. Manhattan has hit upon an ingenious device. He knew that as a novelist he had no chance of success. He also knew that a biography by Manhattan would be sure to sell. But then there was an objection to biography, because there are certain restraints and proprieties to be observed. Why not combine the two? Why not give a biography in the form of a novel? This Manhattan has done. He is so solicitous to show that he is the hero of the story, that the most casual reader cannot fail to see it, and at the same time he introduces scenes and characters that would not be tolerated in a biography. In place of a novel, we have truth and fiction so blended together that the uninitiated might think the whole to be truth, here and there thinly disguised. We have three volumes of 'fast life,' and those who are fond of tales of vice, and who were disappointed at finding 'Anonyma' and 'Skittles' too proper to be exciting, will be charmed with 'Marion.'

Commercially, this work is independent of the reviewer. Commendation will not increase the demand for it, and censure will not probably stop the sale of a single copy. Still we are bound to say something about it, and propose to adopt a course of which neither the author nor our readers can complain. We shall sketch, of course very briefly, a few of the personages who figure in 'Marion.'

Marion Monck, the hero, was born in South Carolina, came in his youth to New York, and found a situation in the 'store' of Messrs. Nordheim and Granville. Marion is introduced to the pretty wife of Nordheim, and forthwith the lady calls him Marion, and he calls her Bessy: she kisses his forehead, and he kisses her lips. Nordheim has a mistress to whom Marion is sent on an errand, and for whom he is commissioned to find a tutor. Marion thinks it his duty to tell the wife of her husband's profligacy, and the wife is charmed with the frankness of her adopted brother. The relations between Bessy and Marion are supposed to be quite Platonic. Marion loses his situation for offering to marry the daughter of one of his employers, becomes a contributor to the New York Herald, and travels in the South as correspondent for that journal, and, says Manhattan, his letters were inspired by Mr. Calhoun! After many adventures Marion for a while relinquishes the pen, and sets up as a merchant, being lucky enough to meet with a partner who has excellent business connections and a capital of $30,000.

Nordheim, after ruining a score or so of women, is struck at the Opera-house for insulting a lady, and the blow proves mortal in consequence of his spectacles being broken and the pieces of glass penetrating his eyes.

Count Adolphus Falsechinski turns up in New York, without shirt or stockings, and in fact with no other possessions than a coat, a pair of trousers, a pair of boots, and a cap. He becomes tutor to Nordheim's mistress, and a clerk to the firm. He makes money by gaming and speculation, becomes the favourite client of an astute banker, lays up $250,000, negotiates through his banker a marriage with an heiress, and is permitted by the Emperor of Russia to return to his native land.

Thomas Granville deserts his wife, lives with the late Nordheim's mistress, is turned adrift by this woman, goes to Washington, gets appointed to a European Consulate by Jackson, takes the aforesaid woman with him, and introduces her as his wife: the trick is found out, and he returns to the United States utterly ruined. He has the happiness at last, however, of being present at the marriage of his nephew with the woman who was at one time his mistress, and, after reforming a little, dies of small-pox at the hospital.

Clara Norris is a beautiful girl, who, in consideration of some money given to her parents, becomes Nordheim's mistress, makes a profitable trade of prostitution, buys an estate, and returns to her home, with her health and beauty unimpaired, to enjoy the wages of her corruption.

Rose Barker is introduced to us in a disreputable house. She is affected by hearing a poem of Marion's, supplicates her lover not to let her become such an outcast, her lover is also touched, and a clergyman being present for the purpose of marrying Clara Norris to Walter Granville, she becomes in a few minutes Mrs. Henry Robinson.

Miss Benson is seduced, finds herself in an interesting condition, follows her lover to the South, and is kindly received by the mother of the young man, who insists upon his marrying her. He does so, and, like all Manhattan's dramatis personæ who repent, he soon after dies.

We suppose our readers have had enough of this: and if they wish to read about Mrs. Woodruff, the vilest of the vile, or about O'Doemall, an unmitigated blackguard, and a host of such characters, we refer them to the book itself. Having indicated what kind of work 'Marion' is, any comment is superfluous.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their papers supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognised at this Office.

Subscription, 26s. per annum; post-paid, 30s.: payable in advance.

All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-office orders made payable, to J. B. HOPKINS, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the Paper made—

At Liverpool, to Mr. HUTTON, 6 Commercial Buildings, 17 Water Street.
At Manchester, F. A. HASLEHAM, Esq. 26 Market Street.
At Paris, to Messrs. PFEIFFER & MULLER, 52 Rue du Château d'Eu, Paris.
At St. Thomas (West Indies), to C. W. WHITE, Esq.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MAY 5, 1864.

The Last Falsehood.

NORTHERN newspapers have charged the South with a horrible massacre, in cold blood, after the storming of Fort Pillow; and although it has been expressly stated, both in the telegraphic news from New York and by impartial correspondents, that no official confirmation has come to hand, the Federal partisans in Europe have made haste to believe the story, and even some friends of the South appear to have been so far imposed on as to cast about for palliative explanations. Our latest direct advices from the Confederacy are of earlier date than the taking of Fort Pillow, but we promise the reader that we shall not conceal or extenuate the facts, if, upon Confederate testimony, they shall be proved true. Meanwhile we ask the European public to suspend their judgment, and to remember the unscrupulous character of the Federal press, the MALLORY forgery, and the systematic lying which has pervaded even the official documents of the Northern Government. We ask them also to do the South the justice to recollect that such atrocities as are ascribed to FORREST'S men are utterly at variance with the past conduct of Confederate soldiers, even when on enemy's soil, and under the most fearful provocations. English officers who were eyewitnesses of the invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania have given their testimony to the fact that neither non-combatants nor private property were in a single instance molested. The South has frequently threatened retaliation, yet in no case—not on enlisted slaves nor on their white officers, not on the men engaged in DAHLGREN'S infernal plot, not even for MCNEAL'S murders—has the threat been carried out to the taking of life in cold blood. A few newspapers have indeed bitterly complained of the Administration for its leniency, and have clamoured for meting out to the Yankees their own measure. One such is said to have been found on DAHLGREN'S person, together with his own orders, a statement probably put forth to mitigate the brutality of the latter. But newspaper declamations have never caused Mr. DAVIS or the Generals in the Confederate service to swerve one hair's breadth from the dictates of humanity and chivalry in war. A short time since the Northern press raised a similar howl over the sufferings of prisoners at the hands of the Confederates. It is known now, how utterly without the pretence of a foundation were the accusations then made and very generally believed in Europe. It is our firm conviction that the present case differs in no respect from other 'Yankee facts.'

The absurd exaggeration of this 'massacre' should be obvious to any unprejudiced eye. We are told that 'the rebels in many instances did not await until life was extinct before proceeding to interment.' Now, unless a charge of intentional torture is implied by the naïve writer who makes this statement, it is certainly strange that men who have just massacred a garrison should trouble themselves at all about burying their victims. The circumstance which gives point to the story is precisely that which most confirms us in considering it a pure fabrication. It is said that the victims were negro soldiers. Whoever is acquainted with Southern character must be fully aware that the improbability would be lessened if it had been alleged that the Confederate fury has spent itself thus savagely on whites. The Southerner bears no malice to the negro, scarcely holds him morally responsible for his acts even when in Yankee uniform, and as prisoner taken in arms, looks upon him as recovered property, to be carefully secured instead of destroyed. If there is any ground at all for this sensational report, it must, in our opinion, be sought in the obstinate and doubtless desperate defence of the Fort, which, after being thrice summoned to surrender, was finally taken by assault. Probably, also, the negroes, as in the case of the Federal attack on Port Hudson, were used as 'breastworks for the white men,' maddened to their fate by strong drink, and kept to their work by Federal bayonets in the rear. That the losses of the garrison bore a dreadful proportion to their numbers we may readily assume, though the Northern mind always exaggerates figures; but that one human being suffered death at the hands of the Confederates after the day was won, would belie the whole history of the Confederate people since the outbreak of the war.

We cannot dismiss this subject without a passing reference to a ludicrous and yet painful exhibition of the extent to which the judgment of probably an honest, if not an able, man may be perverted by strong passions and prejudice. The same eccentric gentleman, whose unique defence of the MALLORY forgery we transferred to our columns last week, now writes to deprecate, on the part of the North, the vengeance which would sully its untarnished escutcheon. As an evidence how a Professor of History can read the history of his own time, commend us to the letter of Professor GOLDWIN SMITH to the Daily News of the 3rd inst.:—

Hitherto, I am prepared to maintain, the civil war has been, on the part of the Federals, the most humane in history. We who feel ourselves bound up in this great struggle with the cause of freedom, ought to pray that its champions may not, in a moment of just exasperation, tarnish a glory which in after times will shine more brightly than the glories of the battle-field. Of the Southern aristocracy alone it can be said that they traffic in human flesh, that they breed men and women for the market, that they tear children away from their mothers and wives from their husbands, that they send women to be flogged in public torture-houses, that they sell their own children, that they make laws to forbid education, to forbid emancipation, to brutalise a whole race. Of them alone let it be said that they murder prisoners of war in cold blood.

It would, of course, be ridiculous to argue with a man who can sign his name to such a paragraph; but, returning good for evil, we shall hold at his disposal a photographic facsimile of the manuscript Orders and Instructions of Colonel DAHLGREN to his command. This curious document, photographed by order of the Confederate Government from the original in the ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S office, has just reached Europe, and will form an interesting addition to Professor GOLDWIN SMITH'S historical collections.

The War.

CONFEDERATE triumphs are still the staple of the news from America. Within the last three months the tide of success has flowed on steadily, almost without a check. Almost every encounter has resulted in signal discomfiture to the Federals; and now, on the eve of the decisive struggle of the campaign, there is panic and consternation in New York, and Washington, and all the great cities of the North, whilst in Richmond the shock of battle is awaited with the quiet confidence which is the augury of victory. It is not surprising that the North should be despondent and the South hopeful. The commencement of the fourth year's fighting has dissipated many illusions on both sides, has reassured the Confederacy of its strength, and taught the invaders the all but hopelessness of their dream of conquest. All through the winter months the Northern press drew forcible pictures of the broken fortunes of the South. There remained, it was said, but two Southern armies in the field, LEE'S and JOHNSTON'S, both 'depleted' by desertions and losses. Richmond might offer a show of defence, and JOHNSTON fight one desperate battle for the defence of Georgia. Elsewhere no resistance was to be expected, and the march of the invader would be a mere military promenade. The strength of the army at Chattanooga has been tested, and General PALMER recoiled from Ringgold with the loss of nearly 2,000 men. LEE'S position has not been assailed; but at this very moment the cannon may be thundering over another great battle-field in Virginia. But the most remarkable disproof of Yankee anticipations has been given in those States where the presence of Southern soldiery was unsuspected, and where the Federals marched with the conviction that they could sweep everything before them. An army of 40,000 men left Vicksburg under SHERMAN, to strike at the heart of the Cotton States. Its route lay through the State of Mississippi, which the Federals have claimed to hold for the last twelve months, and whose sons are fronting General THOMAS in Georgia, or hurling death upon the invader in Virginia. A force of 7,000 cavalry under SMITH and GRIERSON moved forward to cooperate with it. To oppose it were the old men and boys, the home guards of the State, a portion of FORREST'S cavalry, not three thousand men, and the small force under POLK covering the line of the Mobile and Ohio railroad. SHERMAN'S force marched 200 miles and marched back again, with Confederate horsemen hanging on his flanks and rear, cutting off stragglers and trains. SMITH'S cavalry was absolutely routed and driven into the streets of Memphis; and now that a portion of SHERMAN'S army has been despatched up the Red River, the Confederates, growing bolder, have assumed the offensive, and have successfully attacked the Federals on the Big Black River.

SHERMAN'S march was a fiasco. The invasion of Florida was a tragedy and a lasting disgrace. No one knew of the existence of a Confederate army in that State. General SEYMOUR landed his forces, marched up the country, suddenly found himself in front of an army sprung apparently from the soil, and was miserably defeated with the loss of more than half his force. No one had heard of General FINNEGAN before. His army was composed principally of State volunteers, hastily levied and marched off to meet the invader. Yet he inflicted a defeat as disastrous to the Federals, in proportion to the numbers engaged, as any defeat of the war. But the story is not yet all told. Louisiana has given another illustration of the inherent strength of the Confederacy. General BANKS'S Red River expedition is a failure, and his grand army, from which so much was expected, is probably by this time barricaded in Alexandria, or well on its way to New Orleans. Here again the surprise to the Federals has been complete and overwhelming. They estimated the united forces of Generals STEELE, SMITH, and BANKS at 40,000 men. In addition they had an immense flotilla of gunboats. The country they traversed was one hitherto spared by the scorching flame of war, so that the army could provision itself easily as it marched. But the Confederates played their old game. They abandoned position after position with little or no resistance. The Federals pushed on. Already Shreveport, the prize of the expedition, lay within their grasp. Suddenly their advance comes upon a Confederate army, is attacked and routed. The reserves hasten up and are in their turn thrown into confusion by the fierceness of the Confederate attack. Finally, after a precipitate retreat, a stand is made some miles from the field of battle, where, strengthened by reinforcements, BANKS'S army turns at bay, and the Federal generals think themselves lucky to save a portion of their train and of their artillery. The admitted loss of 2,000 killed and wounded and of one battery is obviously under the mark. The Confederate estimate of 14,000 killed and wounded is equally extreme, for there were probably not more than that number of Federals in the field. Under any circumstances, the defeat must have been decisive, and it will be some time before BANKS resumes his onward march. As to the report of a second battle, that is extremely improbable. No mention is made of it in the accounts of a later date; and there is every reason to believe that it was manufactured for the Northern market. Of a similar character is the statement of an engagement between the Confederates and the Federal gunboats. What man in his senses would attack a gunboat flotilla with an army? Possibly, a masked battery, here and there, has opened upon the flotilla, but an attack is out of the question. In the meantime, the whereabouts of General STEELE'S army in Arkansas is becoming a matter of anxiety. When last heard of, he was pushing forward for Shreveport, with a strong body of Confederate cavalry laying waste the country before him and harassing his rear. Now that the hope of effecting a junction with BANKS is gone, we may hear of another disastrous Federal retreat. The battle of Grand Ecore was a surprise to the Federals. But those of our readers who have followed the communications of our well-informed correspondent at New Orleans, must have been to some extent prepared for what has taken place. To them it would not be a surprise, but the realisation of a distinct and deliberately executed programme.

But the struggle to the west of the Mississippi, and even the brilliant successes just announced from North Carolina, are of comparatively slight immediate importance in the presence of the desperate conflict about to commence in Virginia. For that conflict the resources of North and South have been strained for the last six months. Grant is the last hope of the Federals, his army the last stay of the Union. The defeat of Grant means revolution in the Northern States, and a financial crisis unparalleled in history—his success, the prolongation of the war for an indefinite period. No doubt the forces he can bring into the field are enormous; but they are not so large as those which proved insufficient under M'Clellan; we have the highest authority for saying that in point of physique and drill they are inferior, and that in every respect but numbers Lee's army has the advantage. Grant's plans are unknown, but it is still said that Richmond is to be assailed on three sides—by the York-town Peninsula, by Gordonsville, and by the Rappahannock. We can only say that if Grant divides his army he makes a fatal mistake. Lee's position on the Rapidan is so strong that 25,000 men can hold it against three times their number. His central position at Richmond will enable him to take any one of the three columns in detail. The lines around Richmond, upon which he can fall back in safety, are said, upon competent authority, to rival those of Torres Vedras. What hope has Grant, even if he can force Lee from the field, of taking the Southern capital? It is possible, however, that the latter may anticipate the advance of his adversary. The Confederate army is said to be already on the move. Lee may make another of those famous flank movements which have so seriously disturbed the Federal plans, and the battle for Richmond may be fought once more nearer to Washington than to the Southern capital. Whatever be its result, the fate of the Confederacy does not depend upon it. How long the war party in the North would survive another great disaster in Virginia is a question which a few weeks may decide.

Buncombe in High Places.

The House of Lords has, as a deliberative assembly, a character of its own. The quiet and order of its proceedings, the dignity of its demeanour, the business-like air which pervades its sittings, the gravity of its debates, contrast forcibly with the livelier tone and more combative spirit of the House of Commons, and have no parallel in any other political council. The Lower House has a great deal of the debating society about it; it welcomes a jest, it pardons flippancy, and it has a ready cheer for that conventional claptrap—those appeals to trite moralities or assumed prejudices—by which an unsuccessful orator contrives to avoid the mortification of open discomfiture, and to resume his seat under cover of at least a perfunctory applause. Anything of this sort falls very flat in the House of Lords; and that august body is not often indulged with such perorations as that by which Lord Russell sought on Friday night to cover his retreat from a position which Lord Derby's crushing logic and merciless sarcasm had rendered untenable. To defend the conduct pursued towards Messrs. Laird by any course of serious argument after the speech of Lord Derby, and with Lord Chelmsford watching the helpless struggles of the Minister, and evidently waiting to give him the coup de grâce, was out of the question. Abuse of Messrs. Laird had been tried, and not very successfully. The House remembered that these gentlemen, of whom Lord Russell spoke in so contemptuous a tone, had been very differently treated in the correspondence which he and his colleagues had held with them. It knew that throughout the whole course of their persecution Messrs. Laird had behaved with a frankness and courtesy which had extorted acknowledgments, thanks, and expressions of respect and confidence from all employed against them. It knew that the Foreign Office had professed implicit faith in their word. When, therefore, Lord Russell began to sneer at 'these respectable gentlemen,' to accuse them of conspiring to plunge the country into war, to charge them with trickery and 'false allegations,' the impression made on the House was not what the orator intended. Instead of being convinced of Messrs. Laird's unworthiness, it was offended by the Minister's intemperance. Instead of believing the charges, it felt that the accuser had been carried by passion beyond the bounds of Parliamentary decorum and gentlemanly reserve. And when Lord Derby interposed as Lord Russell denounced a 'false' allegation, and said 'Messrs. Laird made no such statement,' and Lord Russell answered, 'What matter who made it?'—when the House found that the Minister was actually making charges of falsehood against gentlemen and men of honour without the shadow of foundation, and thought it matter of indifference whether he applied those charges to the right man or the wrong one, the unfavourable impression was deepened and confirmed. Abuse of the Confederates, who clearly had the good wishes of the House, as of all educated English society, did not mend the matter: the orator was getting deeper and deeper in the mire, and perceived, as a practised speaker easily perceives, that he was addressing an audience that grew more hostile every minute. Then it was that he resorted to the arts which he had learned 'in another place,' and endeavoured to extricate himself by one of those pieces of conventional declamation which are the stock 'points' of a certain class of debaters. The House of Commons would have cheered; the Lords listened unmoved to the following outburst of Abolitionist enthusiasm:—

It is to be hoped, with respect to this contest in North America, with whatever calamities it may be fraught, whatever slaughter may be committed, and whatever industries may be interrupted, that Providence will decree that some atonement for all the misery shall be made to mankind, and that the issue will be one which will place those four millions of the black race in a condition of freedom—in that condition which may hereafter lead to their prosperity by the proper employment of that liberty which the United States have proclaimed as the most sacred principle of their constitution. It is evident that it must be left to the contending Powers to work out this great problem, and I, for my part, should think it a great misfortune if this country should be obliged by any paramount considerations to take a part in the present contest. It may be that the result of this contest, the beginning of which we all deplored, the continuance of which we all regret—it may be that the end of this contest may see that sin, that crime, that detestable state of slavery for ever abolished from among civilised nations.

Had this bit of buncombe been delivered by an independent member of the House of Commons, we should not have thought it deserving of a moment's notice. But, uttered in the House of Lords, and by the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, it assumes something of serious significance, and cannot be passed over without notice. We cannot but ask, when language of this sort is employed by the Minister by whom, immediately and principally, our policy towards the American belligerents is directed, what is the meaning of such a declaration, and what are its motives? Is it intended to foreshadow a change in our policy, or to justify its past course? Is it seriously meant to indicate that the possible emancipation of the negro is an element in the considerations which have determined and will determine our course in American affairs? or had it no meaning at all, save to catch a cheer and conceal a disaster in debate?

At the outset of the war, Lord Russell expressed his opinion of its character in the truest and tersest phrase yet employed to describe it—'The North fights for empire, the South for independence.' What was that but to say that the sympathies of England, and above all of the Liberal party, of which Lord Russell is still a principal member and was once the leader, ought to be with the South, as they have been with every other nation that has fought for nationality? What was it but to say that, though the principles of our policy forbade us to interfere until the ability of the South to maintain her freedom had been proved in the field, the good wishes of England and of the English Government were with her in the struggle? But Mr. Adams came, threatened, and conquered; the representative of those who were fighting for independence was snubbed, insulted, refused an interview, and finally obliged to quit the country; and the Power that fought for empire received the caresses, the excuses, the friendly professions, almost the open assistance, of the Foreign Secretary. Those that lust after empire are 'our allies;' those that are defending their ancestral homes and immemorial liberties against a foreign foe can obtain no word of sympathy, no act even of common courtesy, from the Government of England.

We would not attribute this policy to any unworthy motives. We would not hint that it has been adopted mainly from the belief that the North would be victorious in the struggle. We would not assert that it is due to the experience that the way of concession was easy, and that honest neutrality might entail much bluster, many disagreeable scenes, and perhaps some danger. But we must declare our utter astonishment at the gradual change which has come over the spirit of the Foreign Secretary since, at the beginning of the session of 1863, he expressed himself convinced that the conquest of the South and the forcible emancipation of the negroes would be a calamity for all concerned. What recent experience, what new flood of information, has taught him to consider that calamity a blessing, and to desire that consummation which he then so anxiously deprecated? It cannot be that he has been appalled by new evidence as to the horrors of slavery; for if 'Uncle Tom' had failed to convert him heart and soul to the cause of Abraham Lincoln, it is not likely that the false and filthy tales of recent imitation, full as they are of prurient anecdotes of atrocity and indecency, should have succeeded, even had he reposed in them the same unquestioning faith which he accords to Northern versions of Southern State papers. All recent information, the evidence of travellers, the simple facts narrated by Southern visitors, the great fact of negro fidelity, have convinced English society that, even if wronged in being a slave, the negro has no other wrongs to complain of; and Lord Russell must be as well aware of this as others are. Has his conversion been effected by the wonderful success of the Federal conquerors in dealing with the negroes that have fallen into their hands? Has the treatment of the inferior race by its emancipators convinced Lord Russell that forcible emancipation would not be a calamity? If so, the Foreign Secretary must regard facts and figures in a manner peculiar to himself; for the fate of the negroes who have been thrown upon the tender mercies of the invaders has almost staggered the faith of the Abolitionists in their own work. Two hundred thousand men, women, and children, who were formerly slaves, have become freemen under the merciful care and supervision of the Federal Government. Thousands of these have been enlisted, whether they would or no, in the Federal army; and these, though so ill-fed and ill-treated as often to be goaded into mutiny, may be considered fortunate by comparison, even where they are ranged in the front of the line of battle, to be the first victims of the Confederate fire. Thousands have been collected at various places in the valley of the Mississippi, lodged in swamps, fed with the offal of the camp, left to die of the most loathsome diseases and the most horrible neglect, no one of their liberators giving them any aid or comfort. Thousands have been sent to the plantations seized by Yankee speculators, and have there perished miserably of want and neglect; so utterly uncared for that three months have sufficed to destroy one-half the population of a well-stocked plantation. Need we recal to the recollection of our readers the horrible pictures of negro life under Yankee protection, extracted by Governor Morehead from the reports of Federal officials? Swarming in the unhealthiest localities in the neighbourhood of Federal camps, or in the purlieus of the garrisons; subject to every species of brutal outrage at the hands of the most brutal and licentious soldiery in the world; without shelter, without medicines, almost without clothing, often without food, untended in sickness and unprotected in health, these wretched victims of Abolition lived a life of squalid misery which no words can describe, and perished by every species of disease which vice and want and the worst conditions of camp life engender. In a few weeks, at Memphis, 1,200 died out of 4,000; at Vicksburg, on the low grounds on the Western bank of the river, 15 or 20 daily out of 3,000. All along that portion of the Mississippi the miserable creatures lay by hundreds and thousands, 'all sick or taking care of the sick;' and of the whole number who have fallen into the hands of the Abolitionists, probably one-half have rotted out of existence in this miserable fashion. Are these the results that have converted Lord Russell to the belief that the victory of the North and the extension of 'freedom' among the negroes would be to mankind an atonement, and not an aggravation of the misery which this war has caused? Or are we to attribute his change of opinion, after all, to the eloquence of Mr. Adams, backed by the distant echoes of Federal artillery, and strengthened by Federal reports of Confederate disasters? We hope that the fortune of war may speedily supply the noble Lord with ample reasons for returning to his former more accurate and more statesmanlike opinion?

Parliament.

The stormy promise of the earlier portion of the session has not as yet been fulfilled. There are abundant signs of weakness on the part of the Administration, and disaffection among its followers. There are damaging debates and close divisions. But there are no efforts on the side of the Opposition to bring on a pitched battle, and avail itself either of Liberal disunion or of Conservative strength to storm the strongholds of office. Mr. Lowe and Mr. Stansfeld have fallen victims to isolated attacks in which there has been little concert and no organised display of party force, and similar assaults have been directed against a more powerful and more tenacious Minister. If it were not well understood that Lord Russell cannot fall alone, and that a vote of censure on his policy must involve the resignation of the Cabinet, the Foreign Secretary would ere now have been compelled to follow the example of the Vice-President of Council and the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, and quit office for his party's good. But the Opposition seem determined to avoid a regular engagement, in which a victory might strengthen or a defeat overturn the Ministry. Many reasons are assigned for this resolve.

It is said, in the first place, that a Ministerial defeat would be followed by a dissolution; whereas, if Parliament shows itself considerate and forbearing, the present Government will reward its patience by prolonging its life to the close of the next session. As the trouble, risk, and expense of contested elections are always exceedingly disagreeable to members of the House of Commons, it is probable that the hope of postponing their fate for another year has had some effect. It is said, moreover, that while the Conference is sitting and the Danish question unsettled — while difficulties are at hand which have been created by the incapacity and impolicy of the present Administration, and of which it is hardly possible to conceive a satisfactory and honourable solution — Lord Derby and his friends prefer to leave the duty of finding a remedy, and the danger and disgrace of a too probable failure, to those who are responsible for the existing embarrassments. However this may be, and to whatever cause we are to ascribe the armed truce at present prevailing in Parliament, so far as party conflicts are concerned, there can be no doubt that the possession of office at this juncture is a party misfortune; and that the longer the Liberals remain in power, the weaker and the more unpopular they become. The expectation of a Conservative reign of five or ten years, following on the retirement of Lord Palmerston, gains ground daily; and expectations of this kind have a tendency to realise themselves. Meantime, Lord Palmerston's frequent absences do his colleagues more service than his presence in the House could do, by staving off inconvenient discussions, and precluding severe criticisms on the policy of an absent man.

The retirement of the Duke of Newcastle is not a misfortune to the Administration. The late Colonial Secretary was not a great debater, and the Government stood in need of support in the House of Commons, which they could only obtain by means of a Cabinet vacancy. The accidents—for they were mere accidents—which had placed the heads of so many great departments in the Upper House had caused a good deal of discontent in the Lower; and discussions on colonial matters were threatened which would make it extremely inconvenient to have the department represented only by an Under-Secretary. The resignation of the Duke, and the appointment of Mr. Cardwell to his vacant office, came just in time to render the New Zealand debate a source of strength rather than of weakness to the Administration, which can now address the provincial Government with all the authority derived from the manifest inclination of the House to a policy less repressive and vengeful than finds favour at Auckland.

Several subjects of minor importance have been got over, in one way or another, without any unpleasant results. A motion of censure on the Ministerial policy in China—the only defence to which must have been the impossibility of condemning a policy until you know what it is—was evaded by a count-out. The departure of Garibaldi has been the cause of much trouble and many explanations, but it finally remains shrouded in impenetrable mystery; and though it is quite clear that the reason assigned — consideration for the General's health — is a mere pretext, no one has been able to fix the responsibility upon the right person, or to assign the real reason for the proceeding. The interruption by the police of a political meeting held to consider this subject might have caused some unpleasant discussion but for two circumstances. First, it is quite clear that Primrose Hill is a park, and is Crown property, and that nobody has a legal right to hold a public meeting there without leave of the proprietor. Secondly, it is not desirable that meetings should be held in the parks, to interfere with the public recreation for which those parks were intended.

The case of the Tuscaloosa led to two important debates, one in the Lords, introduced by Lord Chelmsford, and the other in the Commons, on a motion of Mr. Peacocke censuring the despatch of the Duke of Newcastle upon the subject. The history of the case was made very clear in the course of the discussion. The Conrad, a Federal merchantman, became prize to the Alabama. Captain Semmes equipped her and armed her with two small guns as a tender to his vessel. He then sailed for Simon's Bay, Cape Colony, and, entering it, announced to the authorities that he had a tender outside, which had been taken from the Federals, and which was now a commissioned ship of war in the Confederate service. The Admiral on the station was Sir Baldwin Walker, formerly Surveyor of the Navy. That gentleman, in his official capacity, had rendered eminent services to his party, of a character which would not exactly bear investigation before a Royal Commission or a Parliamentary Committee; and, therefore, when such an investigation had been commenced, and dangerous disclosures were apprehended, Sir Baldwin was appointed by the Duke of Somerset to a naval command, and sailed in all haste for his station. A sea-voyage and a distant command did not cool his party zeal; and, as Mr. Peacocke remarked, he was still at the Cape the same devoted Whig that he had proved himself at Devonport. He flew into a passion at the idea of the admission into a British port of a prize taken from the friends of Earl Russell; and when the colonial authorities decided that the Tuscaloosa, Confederate man-of-war, ought not to be refused admission because she had once been the Conrad, Federal merchantman. Sir B. Walker wrote an angry letter home, declaring that Captain Semmes would bring all his prizes into port as tenders, dispose of them and their cargoes, and thus make Her Majesty's proclamation of none effect. This sort of alarm reminds us very much of that kind of logic by which an angry woman assures her luckless husband, who has for once in his life somewhat transgressed the rules of sobriety, that now he will always be coming home drunk and beating her. No intention had been manifested to sell either the Tuscaloosa or her cargo; and the idea that Captain Semmes would convert all his prizes into tenders, and that Her Majesty's colonial authorities would be taken in by such a barefaced trick, hardly deserved serious consideration. However, the law officers of the Crown, on Sir B. Walker's version of the facts, declared that the Tuscaloosa was not entitled to the privileges of a Confederate man-of-war; the Duke of Newcastle took upon himself to decide that she ought to have been seized and restored to her original owners; and on her return to the Cape, after cruising for months as a man-of-war, she was seized by Sir B. Walker. The indignant protest of her commander, 'first deceived and then entrapped' by that gallant Admiral, brought the Home Government to its senses, and the Tuscaloosa was released. But the order under which she was seized remained in force, and it would still be the duty of a colonial Government to seize and restore to her former owners any vessel under like circumstances brought within their jurisdiction. It was against this gross outrage on international law that the Opposition in both Houses directed their remonstrances. The lawyers of the Government did their best to turn off the argument upon the question whether or no the Tuscaloosa was a ship of war, on which argument was possible, but totally irrelevant. To assert the right of a neutral to seize a prize brought within his waters against his will, and to restore her to her original owners, seemed too perilous an outrage on truth and common sense. But to this at last they were driven; and the Solicitor-General had to devise an excuse for this very novel doctrine. We may set aside at once all the cases quoted by him and by Lord Westbury concerning the exercise by neutrals of jurisdiction in matters of prize. They all fall under two heads—capture in the waters of the neutral, where an offence has actually been committed against his sovereignty within the limits of his municipal jurisdiction, and where, as concerns him, the capture is simply a maritime robbery; and secondly, capture by vessels originally equipped in the neutral territory, while on their first cruise, and while, therefore, they still remain offenders against the neutral's municipal law. Now, the Alabama was not equipped in a British port, nor has she taken any prizes in British waters. There is, therefore, no precedent for an assumption of authority over her prizes, in violation of the general law that neutrals have no jurisdiction in matters of prize. But, said the Crown lawyers, the entrance of a prize into our ports, in disobedience to the Queen's proclamation, is a violation of our neutrality, for which we have a right to inflict the penalty of confiscation. Now, in the first place, the proclamation which excludes prizes is a municipal and not an international law. Apart from any such proclamation, prizes would have a right to enter our ports; and it was because that right was notorious, and because its operation in favour of the Confederates was obvious, that the proclamation was issued. Disobedience to a municipal regulation is no breach of neutral rights. Secondly, the right to exclude prizes is of the same character as the right to exclude men-of-war. Suppose the Queen had exercised this latter right as against the American belligerents; that the Kearsage had entered Cork harbour on pretext of stress of weather; that this pretext had proved to be false—would the Crown lawyers dare to affirm that we might seize and confiscate the Kearsage? If not, then we have no right to seize the prizes of the Alabama. The right of warning them off, and of driving them off if necessary, is all that we can possibly claim.

The debate in the House of Lords ended without a motion. That in the Commons, after a futile attempt at a count-out, and in the absence of any organised gathering of Opposition members, resulted, as a matter of course, in a Ministerial victory. But the Government was so decidedly worsted in both debates that the fresh instructions to Colonial Governors, which were promised by the law officers on behalf of the Ministry, will probably be conceived with more regard to the law of nations, and less servile devotion to the interests of the United States, than distinguished the incriminated despatch of the Duke of Newcastle.

Lord Derby's speech on the seizure of the Birkenhead steam-rams, on Friday night, hit the Government exceedingly hard; and Lord Russell's arrogant but ineffective reply only showed the severity of the blow. The Conservative leader had laid bare with a master's hand the secret history of one of the most disgraceful transactions by which the honour of an English Minister was ever tarnished. He showed the close connection of Mr. Adams's menaces with Lord Russell's measures; he indicated the political motives which induced the Government to treat Messrs. Laird with exceptional and unwarrantable severity, and to avail themselves of all the chicanery and oppressive machinery of the law, in order to crush, if possible, the man who had won the new borough of Birkenhead for Her Majesty's Opposition; he treated with just but merciless ridicule the pretended fears of a forcible abduction of the vessels which had induced the Government first to place an armed force on board, and then to seize them and place them under the guns of a frigate; he tore the veil from their conduct, and exposed it, in all its meanness, injustice, malice, and illegality, to the contempt and condemnation of the country. Lord Russell had nothing but angry curses and ribald abuse to return; and never did he exhibit a more miserable spectacle than when he stood at the table, writhing under the castigation he had suffered, endeavouring to revenge raillery by railing, and to answer demonstration by invective.

A good deal has been said of Mr. Roebuck's violent language in describing the Government of the United States; but Mr. Roebuck's invectives were courteous in comparison with the terms in which the advocates of the Ministry have spoken of the Confederate Government, of Captain Semmes, and of Messrs. Laird. The first has been repeatedly charged with systematic endeavours to infringe our neutrality, and evade our laws; the fact being that the most careful instructions have been given to their agents to avoid by all means anything approaching to an infraction of British neutrality or British law; and that those orders have been so faithfully obeyed that, if the Court of Exchequer be right in its interpretation of the law, no act inconsistent with their duty towards a neutral Government can be charged against any one connected with the Confederacy. In the meantime the Northern Government carries away recruits by the thousand from Ireland, captures ships in British waters, and murders British subjects on the decks of British vessels; and these outrages do not provoke from Her Majesty's Government a single harsh expression or indignant word. The captain of the Kearsage screens a gross violation of our law by a flagrant and obvious falsehood, and Lord Russell expresses his perfect satisfaction; while Captain Semmes is reviled by the Solicitor-General as guilty of 'shams, tricks, and impostures,' because he arms and commissions a captured vessel before disposing of her cargo—that vessel having proved his bona fides by cruising for several months in the character assigned to her. This is not the language in which English gentlemen are wont to describe the lawful acts of the commissioned officers of a foreign and friendly Government; and it is language utterly unbefitting the responsible advisers of the English Crown. Lord Russell's denunciation of a Power which pretends to make war at sea without being able to relieve its own ports from blockade—a thing which Napoleon did for years after Trafalgar—his angry vituperation of Messrs. Laird, in whom as a writer of despatches he professes the most implicit confidence, while in his place in Parliament he charges them with gross treachery and open falsehood—the whole tone and tenor of his speech betray his bitter animosity towards a nation of English blood and English speech, fighting, as he himself declared, for national independence, and towards all who dare to render it those services which neutrals may render at pleasure to either belligerent,—this open manifestation by the Government of a spirit totally inconsistent with neutrality, and utterly at variance with the feelings of the country, ought not to pass unrebuked; and assuredly it ought to serve as a warning to Parliament that the official custodians of the nation's honour require to be closely watched, if they are to be prevented from committing new errors as scandalous as the seizure of the Tuscaloosa, and from entailing on England the reproach, already not unfrequently heard, that in this American quarrel her neutrality is really hostility to the weak and friendship to the strong—towards the South, a neutrality like that 'armed neutrality' which once arrayed half Europe in enmity to England; towards the North, a sympathy which only just falls short of that 'alliance' which one incautious speaker actually avowed.

Financial Position of the United States.

New York: April 20, 1864.

THE FINANCIAL PANIC IN NEW YORK—BLUE DAYS IN WALL STREET—THE EFFECT OF MR. CHASE'S MEASURES THE FINANCIAL HISTORY OF THE LAST SIX MONTHS THE EXPANSION OF THE CURRENCY—THE TOTAL AMOUNT OF PAPER CIRCULATION ON APRIL 12 THE FURTHER AMOUNT AUTHORISED TO BE ISSUED ERROR IN MR. CHASE'S ESTIMATES WHAT THE PUBLIC DEBT WILL PROBABLY BE ON JULY 1—THE GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURE MR. CHASE'S EXPEDIENTS SELLING THE GOVERNMENT RESERVES OF GOLD SELLING GOVERNMENT CERTIFICATES MR. CHASE'S EFFORTS TO GET MONEY—THE NEW NATIONAL BANKS BILL TO RESTRAIN THE TRAFFIC IN GOLD MR. CHASE'S LETTER TO THE FINANCE COMMITTEE DISCONTENT—CONGRESS WILL NOT PASS AN EFFECTIVE TAX BILL—THE ATTEMPT TO TAX WILL GIVE RISE TO A REPUDIATION PARTY.

Secretary Chase has had, within a few days, a premonitory spasm of the coming convulsion. It is not time for the great upheaving. This was a sudden undulation, and passed almost in a moment; but it shook his paper fabric so fiercely, and scattered such wrecks about while it lasted, as to give a fearful idea of what will happen when the final crash comes, of which it is the presage and the warning.

Saturday and Monday were blue days in Wall Street. Mr. Chase had been in the city conferring with his financial advisers on the condition of the Treasury and the currency. Large sums are wanted for instant use; and, in spite of all his efforts, aided by the extraordinary legislation of Congress, which empowered him to go into the market and break down the premium on gold by underselling the regular dealers with the Government stock, there was a continued and increasing depreciation of Government paper. He was here several days, and, having matured his plans, left on Friday. The effect of the measures he put into operation was immediately felt, and, doubtless, surprised even himself. To help him, the banks were compelled to call in loans, and, although the operation was comparatively slight, it disclosed how little real there is in the huge transactions, built up on the paper basis. In a few hours the street was in a panic. Money-lenders tightened their purses, and looked askant at everything but the most unquestioned securities, and narrowed their lists of these so as to hamper men of absolute solvency. Nearly everybody was trying to borrow, and everybody afraid to lend. The bubble speculators caved in. The strong had hard work to get through, and the weak were shoved mercilessly to the wall. Immense quantities of stock were thrown on the market, and sold at any price for money. The losses were enormous. Some of the heaviest operators—millionnaires last week—went by the board. Bubble fortunes, which existed in the inflated value of stocks, disappeared in an instant, and thousands who, in the intoxication of the paper-money delusion, had been tempted to hazard the patient earnings of years in order to get suddenly rich, found themselves utterly ruined. The fall in shares was absolutely frightful to think of. 10 per cent., 15 per cent., 20 per cent. were common, and in some stocks 40 per cent. was lost on large contracts. Wall Street has not seen such times for many a long year, but within two days there has been a recovery, and stocks are up again, although few have got back to near their original point. A new set comes in, and since there is no real cause for expecting any contraction of the Government issues, but that, on the contrary, it is likely that more paper will be put out, and the expansion continue, there is a looking for higher prices again, and a new rage for speculation. It is said that men learn only by experience, but in stock gambling and the similar adventurous speculations of the times, it is their own experience that they wait for. The experience of others is the record of some mistake they think they can avoid. They have faith that the adversity they know must happen some time, will not happen to them nor in their time, and they go on with as much confidence as though they were sure to be safe out of reach when the inevitable calamity comes to others. There are very few who do not see that there is a terrible revulsion coming upon the Government and the people, and the lesson of the last few days ought to be an impressive warning that it may come, by some unforeseen accident or from some cause apparently trivial, at any time; and the utter helplessness of Mr. Chase, except to do injury to whatever he touches, is made conspicuous by his late efforts to check the flood on which he is carried along to ruin.

His financial history, for the last six months, is one of constant blunder and failure.

The Government expenditures have outrun his means, and hugely exceeded his calculations. The estimates with which he commenced the present Congress have all proved to be fallacious, and the promises with which he encouraged the hopes of the people have all failed of performance. He began with gold at 143, and promised a reduction of the Government issues which would materially reduce that premium, and prepare the way for an early return to specie payments.

By April 12, four and a half months later, how the account stands with him I shall state to you somewhat in detail.

His issues of Government currency have been steadily enlarged, month by month, in the following rate of progression. They were, on the day of his report—

December 1	$453,900,000
January 1	488,300,000
February 1	500,700,000
March 1	544,600,000

And at the date of his last report—

April 12	660,000,000

I omit the fractions under hundreds of thousands. The expansion has been at the rate of nearly $50,000,000 a month.

On the same day gold had reached in the regular market to 175, against repressive measures to be noted. In the course of a few hours that day, under a stimulus thrown into the market by some eccentric movement of the Secretary and his friends, it went up, touching 190, and suddenly subsided; but, under all circumstances, it has not been down so low by twenty per cent. as it was at the opening of Congress.

But this $660,000,000 does not represent the whole paper circulation which was then swelling the arteries of trade and lifting everything upwards on a flood of high prices. A summary of the paper money actually in circulation on that day, and of the legal capacity for the issue of more, against which there is no check in convertibility or responsibility for redemption, otherwise than in more and similar paper, makes the following startling exhibit.

In circulation, omitting fractions under tens of millions—

Government legal tenders . . .	$660,000,000
Notes of State Banks . . .	160,000,000
,, New National Banks (est.) .	10,000,000
Fractional currency	20,000,000
Outstanding . . .	$880,000,000

Mr. Chase has authority to issue $200,000,000 more. The New National Banks, a contrivance of his by which the funded public debt is converted again into currency, are limited to $300,000,000—that is, have a power to put out $260,000,000 more. The State Banks, unless suppressed by the legislation now levelled at them in Congress, may issue still further $100,000,000. There is, therefore, in addition to the $880,000,000 of currency actually afloat, a capacity to put forth $560,000,000 more, making altogether an irredeemable paper circulation of $1,440,000,000 of inconvertible paper. If, according to Mr. Chase's project now before Congress, the State Bank circulation should be taxed out of existence, to make place for the new issues of the favoured National institutions, there will still remain a paper capacity of inflation, without check or convertibility, amounting to $1,180,000,000. There is nothing in the condition of the country which gives assurance that it will not be exercised in full. After the failure of all the Secretary's predictions and promises made in December, no faith is attached to his assurances that this volume will be reduced, or to his capacity to devise any means by which it will be reduced. Indeed, there is no obvious way by which he can carry on the government at all, except by the further use of paper issues to an amount which it is impossible for him to define.

He commenced the session by estimating, for the means he asked of Congress to carry on the government, that the expenditures would exceed the revenues to the extent that the debt would be, on the 1st of July next, $1,686,000,000. They have so outrun his estimate, that the debt is now (April 12) $1,626,000,000, with two months and a half before him of the heaviest expenditure of the year, in addition to the conceded fact that there are more than a hundred millions of audited accounts waiting for payment, and a huge amount of temporary accommodations and suspended claims which ought to be settled and paid. In May the expenditures for the pay of the army will be very large, so that it is not an unreasonable estimate to fix the adjusted debt on July 11 at $2,000,000,000, instead of Mr. Chase's estimate of $1,680,000,000. His estimate was made for December 1, and he has accordingly, by underestimating his expenses, made an error of about $47,000,000 a month, or more than $1,500,000 a day.

The elements for calculating the actual expenditure of the Government are very imperfect; but the shrewdest observers in the political interest of the Government put it down at not less than $1,000,000,000 for the year, and do not see in the condition of public affairs any grounds for calculating upon a reduction.

This was the financial condition in April: a vast paper issue, constantly expanding—a debt growing beyond Mr. Chase's own conception—no revenues and no preparation for taxing—and gold at 175. Mr. Chase had fancied a large part of this rise in gold to be due to the speculations of gold-gamblers in the markets, and obtained from Congress the Bill he asked for, enabling him, as he thought, to go into the market with the Government reserves of gold and beat down the speculators. He tried the gold certificate expedient—selling Government certificates at prices below the market rates to importers, receiving them back at the Custom-houses for gold. The experiment cost him several millions of dollars and a great deal of odium before it was abandoned as a failure. A few merchants in a single city realised a large profit by obtaining from the Government the means of paying duties at a large discount from the prevailing market rates for gold; but the market rate was never reduced to the Government rate, and the attempt was given up as hopeless; and now other expedients are projected.

Under these perplexities and failures, Mr. Chase came to New York last week for money. He wanted to sell his bonds—the 10-40's—and he wanted to support his credit by reducing the premium on gold—two things manifestly incompatible, unless he put his rate of interest so high as to compensate lenders for the increased value of the medium in which they made their advances to him. A low interest would require an easy market, and to float such a loan the expansion must continue. He got some subscriptions and some other help, but it was because it was felt that the expansion must go on, as the tenacious maintenance of the gold prices during all these troubles sufficiently demonstrates. The violent measures he took in his attack upon gold—selling large Government stocks and large amounts of exchange—had such a damaging effect on the markets as to make it probable that no such experiments will be repeated. To secure the taking of his loan, the money market must be kept easy, and no contraction will be directly encouraged by the Secretary. Increased paper and paper money are his only resources against stoppage of payment. The sale of these bonds is increasing, but is not at all adequate to the daily necessities of the Government, even to the keeping down of the increase of paper emissions for circulation. If the whole amount be taken, of which he has authorised the sale, and so much of the currency be thereby converted into a fixed debt, payable in gold, with five per cent. interest in gold, a hundred dollars for fifty-nine dollars in hand, the sum obtained will not check the expansion of greenbacks for more than ninety days. Mr. Chase sees this, and has called upon Congress to give him a temporary relief, in his present difficulties, by two more acts of legislation, which, in asking for them, he confesses to be merely palliatives. Other people pronounce them to be absurd and mischievous nostrums. But one effect of the terror which the New York panic has excited at Washington is to increase Mr. Chase's power to get whatever legislation he asks for. Congress is perplexed and frightened into abandoning the whole question of financial administration to the discretion of the Secretary, without asking questions. Only a few days ago, the House of Representatives, after long debate, rejected a project which he had elaborately urged upon them for compelling the State Banks to withdraw their circulation in favour of the New National Banks. The scheme is now suddenly revived, and passes through the same House without material change by a large majority. Some time ago an eccentric senator from Kansas introduced into the Senate a Bill to restrain the traffic in gold, which was shelved away in that body, and laughed at out of it for its grotesque absurdity. Mr. Chase has revived it almost in the identical terms, and recommends that dealing in gold, or in foreign exchange, on time, or for credit, or otherwise than for cash and by actual owners dealing for themselves, payment in currency actually passing at the time by manual delivery, and at the actual place of business of the dealer, shall be a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment. Notwithstanding the crude novelty of this measure, the Senate gratified him by passing the Bill, although several of the senators voting for it stated that they had scruples about its constitutionality, and did not believe it would do any good, but gave it to the Secretary because he asked for it, and they thought he ought to have all he asked for in these times of national difficulty. Is it not just possible that some of them were altogether willing to get rid of personal responsibility by heaping it all on him, with the provident thought that the time may not be far off when it will be a responsibility for something which will have happened, from any event in which every public man will be anxious to clear himself?

Mr. Chase himself is not without his own precautions. Nothing less than a thorough conviction of impending disaster, from which he sees no method of escape, could impel the Finance Minister of a Government at war to make the avowal of impending bankruptcy, in language like that which Mr. Chase caused to be laid before the Senate in a letter which he addressed to the Finance Committee recommending the adoption of the two measures I have mentioned. His language is:—

'It must not be thought that I regard either or both of these measures adequate remedies for financial disorder. Nothing short of taxation to one-half of the amount of our current expenditures, and a reduction of those expenditures to the lowest point compatible with efficiency, will insure financial success to the Government; and without military success all measures will fail.'

The annual rate of expenditure is now at least $1,000,000,000 per annum. There are sagacious and well-informed men who insist that it is not less than four millions a day. Of present reduction of expenditure there is no possible prospect. The taxation which Mr. Chase invokes, as essential to insure success to the finances of the Government, is not less than five hundred millions of dollars a year—that is, five hundred millions of fixed permanent revenue are necessary, even if there be a military success. Otherwise 'all measures will fail.' It requires military success, now, to make five hundred millions of taxation sufficient to carry on the government. That, too, be it noted, will be for a peace establishment. What would be needed for a continual war establishment, if success shall not come in time, and so completely as to close up the war and stop the expenditures, Mr. Chase does not profess to compute; for it is plainly in his thoughts that, unless the war be thus finished the present year, the Government is bankrupt.

The friends of Secretary Chase and others are turning fiercely upon Congress with reproaches for having broken down the public credit, and brought the country to the very verge of bankruptcy by failing to provide taxation, in time, for the support of the Government in maintaining a sound currency and unstained credit. Already it is quoted here, as a bitter humiliation and the sign of shameful discredit, that the 6 per cent. stocks of the proud Government of the United States, rule in London only a trifle above the rates at which a loan was negotiated for the intrusive Emperor of Mexico, who has not yet entered upon his dominions, nor organised an Administration. It almost seems as if this were the beginning of a wrangle among the factions, to throw off upon each other the odium of the national dishonour which they fear or foresee in the ultimate if not the early repudiation of the debt, by the failure to provide means for discharging the interest or giving security for the principal.

The twofold condition by which this is to be averted is, first, complete military success; and, secondly, immediate taxation to raise five hundred millions of dollars a year. Knowing the strength, endurance, preparation, and determination of the South, the first condition may be dismissed as unattainable. There can be no success by arms which will do away with the necessity of raising more than this five hundred millions.

Congress, however, has indulged the Secretary by bringing forward a Tax Bill. How much this scheme is estimated to produce does not appear in the published reports or debates thus far. But if you watch the progress of the Bill, you will not fail to discover that substantial, effective taxation is not in the contemplation of members so much as the tiding over of a political crisis, and the deferring of embarrassing questions till after the Presidential election. They will all be for the redemption of the public faith as a sentiment, and for taxation in the abstract. But the positive laying of sufficient taxes, and the actual collection of them afterwards, are a very different affair. Every man will be for all sorts of taxes that do not touch his constituents heavily, or endanger his popularity in voting for them. There will be fighting over the details between the East and the West, and of two things you may be sure: there will be no Tax Bill of any practical value which will go into operation before the Presidential election, and whatever Bill may be passed will be the subject of angry contentions and the germ of a party which will, sooner or later, and probably soon, avow the purpose of throwing off the burden of the debt altogether.

Decline of Beecher-Stowe-ism.—The silly cant which concluded Lord Russell's speech—the appeal to the passions and prejudices of a bygone age, when Englishmen knew no more about Southern slavery than Mrs. H. B. Stowe could tell them—the endeavour to cover a false position and wind up successfully a lame defence by eliciting a cheer for emancipation—was worthy of no audience above the level of a tavern debating society. The blunder showed how completely the speaker mistook the general feeling not only of his immediate audience, but of English society in general. Once satisfied that the negro, though called a slave, enjoys as much happiness and personal freedom as he is capable of turning to good account, no educated Englishman is disposed to indulge in sentimental pity for his imaginary degradation; while the manful efforts of a people of English blood, inheriting to the full our English love of liberty and pride of national independence, to preserve the rights they have hitherto maintained inviolate, to defend their country and their homes against a foreign invader, appeal to all our strongest, most generous, and most universal sympathies. No one can enter any numerous society of Englishmen, from the House of Commons downwards, without perceiving that this is the dominant feeling in regard to the American war; that while the sentiments of Earl Russell are shared only by a few eccentric sentimentalists or narrow-minded political fanatics, the sympathies of educated men for the Confederate cause—distinctly as the cause of freemen battling for freedom—are strong and almost universal. Three years ago Lord Russell's affectation of Abolitionist enthusiasm would have been, in almost every circle, the correct thing—a hollow but decorous formality: now it is an hypocrisy without motive or purpose, a homage to prejudices which are forgotten, and an offence to feelings which are general, warm, and vivid.—Standard, May 2.

LETTERS FROM RICHMOND.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Richmond: March 21, 1864.

THE RETURN OF PAROLED CONFEDERATE PRISONERS—THE EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS—THE SUFFERINGS AND MORTALITY OF CONFEDERATES IN THE NORTH—PROBABLE RECOGNITION OF BUTLER AS AGENT—THE PROCLAMATION OF OUTLAWRY AGAINST HIM WILL NOT BE WITHDRAWN—THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE DAHLGREN PAPERS.

The vernal equinox has come cloudy and cold—a leaden sky betokening snow, and the smile of the rosy spring withdrawn from the shivering fruit-trees and the poor little pinched blades of grass. The rosy spring, like the Yankees, made a premature advance, and has retreated. In a few weeks both will return—the one with banners of green and chains of lilac and larkspur, to establish her genial supremacy over the rejoicing land; the other, as we hope and believe, to be driven back disgraced in the eyes of the world.

The most interesting event of the week in Richmond has been the return of paroled Confederate prisoners from Point Lookout. On Tuesday last, the 15th, the boats brought up 800, with 30 or 40 officers, from City Point, and yesterday there arrived 1,100 more with 60 officers. On both occasions there was an enthusiastic demonstration of welcome, but yesterday the ovation was exceedingly striking. Notice was given out in all the churches at morning service that the prisoners might be expected at four o'clock in the afternoon, and the citizens were requested to send provisions to the Capitol Square, that the long-famished Confederates might enjoy a hearty meal immediately on their arrival in the city. Accordingly four o'clock found a vast multitude, probably 10,000 persons of both sexes, collected in the square, with long trains of commissary stores, to wit negro servants, each bearing on his or her head, with that delicate yet perfectly firm poise peculiar to the Confederate African race, a tray or hamper filled with ham, tongue, oysters, rolls, biscuits, and other edibles, or carrying large pots of coffee with the means of keeping the same warm; and at five o'clock the long column of the expected guests made its way into the enclosure, passing though the gateway in front of the Governor's mansion, in time to the music of a military band. They were under the escort of the Public Guard, and moved in good order, though not with the precision of a parade in review, for at every few steps some ragged brave would break the line to receive a sandwich or a plug of tobacco from a bystander, or to pick up a bouquet flung by fair hands from a neighbouring window. As they entered the square, the enthusiasm of the assembled throng broke out in tumultuous cheering; and to one looking down upon the scene from the upper story of the Capitol building, the swaying to and fro of the dense mass resembled the agitation of an angry sea—the frequent flutter of cambric handkerchiefs here and there being the counterpart of the 'white caps,' and the wild hurrahs of the excited crowd uniting in a roar which answered to the voice of many waters. When the last man had passed in, the whole body of the returned prisoners was drawn out in double rows of two ranks, five or six feet apart, and the President and Governor walked between, from one end to the other of the line, shaking the men by the hand and congratulating them on their safe return to Dixie; and then these two high dignitaries were followed by the negro commissaries 'toting' the trays and hampers as aforesaid. The band meanwhile discoursed the 'Mocking Bird' and the 'Marseillaise,' and other threadbare Confederate music (our martial and sentimental airs are worn even more ragged than our soldiery), and the crowd fraternised with their guests, hearing from them such fragmentary accounts of their imprisonment as they might give with their mouths and hearts full of biscuit and emotion. Otway did not gobble up his fatal roll with more avidity than many of these poor fellows devoured their complimentary rations. After a little time, the President moved to a small cleared space near the base of the Washington Monument, and addressed the paroled prisoners in a short speech, characterised by his usual good taste and nervous eloquence.* Such of the soldiers as heard the President, perhaps two hundred, cheered him roundly; but there was no need of invoking the memories of '76 to rouse the men who had marched to the beat of Jackson's drums, and charged up the blazing heights of Gettysburg. They have set up a standard for themselves, and their own deeds impel them to maintain the highest, proudest defiance to the foe. If they falter, they will be recreant to their own fame, and this were enough to make them faithful unto the last. When the President had concluded his remarks, Governor Smith was called out and spoke for a few moments, and then, darkness coming down out of a cold cloudy heaven, the column formed again and moved out to Camp Lee, where quarters for the paroled prisoners had been provided.

The exchange of prisoners, which had thus been informally resumed between Messrs. Mulford and Ould, it was hoped, would go on without further interruption until accounts between the two belligerents had been fully settled. But it would seem that the Yankees have not, by any means, yielded the point of the recognition of Butler as Commissioner, and that they intend making this a sine qua non to any further surrender of Confederate prisoners. Not another Confederate shall be given up, they declare, until we agree to treat with Butler in the matter. I have no means of knowing whether our Government will recede from the position it has taken on this subject, but it is quite certain that a very great change has taken place in popular sentiment with regard to the recognition of Butler, and a very large majority of our people, from principle or expediency, are in favour of resuming the exchange under the cartel upon the basis demanded by the enemy. Upon second thought, reflecting men gravely doubt whether the original refusal to treat with Butler was justified by any authority in public law, and whether we have the right to dictate to the Lincoln Government as to whom they shall appoint to conduct business arising out of the accidents or exigencies of a state of war. It will be borne in mind that, in the matter of the cartel, Butler was named merely as an agent to carry out the provisions of an agreement already entered into. Were the question of Butler's acceptance as Commissioner to be considered de novo, the parties would stand in different relations to each other from those which now exist between them; but even then, the necessity of the case would overrule objection, for undoubtedly we would not hesitate to send a flag of truce into Butler's lines to recover our dead and wounded after a battle, or to receive one from him upon a like occasion. But the voice of humanity pleads more eloquently than the voice of reason. We have 30,000 men languishing in Yankee prisons, wasting unto death in Yankee pest-houses. They are our brothers, once the light and joy of Southern homes, not mercenaries from the Shannon or the Rhine. For months they have been subjected to cruel exposures and hardships, to cold, hunger, and the want of clothing. Their sufferings have never been wholly absent from our thoughts, but by the return of two thousand of their number we have been made more fully acquainted with the actual condition of the unhappy inmates of Point Lookout, Fort Delaware, and Johnson's Island. Messages from those who were left behind have reminded us, in a most affecting manner, of the love and loyalty so long shut out from our recognition.

The Confederate prisoners are dying by scores every day, the life ebbing away from them almost imperceptibly, by no acute disease, in no 'fiery, throbbing pain,' but through what the doctors call nostalgia, a ceaseless sighing for home and friends. The cheek grows pale and thin, the vitality wastes in the once strong limbs, the eye loses its brilliancy, and thus the men who bore up against the rigours of the winter campaigns of old Stonewall, and endured without a murmur the midsummer heats of Mississippi, give up their lives to that heart-sickness which the wise man tells us comes from 'hope deferred.' The matter of Butler's recognition or rejection must be finally settled at the close of the present week, for it is the intention of the Yankees to bring 1,100 more of our prisoners to City Point on Saturday next, to be taken back to Point Lookout in case our Government should adhere to its present position. My own opinion is that Butler will be received, and that the exchange will go on until all the prisoners on both sides are returned. It is understood, however, that under no circumstances that can arise, will the proclamation of outlawry against Butler be withdrawn, and Commissioner Ould will probably be instructed to tell him this in the very letter, should he write one, indicating the willingness of this Government to treat with him as the agent of Lincoln for carrying out the provisions of the cartel. The caput lupinum, which has been put upon him, will not be removed, and he may rest assured that, should he fall into the hands of the Confederates, his execution is certain.

Butler is so well satisfied on this point that no prospect of military glory will ever induce him to come into close quarters with the Confederates. A week ago, while the officers and men last returned to us from Point Lookout were at Fortress Monroe, Butler sent for a young 'rebel' colonel, and begged that the latter would answer with perfect frankness a few questions which he wished to propound, remarking that the Colonel's status as a prisoner of war would not be affected in any manner thereby. The Colonel signified his willingness to enlighten General Butler as to any matters that lay within his knowledge. 'Colonel,' said Butler, 'should the chances of war throw me into your hands, what would you do with me?' 'I should execute you upon the spot.' 'Is this purpose entertained generally by the officers of your army?' 'Yes, and by the privates too.' 'Sir, I thank you for your candour.' 'Sir, you are entirely welcome to it.' Here the interview terminated, and the Colonel retired.

As we supposed, the Yankee press is out in full chorus upon the Dahlgren papers, charging the Confederate Government with forgery. Their voices are somewhat discordant, indeed, but they unite in the general acclaim of accusation, and in a certain amusing and agreeable horror of the atrocity of imputing the intent to commit rape, arson, and murder to that lamented young hero. The Philadelphia Inquirer declares that no such orders were found, and that the lie was manufactured 'out of whole cloth;' while the New York Times tells us that one E. A. Paul, a travelling correspondent of the Northern papers, saw the orders before Kilpatrick set out on his expedition, and that the words concerning the assassination of the President and Cabinet were not then contained in them. So we have the story of the kettle over again. Let Mr. Paul's admission as to the promulgation of the orders for the sack of Richmond and its destruction by fire be received as conclusive against the assumption that the documents are spurious, until an official authentication shall be given to the world of their genuineness in every particular.

The transfer of Grant to the command-in-chief of the armies of the United States, 'with his head-quarters in the field' in Northern Virginia, and the call of Lincoln for 200,000 men in addition to the 500,000 already called for and not yet obtained, make it certain that a grand attack will be made upon Richmond at no distant day. The utmost confidence is felt here that this attack will be repelled, while the war spirit of the army is excited to the highest point at the prospect of again engaging the Yankees. Meanwhile, doubtless, Mr. Seward, through Mr. Adams, is again assuring Earl Russell, with his most distinguished consideration, that the rebellion will be effectually crushed out in ninety days, if, indeed, as is highly probable, the rebels do not sooner lay down their arms. 'We are a great people.'

A PAUSE IN MILITARY OPERATIONS—A REVIEW OF THE PAST AND FUTURE OF THE WAR—THE CONFEDERATES ARE COMPELLED TO CONTINUE THE WAR—THE THREE YEARS OF WARFARE—THE RESOURCES OF THE UNITED STATES—THE STUPENDOUS EFFORTS MADE TO CONQUER THE CONFEDERATES—THEIR FAILURE—DOES IT NOT IMPRESS ENGLAND AND FRANCE WITH THE HOPELESSNESS OF THE NORTHERN CAUSE?—THE MORAL SIDE OF THE WAR—NORTHERN DESPOTISM—FEDERAL ATROCITIES—THE BLOODSHED AND DESOLATION ARE IN VAIN—THE NEED OF EUROPEAN RECOGNITION—THE PATRIOTISM OF THE SOUTHERN PEOPLE—THE BURDEN OF TAXATION BORNE WITHOUT A MURMUR—THE EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

A snow-storm, accompanied by a violent wind from the NE., which prevailed throughout Virginia during the day and night of the 22nd instant, the snow drifting in many places to the depth of ten or fifteen feet, followed since by a downpour of rain, has made the roads, which had been previously dry and firm, as bad as Tony Lumpkin's Feather-bed Lane, and the movement of artillery and provision trains being just now impracticable, there is a pause in military operations at the very moment when we had expected the opening of the spring campaign. At other points along the border, there is a lull in active hostilities. All is quiet in General Johnston's front. The bombardment of Charleston has ceased for a time. The silence of desolation reigns in the track of Sherman's retreating footsteps; and in the solemn woods of Florida, where lately the din of battle disturbed the immemorial stillness, the carol of jay and mocking-bird, and the careless song of the bivouac, alone break the deep repose of nature.

At such a moment of impressive inaction, it is impossible that the mind should not turn to the past and future of the war in which we are engaged, and that the melancholy cui bono should not furnish the material of serious meditation. To the Confederates the answer to the question is easy and simple. 'To what good end?' is resolved by them thus—to liberty and peace, to the protection of their homes and loved ones, pro aris et focis, to the conservation of all that is held dear on earth. The continuance of the war is compulsory on their part, for it is a matter of life and death, existence or annihilation, with them. Better, far better the absolute extinction of the Southern people than submission to the ruthless enemy who has already announced his fell purpose of wholesale execution, exile, imprisonment, and confiscation. But what good end can the nations of Europe see as the result of a struggle which they regard with an apathy that seems to strengthen with the lapse of time? Let us look for a moment at the present condition of affairs on the American continent, and deduce therefrom the moral that Europe refuses to draw in her stolid indifference to our future. The United States has been at war with the Confederate States during a space of three years. Or, if you please to state it in accordance with the views of Mr. Seward, the United States has been engaged for three years in putting down a local rebellion under the lead of a few misguided men, which rebel Power it was a grievous wrong on the part of Great Britain and France to recognise as a belligerent. The United States undertook to do this work with 75,000 men, and in the space of ninety days. They have already called into the field more than two millions of fighting men. And it is to be borne in mind that the three years spent by them already in the attempt to 'put down' this 'local rebellion,' when properly computed by the calculus of modern mechanical invention, would equal thirty years of warfare, not in the days of Parma or of Frederick, but in the days of the first Napoleon. In manufacturing enterprise, industrial skill, and improved engineering, the United States, at the beginning of this war, was surpassed by no nation on earth, or surpassed by England alone. The mechanical arts had been carried by the Northern people to the highest degree of perfection. They had great forges, well-appointed navy-yards, immense workshops all over the land. On the other hand, the Confederate States were comparatively poor in material resources or in the effective means of employing them. [The minutely observant reader will remark that while I use the United States in grammatical connection with a verb in the singular number, I use the Confederate States with a verb in the plural number. This is not to be taken either as a grammatical blunder or as a lapsus pennæ. The whole sum of our calamities is involved in the distinction. Centralisation and overgrown Federal power on the one hand, and separate State sovereignty and republican freedom on the other, are indicated respectively as the verb is written in the singular or the plural form.] By the agency of steam in the propulsion of its large and rapidly augmented marine, the United States was able to transport great armies to points the most remote in less time than, forty years ago, it would have been possible to collect the same number of men at the appointed places of rendezvous. It is the boast of our enemy, and probably with reason, that their siege ordnance is heavier, their solid and explosive projectiles more destructive, their field ammunition more perfect, and their naval construction for bays and rivers more economical and efficient than any war-making power on earth has yet shown its capability of producing. Mr. Seward, in one of those remarkable essays addressed to Mr. Adams for the moral edification of mankind, wherein he carries every point by mingling the discursive with the didactic, observed that England seemed to be entirely satisfied with her preparations for war when it appeared imminent with the United States on account of the affair of the Trent, and yet the daily performances of the United States in the manufacture of implements of war to put down a 'local rebellion' largely exceeded what England could, or was content to, do in the same time, to place herself on a military equality with 'the greatest nation on the globe.' Making every allowance for Yankee self-laudation and bombast in this assumption of Mr. Seward, it must be admitted that the machinery which the Yankees have fashioned and employed in their attempts to conquer the Confederate States has been more tremendous than any of which history makes mention. And now what has been accomplished, after three years of ceaseless endeavour, by all this combination of warlike appliances? Has the 'rebellion' been crushed? Is it likely to be crushed in three months or in three hundred? The Yankees have not acquired undisputed and uninterrupted possession even of the river which separates us from Arkansas and Texas. And Texas, cut off to a great extent from her sister States and without the means of communicating directly with the seat of government, has suddenly risen up with something almost of imperial might to resist the invader, who has not as yet penetrated three miles into the interior. The enemy holds Norfolk; but Charleston defies him. And the armies of the Confederacy, which all parties at the North, from Conservative Fillmore to infuriate Beecher, agree must be driven from the field before they can hope to see the beginning of the end, are now stronger, better disciplined, and more buoyant than ever. Does this fact fail to impress the people and the Governments of England and France with the utter hopelessness of the cause of Lincoln and Seward?

So far the survey we have taken thus rapidly of the condition of American affairs has left out of view the moral side of the war and the considerations which should impel an enlightened people who stand aloof heartily to desire its speedy discontinuance—to insist, indeed, that the combatants should lay down their arms, and that the braggarts who have so vauntingly undertaken an impossible task should no longer outrage humanity and disturb the peace of mankind. When we come to consider the morale of the American war, we see on the one side a people under the iron rule of a military despotism, with every muniment of constitutional liberty struck down, their whole social system disorganised, their Government under a debt which is fearfully increasing and can never be paid, intent upon the extermination of a race superior to them, we may say without arrogance, in all manly qualities, and banded together in the unalterable resolution to win their independence or perish in the effort. The stronger party has excited the indignation of mankind by its numberless atrocities. Discarding the pretext that the war is carried on for the restoration of the Union, the Yankees now declare that its object is the wholesale assassination and spoliation of the Confederates. Accordingly, the devastation of the country, the sack of cities, the pillage, imprisonment, or murder of non-combatants, mark the progress of their arms. One general robs the repositories of the dead, and puts up the tombstones at public auction; another carries off silver plate, and decks his wife with the diamonds he has stolen from Southern houses; a third violates the unhappy women whom the cruel fortune of war has thrown into his hands; a fourth desecrates the temples of religion, and puts the ball and chain of the felon upon the servants of God who have ministered at their altars. The President of the United States himself claims a jurisdiction over the churches of the States in 'rebellion,' and sends his agents to seize every house of worship within the Federal lines, and provide for loyal praying and Union thanksgiving therein. And while all these diabolisms have been going on, half a million of the human race have perished on the field of battle or in the sick wards of the hospital; among them the very flower of the youth of a brave, virtuous, and cultivated people—the gifted and learned who, under less stormy fates, had ornamented and illustrated the literature, the science, the society, or the statesmanship of the land in whose defence they fell; and the sun has gone back for half a century on the dial of Western civilisation. And now, while the perfidious and malignant Yankee still carries the torch and the gyves and the halter into those regions which a stern military necessity leaves unprotected, half a million more of men are about to rush into deadly conflict in the unequal struggle—unequal, as it finds the free-born men of the soil, the young and those of matured years, the representatives of every class, arrayed against a horde of foreign mercenaries and men even more brutal than they, who follow the flag of the Union for the gratification of the vilest passions—hatred, avarice, and lust! Cui bono say you again? What are the nations to gain by letting this strife go on? It can never end in the restoration of the ancient Union. One of two results must follow upon its conclusion—either the South will establish its separate nationality, after infinite sorrow and tribulation, and through a long and wasting war, which will reduce North and South to beggary; or the North will subjugate the South, and in that subjugation will have transformed half a continent, which once contributed immensely every year to the happiness and wealth of the human race, to the condition of the wilderness, and put to the sword a distinctive people, who by their representatives in the past and present generations, and by their own lofty virtues, have elevated the general conception of the human character; who gave Washington to the eighteenth, and Stonewall Jackson to the nineteenth century. Neither of these results can be immediate. How can England, how can France remain passive in contemplation of the waste of treasure, the sacrifice of life that is involved in the further continuance of this mad quarrel? What length of time shall be set down as necessary to the recognition of a Government administering the affairs of eight millions of people? If three years' maintenance of its individuality cannot suffice, will thirty? If three years of warfare carried on without result against it with colossal means of offence—three years, which, I have said before, ought to be reckoned as thirty by reason of the improvement in war-making machinery—does not satisfy the world of its ability to sustain itself, will a hundred?

* We published the President's speech in our last number.

Throughout this whole weary period, the Confederate States have asked nothing of Europe but the simple acknowledgment of their separate existence. They make no appeal at this moment but that mute appeal, more eloquent than speech, which the spectacle of heroic endurance of suffering for principle's sake must always make to the heart of humanity—an appeal which is addressed with wondrous power to the eye and the human feeling of every foreigner of sensibility that comes among us, by the empty sleeves and the wooden legs of the mutilated men whom he sees in our streets. Sometimes I think that these sights would move even the stony breast of Earl Russell, and that if he could be brought into the Confederacy and shown the wasted fields, the smouldering ruins of what were once pleasant homesteads, the general havoc of Seward's ruthless armies—if he could be made to see the cheerfulness and courage and devotion of our people—he would be ashamed of his alliance with the Yankees, and adopt a policy more in accordance with the magnanimity and justice, not to say the pluck, which ought to characterise the British nation of to-day. But when we behold him truckling to the insolence of the Yankee Secretary of State, and stooping to secure his Ministerial majority in the House of Commons by the production of a paper already known to be forged—when, year after year, we find him refusing to listen to the voice of reason, speak she never so wisely nor so forcibly—we cannot but think that neither would he be persuaded though he beheld such sad scenes.

Nothing could exemplify the patriotic devotion of the Southern people more strikingly than the ready acquiescence they have given to the recent legislation of Congress. No obstacle has been thrown in the way of the enlarged conscription. Within a few days the old currency will have been in greater part called in, and the most daring measure of finance ever attempted in the history of government will have been carried into effect. Instead of a circulation of nine hundred millions, we shall have a circulation of two hundred millions. The management of an enormous debt will be shown by the success of the Currency Bill to be as easy as was its creation; and though the transformation of so immense an amount from the form of currency to that of bonds is necessarily attended with much hardship, there is no murmur on the part of the people, and even the holders of small sums, who must suffer the instantaneous depreciation on April 1 of 33⅓ per cent., do not cry out against it. The taxes, onerous enough, under the Tax Bill of 1863, have been cheerfully paid, and the still heavier burdens imposed by the last Congress will excite no clamour. The speculators apart, the people of the Confederate States are submissive to the loss of property, and willing to give up everything for the cause, and a morning paper (the Examiner) has remarked upon the striking fact, that in those regions where the people have been made to undergo the cruelest sacrifices, the spirit of undying resistance to the enemy is fiercest.

The widow and children of William B. Mumford, who was murdered by Butler in New Orleans, have arrived in Richmond. They are penniless, and a subscription in their behalf is in circulation in this city and in the camps. Their support is a sacred duty to the people of the Confederacy.

THE TUSCALOOSA.—The question of law involved is not that with which the Solicitor-General dealt at so much length—whether or not the Tuscaloosa was by Captain Semmes converted into a vessel of war. If this were the question there could, we think, be little doubt that it must be decided, as Mr. Whiteside argued it, in favour of Captain Semmes. The ship was armed and manned; she cruised for several months as a vessel of war, which decides the fact; and the right of Captain Semmes so to convert her is unquestionable. But this is not to the point. The question really involved is this: grant that the Tuscaloosa was a prize; grant that she was an uncondemned prize; had we any right to seize her? Now, as a general rule, it is clear that we had not. A neutral has no jurisdiction except over prizes taken in his waters, or taken by vessels armed within his waters. And the absence of condemnation is of no sort of consequence except as between the captor and his government: property in an enemy's vessel vests by capture merely. Again, the Queen's proclamation of neutrality enables us to exclude prizes from our ports, but it gives us no sort of power to seize them, and no kind of jurisdiction over them. The Solicitor-General affirmed that they might be seized 'for a violation of our neutrality.' But this clearly untrue. There is no violation of our neutrality in the entrance of a prize into our ports. By the common law of nations, all belligerent vessels, prizes or not, have a right to enter our ports; and our right to exclude them is limited to exclusion, and does not extend either to confiscation or to jurisdiction.—Standard.

LETTER FROM HALIFAX.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

HALIFAX, Nova Scotia: April 14, 1864.

WE have at present sojourning in our city a victim of the Federal despotism—John Torell, a British subject, and until lately a resident of Nashville, Tennessee, where he had been for some time the business editor of the Tennessee Baptist. When the Yankees took possession of Nashville, among other measures taken for the creation of a 'Union' feeling among the unfortunate inhabitants, was the suppression of the Baptist. But this was only the commencement of Mr. Torell's persecution. Shortly afterwards he had occasion to officiate at the grave over the remains of a victim to Yankee vindictiveness, and took occasion to deprecate the acts of violence daily committed in and around the city by Lincoln's lawless soldiery. For this he was arrested and thrown into prison, and for seven long months he was incarcerated in a penitentiary at Nashville, for the nonce turned into the Federal Bastile. Among other victims to the reign of terror established in Nashville was an old man of disordered mind, who had been thrown into prison upon some pretext, and who was treated in the most shocking manner. Mr. Torell says: 'That any civilised Power, or its accredited agents and high functionaries, should become implicated in such outrages as I saw perpetrated on that old man, surpasses all belief. He would be handcuffed for hours at a time around a tree in the prison yard. His back was almost an entire scab from bayonet stabs. His face and head were fearfully bruised by the blows he was constantly subjected to from the ruffianly guards.

'On one occasion, he had a most fearful fall, and was doubled up into a most painful position, from which it was impossible he could extricate himself. While hugging the tree, handcuffed, he had been allowed a stool to sit on, and he essayed, by raising himself up on this stool and by pushing the heel of one boot against the shackle of one hand, to extricate himself; but in doing so his stool fell, and his leg went over or outside his arm and handcuffs. In this condition he called loudly for help to extricate himself, but no one dared come to his rescue. At last he exclaimed, "What! have you no feeling for a fellow-creature—none of you?" I happened to be walking in the yard at the time, and determined I would brave the fury of the guard, and the lieutenant in charge too, and went to try if I could get him free from his entanglement, but found it utterly impossible without taking off his manacles, and made some remark about treating the poor wretch with that sort of barbarity. The orderly sergeant, hearing me, immediately called to one of the men to "bring that other pair of cuffs, for, by G——d, he would teach that d——d Englishman to behave himself." At this juncture the lieutenant made his appearance and ordered the old man to be released, and I heard no more about the "other pair of cuffs," and suppose the lieutenant countermanded the sergeant's order. The old man was well off, had a valuable plantation and a number of good servants, and at the time of his capture had something over $300 on his person. Of this the guard robbed him to the last cent.' This is one of the milder examples of Federal barbarism in the once happy and moral 'Rock City.'

After Mr. Torell had been seven months in prison, he received an order to go South at one day's notice. He was not permitted to go home, and was entirely without necessaries for the journey. He was kindly treated in the South, and speedily made his way to the sea-coast, ran the blockade, and reached this city in safety. His wife and family still remain at Nashville, while he has been banished from the Federal lines until the end of the war. The case has been submitted to Lord Lyons, and it is but one of many. With regard to French subjects residing in the Northern States, the Government is much more courteous, and very careful not to molest or injure them, and they are at once accorded the fullest redress when their rights are infringed upon. The contrast thus afforded does not tend to reflect any great amount of credit upon the Government of Great Britain. I have now before me a copy of a weekly religious paper published in this city, containing a letter from a father in relation to the kidnapping of his son, a British subject, born and bred in Nova Scotia, by the harpies of the North. He was so drugged by a single glass of beer, offered him in a private dwelling in Boston, on the Sabbath-day, by a man professing to be a fellow-countryman, that he knew no more until he found himself in prison in New Hampshire, in the dress of a Yankee soldier, along with a number of others. On awakening, some put their heads out of the windows, and called for aid, when one poor fellow was shot through the head by the sentry. The inhabitants of the town were much excited at these outrages, and were threatening to rescue the men. This caused them to be hurried on board a train of cars to be taken elsewhere; and after the train was in motion many jumped off and were maimed for life. One young man jumped off near a piece of woods, and ran for his life; they fired and broke his leg, yet he hopped on the other into the woods, and no further notice was taken of him. The young man above mentioned afterwards succeeded in making his escape, after undergoing the most fearful privation and suffering. The father says: 'And now I would just say, in conclusion, it is high time the British Government should speak out, and not allow her subjects with her protection in their possession to be drugged, drafted, knocked on the head, kidnapped, abducted, and spirited away after this manner.' Time, indeed, it is!

The iron steamer Florie is now in port, undergoing repairs upon the Marine Railway. The City of Petersburg (s. s.) is also undergoing repairs here. The steamer Calcdonian, which sailed for Nassau viâ Bermuda a few days ago, sprang a leak shortly after leaving port, and in attempting to breach her she got on to the rocks on the coast, and is likely to prove a total loss. She was insured.

The New York Daily News of April 16 has an able and earnest article against that last of Yankee abominations, 'miscegenation,' in the course of which the writer says: 'God did not make the mulatto. It is an invention of man's, and is produced only by the desecration and destruction of two admirable and perfect creations of God's wisdom and handicraft. The mulatto is a blasphemy.'

'THE FIRST NATION IN ALL CREATION.'—The New York Journal of Commerce puts the ideas of the radicals upon the freedom of debate in Congress into the form of a new rule, to be adopted by that body, as follows:—'No member of Congress shall advocate any plans of government, or make any speeches on the state of the Union, which shall controvert the views of the majority, or propose any other way of governing the United States, than the way determined on from time to time by the caucuses of the majority.'

THE GROWING SAVAGENESS OF THE WAR.—No matter in what direction a raid takes place, arson and plunder are now considered to be legitimate orders of the day. Burning up plantations and farms, demolishing grist-mills, and turning helpless inhabitants out to starve—which ought to bring the perpetrators of such deeds to courts-martial—are triumphantly quoted as proofs of enterprise and valour. It is strange, too, that this atrocious and impolitic system is approved by a people who have not shown themselves, so far, addicted to wanton cruelty. We have, however, no hesitation in stamping it as disgraceful to the arms, and calculated to bring ill-will upon the cause of the North among the North's most abiding friends. . . . It will be held, and rightly, that the destruction of railroads and of public stores and provisions is an entirely different matter from the indiscriminate application of the torch. Does not the fiendish glee with which these devastating processes are described fully bear out our oft-made assertion, that war is not, and never can be, a moral purifier? There is something humiliating in the avowal that, with hundreds of thousands of brave men in arms, a nation should be called upon to admire flour-mills laid in ashes and happy homes made desolate. Neither should it be forgotten that, while the seeds of eternal hatred are thus deliberately sown, the narrators of these exploits contradict all their previous assertions that the South was universally starving.—New York Albion (English organ).

SOLDIERS VOTING.—Already we see the evidence of the grand wrong done to republican institutions by authorising soldiers to vote in the ranks. If an officer speaks 'against the Administration,' or condemns the policy of 'Mr. Lincoln,' he is placed under arrest. How is it possible to have a free vote of the army in the face of this regulation? Is it possible to vote freely in the coming election without approving on the one hand, or condemning on the other, the policy and the conduct, both civil and military, of Mr. Lincoln? If any of our warm-hearted readers, who have confidence in Mr. Lincoln, do not see plainly the wrong of this matter, let us reverse the picture and imagine that, in spite of all the exertions of the Administration to perpetuate itself in power, the people should this fall elect a Democratic or Conservative President, or that, by means of a triangular contest, some out-and-out Radical like General Fremont should come into power. Then remember that a soldier is liable to punishment for discussing the measures of the Administration, and that, if any officer or private should undertake to instruct his fellow-soldiers in Radical doctrines against a Democratic President, or in Conservative doctrines against a Radical President, he must at once be arrested. What prospect for American freedom of ballot is visible in such a future? It is the most severe blow that has been struck at free institutions, this creation of a vote which is made a crime if it is cast against the ruling Administration. For that is the simple result. It is made criminal, and punishable by court-martial and imprisonment or degradation, for a soldier to use the free privilege of an American citizen and ask his comrades to vote against an Administration in power! There was a deep meaning in the dismissal of that New Hampshire officer for distributing and voting the Conservative ticket. It ought to have been a fearful warning to men who love our free institutions. But if, in his own town and State, at home, a soldier cannot vote for what ticket he pleases without being punished, will some one explain how he can be expected to exercise the freeman's right in the camp, under arms, with the sharpest military discipline over him?—New York Journal of Commerce.

NORTHERN 'JUSTICE' TO THE NEGRO.—A Radical paper says of the United States,—'It has shown no generosity to the slave, but has granted him justice.' What crime has the slave committed, we would like to know, that would entitle the horrible treatment he receives within our lines to the name of 'Justice?'—Boston Courier.

THE SEIZURE OF THE GERITY.—In the present case we apprehend the main question will be whether the prisoners at Liverpool—two of whom, by the way, are British subjects—were acting under orders when they seized the Federal schooner. If the court feels satisfied that this was the case, however novel the enterprise may have been in which they were engaged, and however desirable it may be to repress irregular warfare of every kind, we can hardly believe that the act committed by these men will be held to be piracy. If they fail upon this point, there remains the question of jurisdiction; so that, although we do not expect the case to be discussed in the same elaborate fashion as that of the Alexandra, we shall find, nevertheless, that much is to be said on both sides. We trust, moreover, that, unlike the Alexandra case, the matter in dispute will be definitely settled on its merits, and not upon mere technicalities, which, though infinitely interesting and profitable to lawyers, are unintelligible to the mass of mankind. —Morning Post.

BLAIR ON CHASE.—General Blair, member of Congress from Missouri, and brother of the Postmaster-General, in advocating an enquiry into the management of Mr. Chase in the Treasury Department, made the following observations:—'I say here in my place, and upon my responsibility as a Representative, that a more profligate administration of the Treasury Department never existed under any Government; that the whole Mississippi Valley is rank and fetid with the frauds and corruptions practised there by his agents; that "permits" to buy cotton are just as much a marketable commodity as the cotton itself; that these permits to buy cotton are brought to St. Louis and other Western cities by politicians and favourites from distant parts of the country, and sold on 'change to the highest bidder, whether he be a secessionist or not, and that, too, at a time when the best Union men in these cities were refused permits. That is equally true of the 'trade stores,' as they are called—monopolies of trade in certain districts or cities in the South. These 'trade stores' are given to political partisans and favourites, who share the profits with other men who furnish the capital, Mr. Chase furnishing capital to his friends and partisans in the shape of a permit or privilege to monopolise the trade of a certain city or district; and, furthermore, it can be established that the practice of taking bribes on the part of these Treasury agents for permits to trade, and for conniving at violations of law, is so common that it has almost ceased to attract attention or excite comment. It is the most corrupting and demoralising system that ever was invented, and has become a public scandal.'

THE WOUNDED AT GETTYSBURGH.—In a letter to the Sanitary Committee, General Meade says—At the battle of Gettysburg the number of wounded of our army alone amounted, by official reports, to thirteen thousand seven hundred and thirteen (13,713); those of the enemy left on the field were estimated by our medical officers as amounting to eight thousand. This would make in all nearly twenty-two thousand suffering beings requiring immediate care and attention to save life.

THE MALLORY REPORT FORGERY.

DESPATCH OF LORD LYONS.

The following is a copy of Lord Lyons' despatch referring to the alleged report of the Secretary of the Navy to the Congress of the Confederate States:

'Lord Lyons to Earl Russell.

'Washington, March 22, 1864.

My Lord—In my despatch of the 31st December last, I inclosed an extract from a newspaper containing what purported to be a copy of a report of Mr. Mallory, the Confederate Secretary of the Navy. Your lordship will recollect that the supposed report contained passages avowing the attempts to organise an invasion of the United States from Canada, and giving details with regard to ships of war stated to be building for the Confederate government in England and France. Some stress has, as your lordship is aware, been laid upon this document by Mr. Seward in his communications on the two subjects just mentioned. After alluding to the importance which he had attached to it, Mr. Seward said to me on the 19th inst. that he felt bound to tell me that he had just discovered that it was a forgery. He had, he said, taken considerable pains to discover whether it was authentic when it first appeared, and although he had been unable to procure any Southern paper containing it, he had quite satisfied himself that it was genuine. Recently, however, the person by whom it had been concocted, hearing of his inquiries about it, had thought it right to let him know that it had been published originally as a mere jeu d'esprit, and that partly the amusement which it had afforded to see every one taken in by it, and partly the notion that it was injuring the Confederate cause, had prevented an earlier avowal of the truth. Mr. Seward stated that it was very remarkable that no disavowal of the supposed report had, so far as he knew, appeared in the Southern newspapers. Its authenticity had indeed been denied by Captain Maury in England, but Captain Maury might not have had the means of knowing for certain whether it was really authentic or not. There was, however, now no doubt, Mr. Seward said, that it was a forgery.—I have, &c.

(Signed) 'Lyons.'

The Peace Party in the North.—To-day, in many important districts, the Peace party are the majority, and in every Northern State they hold the balance of power. The separation between the peace and the war advocates is widening. There is no half-way house. The war power must have all or nothing. If you concede it, ex proprio vigore, it implies everything that is objectionable. All 'other rods' will be swallowed up of this 'Aaron's rod,' which has become a serpent. Every individual in the Peace party should make peace paramount. Therein lies the only hope of the country.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

The Progress of the Confederates.—The present prospects of the Confederates in this fourth year of the Civil War are certainly brighter than they ever were before. In the South-West the Federal expeditions have everywhere miscarried, and one considerable victory has been added to the military achievements of the South. The recent battle in Louisiana is admitted to have cost the Northerners at least 2,000 men, besides the whole of their artillery, and nearly the whole of their train. In Mississippi a combat on a smaller scale ended also in the defeat of the Federals, with a loss of several hundred prisoners. In Tennessee the progress of the Confederates, if less decisive, has been still more remarkable. There they have regained some of their old positions, and, for the first time in the history of this contest, have recovered lost ground. Mr. Seward used to delight in telling us that if the advance of the Federals had been slow, it was at any rate sure, and that the arms of the North had never receded from territory once occupied. But this boast must now be omitted from his diplomatic circulars. The control of the Mississippi is again in Southern hands. General Forrest has captured Fort Pillow, and is threatening Memphis, nor is it supposed in New York that the worst has yet been heard of the designs of this enterprising commander.—The Times.

The Attempt to Blow up the Minnesota.—A Northern paper, the Old Dominion, gives the following account of this daring exploit:—

'On Friday night, during the darkness, one of those bold efforts was made to destroy the flag-ship frigate Minnesota, now lying off Newport News, at the mouth of James River, by the fixing of an infernal machine, that came near ultimating in the destruction of this noble frigate. A small steam yawl was discovered coming down the river. When hailed the reply was "Roanoke," which signified the boat belonged to the Roanoke. All the picket boats, it is said, passed the stranger, without examination, lulled into security by their familiarity with our usages after dark. Approaching the Minnesota, she was warned to keep off, or she would be fired upon. Regardless of the warning, she came on drifting with the tide, and when quite near steamed straight at the port-quarter, striking the Minnesota with a torpedo, which exploded, shaking the noble craft with a terrible concussion from stem to stern, and throwing the yawl several yards from the ship. Immediately steam was gotten up on the yawl, and before anything could be done by the people on board the flag-ship, the yawl was safe off in the darkness. The infernal machine was rigged on a long detached pole over the stern of the yawl, and although it proved a failure, either because of its own weakness or the strength of the Minnesota's sides, yet it exhibits a daring and enterprise on the part of the rebel pirates, as well as a perfect knowledge of our naval vessels at the mouth of the James, that is as brilliant as it is vicious.'

The Political Change in the North.—No observer of American affairs can fail to have been impressed by the remarkable divisions in Congress on the case of Mr. Long This gentleman, a representative of the State of Ohio, had not only made a speech in favour of peace, but had distinctly recommended the recognition of the Southern Confederacy. He had proposed, in short, that the seceding States should be allowed to have their own way, that the dissolution of the Union should be accepted as an accomplished fact, and that the North should desist from the prosecution of a hopeless war. On this the Speaker moved his expulsion from the House for treason, and such a vote, however arbitrary it may appear to us, would probably have been carried almost without opposition a year or two ago. Now, however, things have changed. It was first found impossible to carry a motion against a member who, in supporting Mr. Long, had even surpassed him in boldness of opinion. Then, after a week had been consumed in debates and delays, the motion for the expulsion of Mr. Long was exchanged for a simple vote of censure upon him, and even that vote was only carried by a majority of 10 in a House of 150. We cannot but consider these proceedings as more ominous of political change than any events of the campaign.—The Times.

New York Repudiates.—The Republican majority in the New York Legislature have decreed that the interest on the debt, which was contracted at the gold rates, and for which the state was solemnly pledged to pay principal and interest in the same money that was received, shall be paid in depreciated greenback currency. That is to say, for every dollar of interest we owe our foreign creditors the great State of New York proposes to pay at the present rate something less than fifty-nine cents. New York World, April 19.

The Confederate Victory in Louisiana.—The only Confederate report of the defeat of General Banks which we have seen is the following:—

Mobile, April 11.

To General S. Cooper, A. and I. General.

The following report was received at Baton Rouge, on the 3rd inst., from the surgeon-general of Banks's army: 'We met the enemy near Shreveport. Union force repulsed with great loss. Steamer Essex, or Benton, destroyed by torpedoes in Red river, and a transport captured by Confederates.'

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL & COMMERCIAL.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

Wednesday Evening.

There has been quite a revolution in the appearance and prospects of the money and discount markets. Although Monday was a holiday at the Stock Exchange, great perturbation was caused in banking and financial circles through the directors of the Bank raising the rate of discount to 8 per cent. The movement was not unexpected, and it was hoped that, the Stock Exchange dealers being absent, the fall the next day would be broken; but this turns out not to have been the case. On Friday there was a drop in prices; but to-day it greatly increased, leaving the markets in a doubtful and prostrate condition. Political, as well as financial, affairs have had a great deal to do with the semi-panic just experienced, the effects of which will be yet felt for some time if a check is not interposed to the downward current. The refusal of Austria and Prussia to accept an armistice has weighed, with the Bank rate at 8 per cent., most severely upon all classes of public securities; but this was to have been anticipated from the late strain of speculation. To-night the aspect of things was rather better, and it was said the preliminaries for an armistice had been arranged, while the Bank (it was rumoured) would not deem it requisite, except in very extreme cases, to go to 9 per cent. The full rates for money have brought out capital, and there has been a better supply; but quotations have not been lower than the Bank minimum, while in many instances they have been above, owing to the distrust generally reigning. It will be satisfactory indeed to find the Bank does not advance its terms to-morrow; for if such a change takes place it will greatly augment the difficulties likely to be experienced. The large amounts of American gold from New York have come to hand at a most opportune moment. On the Stock Exhcange the rates for advances on Consols have been as high as 9 per cent.; this afternoon they were 7½ to 8 per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

Although very little indeed has been done in bullion and specie at the Bank of England this week, the result is rather more favourable than for the last few weeks, inasmuch as 36,000*l.* in gold has been sent in, whilst there have not been any withdrawals. The arrivals of specie, however, have been rather below the usual average, having amounted to only 301,085*l.*, of which 12,200*l.* is from the Brazils, and the remainder from New York. The Syria, steamer, took out to-day 152,773*l.* in specie, of which 16,700*l.* was gold and the rest silver. There was for Alexandria 16,000*l.*, Madras 700*l.*, Calcutta 20,000*l.*, Penang 20,800*l.*, Singapore 33,400*l.*, Hong Kong 47,473*l.*, and Shanghai 14,400*l.* The silver market is very flat, increased dulness having been caused by the rise in the rate of discount, and there are scarcely any orders to buy for the East; the last price of bar silver was 61¾*d.* per oz., and of Mexican dollars 62¼*d.* per oz.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The stock of the Confederate loan has been gradually rising on good purchases, and the price has at last reached 65 to 67, with a very fine market. The operations have been on London, Liverpool, and French account. It seems that the large houses interested in the cotton trade have at length made arrangements to take quantities of the stock as fast as they can secure it, to make its privileges available in obtaining supplies of the staple. The result is that the few parcels floating in the market have been cleared at the advance, and that it will shortly be difficult to get any quantity, save at a further enhancement. Rumours have been circulated of the prospects of fresh loan engagements. These are authoritatively contradicted, and for two very good and sufficient reasons. First, that though more than one offer for a new loan has been made, the Congress has refused to listen to any kind of proposal; and, second, that in consequence of judicious management and payments in cash, the expenditure is kept at the lowest possible point.

ADDITIONAL REGULATIONS FOR BLOCKADE-RUNNING.

We are requested to publish the following important regulations:—

Treasury Department, C. S. A.
Richmond, March 16, 1864.

The following additional regulations are established to carry out the act to impose regulations upon the foreign commerce of the Confederate States, and to provide for the public defence, approved, February 6, 1864.

The bond required by the second article of the regulations shall be in one half the value of the vessel; and that required by the fourth article shall be in the single value of the shipment; and the security which the Collector may accept may be either personal security, or a mortgage of the vessel, or a transfer of the Bills of Lading, or of cotton, tobacco, or Confederate securities.

2. Whenever any vessel shall bring into the Confederate States an entire cargo for account of the Confederate States, the owners of the said vessel, and the shippers of her cargo shall be relieved from the bonds previously given to invest and bring in one-half the nett proceeds of her outward cargo; and the certificate of the agent of the Treasury Department at the port of lading, that such cargo was duly shipped in pursuance of the regulations, shall authorise the Collector to cancel and surrender the said bonds.

Approved March 16, 1864.

C. G. Memminger,
Secretary of Treasury.
James A. Seddon,
Secretary of War.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The accounts of the Confederate successes in America are now telling seriously upon the market for American Government and Railway Securities. For some time the market has been in anything but a satisfactory state, but during the past week the falling off both in the business transacted and the value of the securities has been much greater than usual. The transactions are chiefly confined to a few holders of the various stocks, who appear to have a desire to rid themselves of them, and, to find purchasers, very great reductions have to be made. The only transactions recorded during the week have been in Virginia State six per cents. at 32 and 33½; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvania section, 75; Erie Shares, $100, all paid, 64, 62, 63, and 60; Ditto ditto, second mortgage, 1883, at 61; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, 19½, 23, and 25 dis.; Ditto ditto, all paid, 69 and 67; and New York Central seven per cents., 1864, at 50½.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 30,00,000 rupees in bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were, to Calcutta 13,37,000 rupees, to Bombay 12,00,000 rupees, and to Madras 4,63,000 rupees. The minimum price was as before, 1*s.* 11$\frac{1}{16}$d. on Calcutta and Madras, and 1*s.* 11$\frac{3}{4}$d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 85 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta and Madras at 1*s.* 11$\frac{7}{8}$d. will receive about 21 per cent.; on Bombay at 2*s.* 0$\frac{1}{8}$d. about 66 per cent.; and all above these prices in full.

LIVERPOOL, WEDNESDAY, MAY 4.—Our cotton market during the week has been rather less animated than for the last two or three weeks, and prices now have a slightly declining tendency, chiefly in consequence of the intelligence just received of the great successes of the Confederate forces in America, a belief being generally entertained that the war is now likely to be brought to a close more speedily than was a short time ago anticipated. The sales this week have reached 65,000 bales, of which 25,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present time have been 802,440 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 634,760 bales. The imports this year so far have been 731,336 bales, and to the corresponding time last year, 429,965 bales. The exports this year have been 119,210 bales, whilst last year they were 119,504 bales. Taken for consumption this year, 525,900 bales, whilst in 1863 the number was 333,200 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 125,910 bales, against 153,020 bales last year. The computed stocks at the present time are 367,400 bales; at the same period last year they were 369,690 bales. The latest official quotations were: American descriptions, 25$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 28$\frac{1}{2}$d.; Maranham, 29*d.*; Maceio, 27$\frac{1}{2}$d.; Bahia, 27$\frac{1}{2}$d.; Egyptians, 28$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 31*d.* Smyrna, 23$\frac{1}{2}$d.; Surat, 13*d.* to 22$\frac{1}{2}$d.; Bengal, Scinde, &c., 16*d.*; China, 18$\frac{1}{2}$d. to 19$\frac{1}{2}$d.; Japan, 20*d.*; and Peruvian, 28*d.* to 28$\frac{1}{4}$d.

Business at Manchester has been greatly restricted within the last day or two, in consequence of the further advance in the Bank rate of discount, and the expectation that another rise will speedily take place. Yarns and cottons are equally affected, but spinners being largely under contract, they are generally disposed to demand higher rates for shipping yarns. The amount of business transacted, however, has been very limited. For home-trade yarns the market remains very quiet; spinners are asking the rates current last week, but buyers will not operate freely unless at a reduction. In the Cloth Market buyers are quite indisposed to give the additional rates asked, consequently business has been very quiet; nevertheless manufacturers have advanced their quotations 6*d.* per piece, and in some cases 1*s.*, since last week, and appear quite indisposed to make any reduction. Madapollams are 6*d.* higher; prints of 10 lbs. weight have advanced from 26*s.* to 27*s.*; shirtings (45 inch of 10 lbs. weight) have advanced from 25*s.* to 26*s.*; 39 inch and 45 inch descriptions are from 6*d.* to 9*d.* higher; Jaconets, long cloths, T. cloths and figured shirtings have been put up in the same proportion. Mills which have been long idle are recommencing work, and the production is likely to augment considerably.

THE FORCES OF THE BELLIGERENTS.—In the present unhappy war the numbers of the combatants have always been exaggerated. The armies of the North are usually estimated at 700,000 and those of the South at 400,000, while in fact they are relatively about 400,000 and 250,000. In the first battle of Bull Run the Confederates had but 28,000; Albert Sydney Johnston attacked Grant at Shiloh with 29,000 men, and had Beauregard followed up the advantage gained before Johnston fell, the Federal commander and his army of 40,000 men would have been captured. Buell's timely arrival with 30,000 fresh troops forced the Confederates to retreat. General Lee's force in the battles around Richmond amounted to 65,000; and distasteful as it may be to our national pride, it is true that Lee had but 35,000 muskets all told at Antietam, and made a draw fight of it at that. General Bragg had 33,000, including cavalry, at Murfreesboro, though Rosecrans estimated his adversary's force at 65,000. At Fredericksburg General Lee had 60,000, and but 20,000 of these were engaged. He declared that his position was worth 50,000 men. The same General won the battle of Chancellorsville with 17,000 men against double that force. This is estimated his best-fought battle. The strategy was admirable, and the execution, especially of Stonewall Jackson's part, superb. Yet, two months later, the great Lee failed at Gettysburg, when his army was but little inferior to that of Meade. Bragg won a great victory at Chickamauga with a small army, but it resulted quite as much from the errors of the Federal commander as the valour of the Confederates. In all these conflicts, it will be observed, the armies of the South were far under the public estimate, as also were those of the North. It is not probable that the armies of this campaign will be much larger, if any, than those of the past. But they are large enough to fight what are termed great battles, to widen the gulf of separation between the States, and to send mourning and grief into the hearts of thousands.—The New York Daily News.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

BUST OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.
THE only Bust extant of the President of the Confederate States, modelled by Volk, at Richmond, and the most faithful Likeness of this eminent Statesman, has been kindly lent by the owner for reproduction for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund of Liverpool. In conformity with the intentions of the donor, the Bust has been registered under the Designs Act, and a number of casts (quarter size), limited to 500, are offered to the public at the following rates:—

Plaster . . . . . 5*s.* 0*d.*
Ditto Enameled . . . . . 7*s.* 6*d.*
A l'Ivoire (composition of Wax and Plaster) . 10*s.* 6*d.*
} Carriage free to all parts of the United Kingdom.

The Bust may be seen at the studio of JAMES REDFERN, Esq., 29 Clipstone Street, Fitzroy Square, W., who will also receive orders to execute it in marble; and at the INDEX OFFICE, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

The proceeds of the sale of the 500 casts being for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund, all orders must be addressed, and money orders made payable, to Mr. HENRY HOTZE, 17 Savile Row, W

THE EVANGELICAL TRACT SOCIETY

OF THE

SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY,

DESIGNED

CHIEFLY TO MINISTER TO THE SPIRITUAL NEED OF OUR NOBLE DEFENDERS,

IS the Representative of all Denominations of Christians, who, through it, lay their Offerings of Piety upon the Altar of Patriotism, and lead the Soldiers of the Country to become the Soldiers of the Cross.

ITS HEADQUARTERS ARE PETERSBURG, VA.,

With Depositories in other Cities, and a numerous Corps of Colporteurs, occupied in Distributing Tracts to our Soldiers in the Army and in the Hospitals.

Organised July 18, 1861, the Society has, from that time to the present, been supplying each Army of the Confederacy with religious reading. About Thirty Millions of pages of Tracts have been distributed amongst our brave soldiers. The seed has not been sown in vain. Numerous letters from Chaplains, Officers, and Privates testify to the great good which has been accomplished, and show that the Society has been instrumental, to a considerable extent, in producing and sustaining the wonderful Revival with which God is now blessing our armies.

'THE ARMY AND NAVY MESSENGER,'

the Society's organ, is the most popular paper in the Army. It has been recommended by General Lee, and by many other eminent Officers, who have contributed to its support. It is, preeminently, the Soldiers' and Sailors' Paper, especially designed to interest and profit them, amongst whom it is gratuitously distributed.

When it is considered that the choicest portion of the country is found in the Army, which will, of necessity, give character to the Confederacy, and control its destiny for years to come, the importance of sustaining this Institution, which seeks to consecrate to Christ this mighty influence, cannot be over-estimated.

The expenditure of means it involves is very great, and we respectfully solicit donations for the Society's aid for the Messenger, from all, everywhere, who have at heart the religious welfare of our Soldiers, and the advancement of the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Please send your Contributions to Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm, & Co. Liverpool, who will forward them to

THE STORY OF FORT SUMTER.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

FORT SUMTER, CHARLESTON HARBOUR:
March 1, 1864.

SIR,—It affords me much pleasure to address you a letter from within these battle-scarred walls.

At the very commencement of this war public attention was directed with anxious solicitude towards this fort, as to the pivot on which hung suspended the issues of war or peace; and when on the 12th of April, 1861, our first battery opened upon it, the alarm-gun was fired, whose reverberation echoing throughout the land summoned a nation to arms. Here was achieved the first victory over our national enemy, which wrested the key which held fast the approaches to Charleston from the hands of its enemies, and intrusted it to the charge of its friends.

Here, two years afterwards, was witnessed that glorious triumph of the fort over that ironclad fleet which the enemy had spared neither time nor money in preparing for its reduction, and whose invulnerability had been boastfully proclaimed by the foe. And here, when, after having been foiled in their efforts to compel the surrender of the fort by long-continued bombardment, they attempted a night assault in barges, they were signally repulsed, a large number captured, and the very flag which had formerly waved over its Federal garrison, and which the enemy had now brought back to grace their 'certain' triumph, was recaptured by us.

The rage and chagrin of the foe at his defeat called into vigorous exercise all his mighty energy. Having silenced by their constant bombardment its power to injure them, by reducing it from an artillery to an infantry post, they now laboured with persistent zeal in advancing, perfecting, and strengthening their batteries, and in preparing to open a fire upon it unparalleled for the size and power of ordnance used, and the weight of metal thrown, in the annals of history.

Five successive times have they opened upon it in heavy bombardments, while in all the interim desultory shots have been fired. Fully forty-five times has the flagstaff been shot away, four flags have been completely ruined by the enemy's shell, but to-day our national ensign proudly waves over the pile of rubbish which marks the outline of this noble fortress; and while it bears daily testimony to the heroic deeds of valour by which it has been defended, it stands like a guardian angel in the pathway of our invaders, shouting to these modern Balaamites, 'Thus far shalt thou go, but no farther.'

The history of Fort Sumter is brilliant with glorious victories. Shattered and crumbling under the hailstorm of iron hurled against it, the energy and skill of Southern engineers has raised a new fort like a Phœnix from the débris, whose resistive strength defies the utmost malice of the foe.

It is for the purpose of giving you a brief sketch of her history, and to place in your possession some statistical tables, which I have carefully prepared from the records of the fort, that I write you this letter.

V.—ESTIMATE SHOWING THE AMOUNT OF METAL THROWN BY THE ENEMY TO CAUSE THE LOSS TO US OF ONE MAN.

41 men killed by 3,627,990 lbs. of metal, i.e. 88,487½ lbs., or 39¼ tons of iron to the man.

Deducting the number killed by accidents, 24, it leaves 17 men killed by 3,627,990 lbs. of metal, i.e. 213,411 lbs. or 95¼ tons of iron to the man.

VI.—ESTIMATE SHOWING THE NUMBER OF MILES OF RAILROAD-TRACK THE AMOUNT OF METAL WASTED ON FORT SUMTER WOULD HAVE LAID.

A single rail weighs 50 lbs. to the yard, which would require 80 tons to lay a track one mile; therefore,

1,620 tons, or the amount thrown, would have laid a track for 20¼ miles.

Want of time must compel me to touch lightly on the account of that diplomacy which relates so intimately to the early history of the fort, and to confine my remarks more particularly to that portion of her career which renders her the pride and glory of the South. I then proceed to a Description of the Original Fort.

The United States Government commenced making the foundation for it about 1827 by throwing large piles of rock on a shoal at the entrance to the harbour, situated $3\frac{3}{8}$ miles from the city, $1\frac{1}{8}$ mile from Sullivan's Island, and 1,200 yards from Cumming's Point, Morris's Island. Shipload after shipload was cast overboard here, only to sink entirely from the view, until about 1840, when the foundation was completed, and the building of the Fort was commenced.

The outer wall was made to enclose an area of 4 acres. It was built of a pentagonal shape, with the angles cut off to accommodate one gun. The work upon it was of the most substantial and solid masonry. The outer wall, with the exception of the Morris Island face, was from 5 to 7½ feet thick of brickwork with concrete filling. Its height was 40 feet from the berm to the crest of the parapet. There were two tiers of casemates, built of a series of longitudinal arches on transverse sections, while the interior of the casemate allowed a traverse room of 18 feet.

On the Morris Island side were erected the officers' quarters and commissary buildings, making a total width, from the scarp of the wall to the interior crest, of about 40 feet. The garrison quarters were upon the interior of the sea and north-west faces. The fort was intended to mount 127 guns.

The work had lingered along year after year until the autumn of 1860, when the threatening aspect of the political sky in this quarter aroused the latent energy of the Government, who sent engineers and workmen of approved skill and pushed it rapidly forward towards completion.

On December 20, the day which witnessed the secession of South Carolina, the fort had not been finished, and workmen were busily employed in erecting curtains to protect the casemates and in mounting guns.

At this time Fort Moultrie, Sullivan's Island, was garrisoned by about 100 United States regulars under command of Major Robert Anderson. Although the Government exhibited like energy there in erecting defensive works, the positive assurances of the officials in Washington to our commissioners, that no military movement should be made here unless their forces were attacked, served to quiet the over-heated excitement of the Charlestonians.

On the morning of December 26, the country was startled by the announcement that on the previous night Anderson's force had evacuated Moultrie, spiking the guns and setting fire to the carriages, and had made their way in small boats to Sumter, where they were in garrison.

Immediately this action of the United States forces was answered by the investment of the fort by batteries, which placed us in a position to demand her surrender.

The courtesy exhibited at this time by the belligerents forms one of the most amusing chapters in the history of the war.

This was mostly owing to the conviction of our authorities that Major Anderson was compelled, by his duty as a Federal officer, to act in a manner contrary to his personal feelings. This conviction was strengthened by his personal assurances, and by the statement that he had twice forwarded his resignation to his Government, which had been as often rejected. Being aware that he had a limited supply of provisions in the fort, he was for a long time allowed to procure his daily supplies from the Charleston market; while he in return allowed us to go on unmolested in the erection of our batteries.

The United States Government, although they had made repeated assurances to our commissioners that Fort Sumter should be quietly evacuated, clandestinely despatched a steamer from New York with sealed orders to reinforce the beleaguered garrison, and to supply them with provisions and ordnance stores.

On the morning of January 9, 1861, this steamer, the Star of the West, hove in sight over the bar. As she steamed up the harbour, a small sand battery on Morris's Island, which had been hastily thrown up, and mounting three 24-pounders, opened on her and compelled her to beat a hasty retreat.

Months rolled on, and it becoming known to our authorities that a hostile fleet was preparing to sail for Charleston for the relief of Sumter, General Beauregard sent to Major Anderson a demand for its immediate and unconditional surrender, and threatened that if his demand was not previously complied with, his batteries should open fire the next morning.

The First Bombardment.

At about 5 o'clock on the morning of April 12, Fort Johnson on James Island fired the signal gun, which was immediately answered by our other batteries. After 36 hours' bombardment, and without the loss of a single life, the hot shot was thrown from Moultrie, which, setting fire to the officers' quarters, caused the white flag to be raised from Sumter's parapet.

On the morning of the 14th Anderson formally surrendered, and was allowed to salute and carry away with him his flag, while the men were permitted to retain their side arms.

By this surrender, a large number of fine guns came into our possession, which have since borne an important part in the defence of Charleston.

The fort was now garrisoned by a detachment of South Carolina regulars, under the command of Major Ripley. Under him and the subsequent commanders of the post, that strict discipline was used, and that constant artillery practice required, which in April 1863 enabled the fort to triumph so gloriously over the fleet of the foe.

Two attempts had been made by the enemy's land forces to take Charleston, in both of which, at Secessionville and at Pocataligo, they had been severely defeated, when that naval combat occurred near Norfolk, Va., which proving to them the superiority of ironclad vessels for warlike purposes, they gave their whole energy to the construction of an armoured fleet which it was asserted would place the capture of Charleston beyond a doubt. Time and money were not spared in making them as complete as possible. Erricson's plan was adopted for most of them. It consisted of a long and low vessel which in action could be sunk so as to leave its deck barely visible above the surface of the water. Upon this deck was a heavy revolving turret which carried two guns. The armour for the turrets was from three to seven inches thick of iron, with an oak backing, while the deck and sides of the vessel were also covered with 4-inch plates. The rotary motion of the turret greatly lessened the danger of injury in action, while the heavy armour upon the vessels rendered the enemy confident in his boast of their invulnerability.

The Second Bombardment (the Naval Attack).

During the latter portion of March 1863, the enemy's turreted monitors, which had by many been thought to be unseaworthy from their great weight, began to appear off the bar, bringing with them an armament of 11 and 15-inch Dahlgren guns and 200-pounder rifles.

The new Ironsides had been here for some months. She was a formidable vessel, plated with 6 inches of iron amidships, and carrying sixteen 11-inch Dahlgren broadside guns and a 200-pounder rifle in the bow and stern.

Every one looked forward with anxiety to the approaching conflict, for its successful result was of vital importance to our Confederate cause. While the effect of the heavy projectiles of the fleet upon Sumter's walls of masonry was to be dreaded, she had yet to prove whether she could injure the 'invulnerable' target they presented.

On the morning of April 7, a despatch from Fort Sumter announced that the ironclads were gradually moving forward to the attack. The Passaic led the van, followed by the other monitors and the Ironsides. The leading vessel pushed before her a heavy raft with long iron hooks, designed to remove or explode any torpedoes which might obstruct the channel.

Within the fort all were preparing for the conflict. The garrison, regimental, and palmetto flags were hoisted, and saluted with 13 guns, and while the band played the national air, the men with a merry cheer sprang to their batteries and stripped for action. When the monitors had reached a position about 1,400 yards from the fort, the ball was opened by a shot from Fort Moultrie, to which they responded by throwing a 15-inch shrapnell at Sumter. Forming themselves into an ellipse, they commenced winding slowly around nearer and nearer the fort, until they reached a point about 1,100 yards distant, when the action commenced in good earnest. For two hours and a quarter the earth fairly trembled under the tremendous shock of battle. As the heavy missiles from the fleet struck the sides of the fort, she would shake off cartloads of crumbling masonry. Her shots were not less effective. The Keokuk, a two-turreted monitor, leaving her consorts and gallantly pushing up within 900 yards of the fort, was so severely handled, that she withdrew from action only to sink off the Morris Island beach. The command was now given to open by battery on the Ironsides, which had not approached nearer than 1,700 yards, when great strips of iron were seen peeling off from her, and with steam issuing from her sides she left the action in distress. Every monitor was somewhat injured, while four were seriously disabled. During the action of two and a half hours' duration, from the thirty-four guns of the fleet only sixty-seven shots were fired at the fort, while she with forty-four guns threw about 400 projectiles. Although the garrison and regimental flags of the fort were much torn by shell, not a man was killed. The fleet bore evident marks of injury, for while their smoke-stacks were completely riddled, some of our shots had penetrated the heavy armour of their turrets.

From Northern accounts we learn that the commanders of the vessels held a council of war after their defeat, at which the unanimous voice was that 'it was impracticable to renew the attack.'

The torn and ragged appearance of their ironclads bore evident testimony to their vulnerability, and the next day all the monitors left the harbour in disgrace for Hilton Head.

Second Movement of the Enemy against the Fort.

On July 10, 1863, the enemy upon Folly Island unmasked heavy batteries upon the south end of Morris's Island, assisted by their fleet, which had a flanking fire upon our position.

Being surprised by this attack, our small force, after bravely fighting their guns, were compelled, by the landing of a large body of infantry in barges, to retreat to Battery Wagner, in order to make a successful stand. The gallant manner in which that post was defended against assault, and under bombardment during two long months of trial, might well fill a separate history. After the enemy gained a foothold on Morris's Island, the brave commander of Fort Sumter, Colonel Alfred Rhett, while annoying the enemy in his approaches to Wagner with his parapet guns, was busily employed in filling up the casemates on the Morris Island side with sandbags to shield her in her expected trial.

At the distance at which the enemy upon Gregg's Hill were from Sumter, it was not deemed probable that they would open fire on her until they had reduced Wagner; but on August 16 was commenced the Third Bombardment.

Up to this date the Gregg's Hill battery of Parrott guns had kept up a steady fire upon Battery Wagner; but now by elevating their guns they opened a breaching fire upon Sumter at a distance of 4,400 yards, and boastfully announced that in two hours they would compel her surrender.

For ten days did they keep up a continuous bombardment, throwing in that period 6,349 shots, most of which were from 100-pounders. The effect of their fire was daily evident, for after silencing all our parapet guns, they gradually chipped off block after block of the wall, which, falling with the sand upon the berm, formed a débris through which no shot could penetrate. On the 30th and 31st of the same month they opened fire again, throwing 690 shots, after which date for a while their land batteries ceased from their heavy bombardment. The work of preparation within the fort now rapidly went forward. The guns were removed, while large quantities of sand were carried there and securely packed in the casemates. The regulars still remained as a garrison, and now with as much alacrity and cheerfulness responded to the call for fatigue, as they had formerly sprung to the batteries to fight their guns.

On the 1st day of September occurred

The Fourth Bombardment.

The enemy now made a demand upon General Beauregard for the surrender of Fort Sumter. 'Come and take it,' was his laconic reply, an answer as characteristic of his courtesy as a gentleman as of his chivalry as a soldier. The night of September 1 was calm and peaceful. Even the ordinary firing seemed for the time to have died away, when lo! a rocket is thrown up from our guard-boat. The signal is seen by our batteries, and from one to another it is extended. The monitors are coming in! Our batteries speedily open, and the quietness of the night is disturbed by the heavy booming of artillery.

Running in near to the fort, the four monitors pour a crushing fire into its sea face, throwing 185 shots, when they retire. They are no more successful than were their land batteries in reducing the fort, for the piles of brick, concrete, and sand falling upon the berm, only render their efforts for reduction utterly futile.

On September 4 Major Stephen Elliott, with a detachment of infantry volunteers, relieved Colonel Alfred Rhett and his brave garrison from the post they had so long and so gallantly defended.

The evacuation of Morris Island by our forces on the following day gave the enemy considerable advantages, for now they could advance their batteries to within 1,200 yards of the fort; but, thinking that they might surprise and capture the garrison, they prepared for

A Night Assault in Barges.

About one o'clock on the morning of September 9, between 30 and 40 barges, with 700 or 800 men, approached the fort in the hope of surprising it. The sleepless vigilance of the commander and his garrison alone prevented the success of their plan. They were hailed by the sentinel on the parapet with the challenge, 'Who comes there?' The only answer was a curse, when volleys of musketry and showers of bricks and hand-grenades were poured upon the assailants, while signal lights displayed from the parapet brought a raking fire from our gunboat and Sullivan's Island batteries. Many on the boats were injured and carried off, while all those who landed surrendered. One hundred and thirty-two of the enemy were captured, and the very flag which had formerly waved over its Federal garrison, and which the foe had brought back to replace in triumph on the flagstaff, was recaptured, and was forwarded as a trophy to the Legislature of the State.

They returned to open the Fifth Bombardment.

Again, for one week, they opened their Gregg's Hill battery, and kept up a steady fire. The 564 shots thrown only effected the displacement of more masonry, and the adding to that pile of débris which was fast rendering the fort impregnable.

The view of the interior of Sumter was now grand in the extreme. Gazing at it by moonlight from the parapet, one might readily have imagined himself, from the confusion and disorder which reigned within, to have been looking into the crater of a suppressed volcano. Its cragged and broken walls, its shattered arches, its crumbling masonry, mingled in an indescribable mass with broken guns, pieces of carriages, splintered chasses, and unexploded shell, all gave a graphic idea of the ruinous consequences of war. That place, once so much admired for its beauty and symmetry, was grand even in its fall; and but for the merry voices of the workmen within, one might almost have imagined himself on enchanted ground.

But the great hour of Sumter's trial was yet to come. Under a heavy fire, the enemy had at last completed the work upon their advanced batteries, and on the 26th of October they opened

The Sixth Bombardment.

They had now advanced their works, and had 12 heavy guns and 3 mortars mounted in three heavily-traversed batteries, in Fort Putnam 1,200 yards, in the Middle battery 1,500 yards, and in Fort Strong 2,200 yards from the fort. From these, for a period of 41 days, they kept up a continuous fire night and day upon the fort, assisted by a flanking fire from their ironclad fleet.

During that period 18,577 shots were fired, making probably the longest-continued and the heaviest bombardment to which any place has ever been subjected. Long and deep furrows were ploughed through the sand by the heavy missiles of the foe, while the shots whirled through the air with such velocity that the pier of an arch, 7 feet wide by 5 feet thick, of solid masonry, was demolished by one stroke from a 300-pounder bolt.

Time and time again the flagstaff was shot away, only to be quickly replaced by the gallant garrison, who, as the shells were bursting around and above them, proudly waved their hats in triumph at the foe. After every day of trial, the evening gun was fired as a salute to our banner, while our brave commander, as he heard this proud evidence of the day's victory, could not restrain himself from saying, 'Boys, this is glorious,' and taking our band upon the parapet, he favoured the foe with our national air.

Early on the morning of October 31 occurred that mournful accident which cast the shadow of gloom over the whole garrison. A Parrott shell striking the already weakened arches of the garrison barracks, brought down the whole structure with a tremendous crash, burying in its ruins 13 brave men. As one after another they were dug out of the mass of rubbish by which they were covered, the hearts of their sorrowing comrades might well bleed with anguish at the painful fate of those who had stood by their side amid so many scenes of trial and hardship.

On December 5 the enemy, apparently discouraged by the ill success of his long-continued bombardment, ceased firing upon the fort, and since that date has only thrown an occasional shot by way of practice.

The Explosion of the Magazine in the south-west angle of the fort occurred on December 11, and was the second dreadful accident which had taken place within Sumter's walls. The cause of the explosion, by which eleven men lost their lives, has never been fully ascertained.

During the efforts of the garrison for the rescue of their comrades, the enemy poured a heavy fire of shell among them, which added greatly to the terrors of the scene. But, notwithstanding all their repeated efforts against the fort, she stands to-day as defiant as ever, a proud monument of Southern valour and heroism.

On the present internal arrangements of the fort, prudence requires that I should remain silent.

From the above tables it will be seen what mighty efforts have been made by the enemy to reduce this noble fortress, involving them, doubtless, in six or seven times the expense of her original construction. Twenty-seven thousand of the most destructive projectiles have been hurled against her from the heaviest ordnance ever used in war, and still to-day she stands proudly defiant, and stronger in her defensive qualities than ever before. The kind providence of God has wonderfully shielded her and her garrison in their hours of trial, and to Him would we confidingly leave her future history, in the hope that, as in the past, she may ever dwell under the shadow of the Almighty.

G. S. B.

Head Quarters, Fort Sumter, March 8, 1864.

I have examined the foregoing, and find nothing prejudicial to the service. Stephen Elliott, Jun.,
Lieut.-Col. Commanding.

Why the South is Despoiled.—The spoliation of the South is not an unavoidable incident of the war—it is the very object the war has in view. Long ago has the hope of subjugation been abandoned, and this purpose of ruin has become fixed in the breasts of the Northern people as the amiable alternative. The children of Massachusetts, Mr. Everett, are wiser in their generation than to desolate the fields they expect to divide among themselves, to deface and demolish the dwellings they hope hereafter to occupy. If they believed that the next year or the year after would find them masters of the South, they would take care not to impoverish their future possessions.—'A Virginian' to Edward Everett.

Southern Liberality.—When the nominal prices of provisions in the Confederate States were highest, and the difficulty of supplying the armies greatest, General Cobb placed at the disposal of the Government 30,000 lbs. of bacon and 80,000 bushels of corn.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

THE defeat of General Banks's Red River Expedition appears to have been of a decisive and humiliating character, notwithstanding the efforts of some New York prints to cypher out a victory. General Banks is in disgrace, and his recall is mooted, if not decided upon, at Washington. The very sensation headings of the newspapers tell the story. 'Three days' fighting.' 'Federal panic and rout.' 'Retreat of General Banks's army.' 'Our army meets with complete disaster.' 'Three thousand brave men sacrificed to a Treasury speculation.' 'The great cotton raid ended.'

The New Orleans correspondent of the Boston Courier says: 'I have seen a large number of those who were in the fight, and they all agree that Banks, by marching up his men in brigades, to encounter the massed army of Kirby Smith, simply led them to a wholesale slaughter;' and a private letter from New Orleans, furnished to the same paper by a mercantile house, says: 'The disaster to our arms in the Red River has proved a very serious one, in which we have lost some 7,000 in killed and wounded, 200 army wagons with stores, &c., nineteen pieces of artillery with caissons, ammunition, &c., even the personal effects of staff officers. We have the entire gunboat flotilla above the rapids, with the water of the river turned into Bayou Pierre, so that the boats are useless. General Banks has been forced to retreat sixty miles, after suffering great loss, and the enemy are now between the gunboats and the army.'

Other accounts estimate the entire losses of the Federals as high as fifteen thousand men, with all their trains, artillery, and the horses of their cavalry. One division went into battle three thousand strong, and came out with one thousand.

General Banks left Natchitoches, on the Red River, for Shreveport, the State capital, on April 6, his forces numbering 30,000, of which 9,000 were cavalry. On the 7th, the Confederates, who had fallen back, were discovered in position near Mansfield, forty-five miles from Shreveport, from which point they retired after a sharp skirmish. On the 8th, the Confederates were found in force at Sabine's Cross Roads, and were attacked by the Federal cavalry and artillery, under command of General Ransom and General Banks. The action continued most of the day, but at four o'clock a heavy attack on the Federal left threw the troops into confusion, and they were driven from the field with the loss of twenty guns and the cavalry trains, leaving their killed and wounded. Four brigade commanders were killed and wounded. The panic and confusion are said to have equalled any in the war. After holding a council of war, General Banks decided to retreat in silence and darkness to Pleasant Hill, which was successfully accomplished, where he was followed the next day and impetuously attacked, but it is claimed that this attack was repulsed. General Banks appears at least to have been able to continue his retreat to Grand Ecore without further molestation, where he was represented, at last accounts, to be engaged in reorganising his shattered forces. But the river was falling. Some of his gunboats were already aground, others were hastily sent down the river to find deeper water; the Confederates were attacking both gunboats and transports, and while it appeared certain that no new advance could be made, even a safe retreat was becoming doubtful. In the meantime General Steele, advancing from Little Rock with some 15,000 men to cooperate in the attack upon Shreveport, was liable to be routed by the victorious Confederates. The lists of Federal killed and wounded fill several columns of the New York papers. We have, as yet, no particulars from Confederate sources. The Confederate troops are said to have been commanded by General Kirby Smith, General Dick Taylor, and Generals Price, Morton, and Green, and are stated to have numbered about 20,000 men, but, as usual, they appear to have attacked the Federals 'in overpowering numbers.' The telegraphed report of Admiral Porter states that the Federals lost 4,000 prisoners, besides their killed and wounded, 30 cannon, a great number of small arms, their train of provisions and munitions of war, and $1,000,000 in greenbacks. The best ironclad in the Federal fleet, the Eastport, also grounded and was lost. The entire loss was certainly not less than 10,000. At last dates, April 30, the Confederates were reported to be advancing upon General Banks at Grand Ecore.

THE brilliant victory achieved by the Confederate land and naval forces in North Carolina finds its briefest record in the following official despatch:—

Plymouth, North Carolina, April 20, 1864.

To General Braxton Bragg.

I have stormed and carried this place, capturing one brigadier, one thousand six hundred men, stores, and twenty-five pieces of artillery.

R. F. HOKE, Brigadier-General.

A telegram to President Davis from Colonel John Taylor Wood says 'that about twenty-five hundred prisoners were taken (three or four hundred of them negroes), thirty pieces of artillery, one hundred thousand pounds of meat, one thousand barrels of flour, and a full garrison outfit. Our loss was about three hundred in all. Colonel Mercer was among the killed. Two gunboats were sunk, another disabled, and a small steamer captured.'

Plymouth is on the south bank of the Roanoke River, in North Carolina, eight miles above its entrance into Albemarle Sound. It was occupied by the Federal forces in February, 1862, after the capture of Roanoke Island, and Fort Gray and other works were erected for its defence. These works were defended by a garrison of about two thousand men, aided by a fleet of gunboats. The attack was commenced April 17, and five assaults, according to the Federal General Peck, were repulsed. While the Confederate land forces were engaged in making these repeated assaults on the forts, a Confederate ram, said to resemble the Merrimac, came down the river, passed the forts, and sank two Federal gunboats, a third having been sunk by the fire of the artillery on shore. While the mouth of the river was held by the ram and a floating battery, a final and successful assault was made upon Fort Williams, with the results above stated. Another Confederate ram was said to be descending the River Neuse, to make a similar attack upon Washington and Newbern; but the last dates contain no account of further movements.

A singular incident of the naval action was the rebound of a shell from the iron plating of the ram with such force that it killed Commander Flusser, of the Federal gunboat Miami, who had fired it with his own hand.

'GOLD 189'—'Exchange on London 202.' These handwritings on the wall of Federal Finance have startled even the speculative optimists of New York from their dreams of bliss. Mr. Chase, the 'Great Gold Bear,' rushed from Washington to New York, and from the Jersey City Ferry to Wall Street, to stop the panic. By selling gold certificates ten per cent. below the market price of gold, and throwing upon the market the gold held to pay Government interest, he effected a fall in the precious metal, or a rise in greenbacks; but he had scarcely got back to Washington before his paper was sinking deeper into the gulf. Mr. Chase calls on Congress for aid. At his request they have made speculation in gold—that is, in greenbacks—a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment. The financial world laughs at such legislation. At his request Congress has increased duties on importations fifty per cent. for the next sixty days—an outrage on the merchants, who were entitled to fair notice. Congress is also passing a Tax Bill, such as Mr. Chase requires, but which will prove a failure like the income-tax of last year. The truth is that the country neither will nor can pay the taxation which the Government and the war papers demand. It is a simple impossibility. The surplus production of the country is not sufficient. The national banks, throwing upon the country more than a thousand millions of irredeemable paper, having no basis but fast depreciating Government stocks, will only increase the difficulty, and each day's addition of $3,000,000 to the already overwhelming debt renders the approaching end nearer and more terrible, but not more certain. 'Nothing but military success can save us,' said Mr. Chase, in the late panic. It is as certain as any fact in nature, that not even that will do more than delay the avalanche of ruin which is now descending upon the Federal States.

THE French ships in the James River, sent for the tobacco belonging to the French Government, have been ordered away without it, their presence being considered inopportune by the Washington authorities.

IT is not Federal generals alone that fail and are thrown aside as of no further value. A similar fate seems likely to fall upon civilians in the highest positions. 'Military success' alone can save Mr. Lincoln, and yet that may defeat the object of his present ambition. The attack of General Blair on Mr. Chase in Congress is more startling perhaps than that of the press upon Mr. Lincoln. He declared that Secretary Chase was a peace man—'opposed to the employment of troops against the South'—that he 'had never abandoned this position, and was now endeavouring to frame a programme by which there would be a permanent dissolution of the Union;' that under the Secretary's trade regulations five barrels of percussion caps lately went to the enemy; that contraband goods go the same way constantly, and that through those regulations the Secretary's son-in-law, Senator Sprague, will make two millions of dollars; that he is playing Fremont against Lincoln only that he may betray both and be himself nominated to the Presidency. What gives peculiar force to these charges is the fact that General Blair, who is the brother of the Postmaster-General, has just left his seat in Congress to take command of the 17th Army Corps, to which he has been appointed by Mr. Lincoln. It is difficult to see how Mr. Chase can remain in the Cabinet with such charges against him endorsed by the President. These charges have been renewed amid great excitement, and an investigation will be demanded.

THE birthday of Thomas Jefferson was celebrated in New York by the Anti-Abolition of State Rights Association, at which toasts of Peace and Recognition were drunk, and speeches made by Ex-Governor Seymour, of Connecticut, and others. Among the letters read was one from Hon. Wm. B. Reed, of Pennsylvania, which expresses in the following paragraph the spirit of the celebration. He says:—

> In all that you say about this wicked war I entirely concur. It ought at once to stop; and if recognition for the purposes of negotiation, or even ultimate recognition of Southern independence, be necessary to arrest bloodshed, then there should be recognition. Two years ago I thought I saw this necessity, and honestly said so. The dreary chapter of blood which has since been written has not weakened my faith. I cling to it resolutely, and am proud of the obloquy which, in certain quarters, such faith attracts. If peace does not come soon, we may have anarchy—as we now have oppressive despotism.

THE addition of 50 per cent. to duties on foreign goods, and the immense demand for articles of value for which depreciating paper can be exchanged, must give a new impetus to smuggling around the whole frontier of the Federal States. The country will be drained of its gold, while the Government will get less than ever.

AMONG the prisoners taken by the Confederates at Plymouth were three or four hundred negroes; but it is too near Washington and New York for any report that they were murdered, buried alive, or burnt, to be credited. The Confederates take negro prisoners of war and treat them in the same manner as their white prisoners, going so far in the direction of equality at Richmond as to confine black and white prisoners in the same cells. If the miscegenarians want better treatment than that, they are hard to satisfy.

THE New York Herald—which is a sort of Yankee Charivari, in its own fashion—proposes General Banks as a new Presidential candidate, and says 'that, by his recent brilliant victory in Louisiana, he has come prominently forward as a hero.' This is a slight mistake. He went forward to within forty-five miles of Shreveport, got terribly beaten, and then came back, not at all as a hero, to Grand Ecore—a strategic movement, that had not even, as far as we can see, placed him 'in safety.'

THE want of the North now is 'speedy and emphatic taxes on everything taxable.' The people are anxious to be taxed, so the newspapers inform us. Do they not also wish for the conscription? If it were so, gold would not be at 180, nor bounties for volunteers at $700 or $800.

THE 'sword controversy' in the New York Sanitary Fair has been decided in a characteristic if not satisfactory manner. At the close of the balloting, at a dollar a vote, General McClellan had 11,903 votes, and General Grant 9,647, leaving a majority of 2,256 for McClellan; but this did not suit the managers of the fair, and they opened a ballot by letter, in which by large contributions, in one case $10,000, possibly of the funds of the fair, or some secret-service money, they gave General Grant some 15,000 majority, and the sword, with which he is expected to win a victory in Virginia.

GENERAL FORREST, whose advance to the Ohio river seems to have greatly alarmed the loyal Governors of the North-western States, was reported, at last dates, to be about to join General Polk in Alabama.

THE only news from Chattanooga is that of the massing of supplies for the Federal army, preparatory to its march into Georgia, or to provide against the breaking of its lines of communication in Tennessee and Kentucky.

COMMODORE PARKER reports that the Confederates have placed torpedoes in the Rappahannock and in all openings into Chesapeake bay. The torpedo has now become a regular arm of defence in all the Southern waters.

EIGHTY-FIVE thousand militia, of the Western States, are to be called into the service of the Federal Government, to do garrison duty during the summer campaign—the hundred days during which the war is to be continued. This movement is not popular with the farming population, nor with those who are expecting a Confederate invasion.

IT may interest skilled workmen who propose to emigrate to the Federal States, to know that two hundred mechanics in the department of General Thomas passed through Louisville, Ky., the other day, under military guard, to be sent out of Kentucky during the war, for refusing to work for the wages government officers choose to give them. When the workmen at the foundries near West Point, New York, struck for higher wages, on account of the depreciation of the currency, General Dix attended to their case, by sending up a gunboat. They could not get more greenbacks, but lead and iron were quite at their service.

THE shameful act of repudiation by which the State of New York compels the foreign holders of its bonds to receive their interest in a depreciated currency, by which, at recent rates of exchange, 202*l.* of interest would give them only 100*l.* in London, less than half, which proportion may sink in a few months or weeks to a quarter, or an eighth, cannot but affect all American credit in Europe. United States Stocks are said to have found some purchasers of late in Germany, where lotteries are licensed, and gaming houses among the fashionable amusements.

MR. DANENHOWER, the officer of the Federal steamer Vanderbilt, who shot Mr. Gray, mate of the Saxon, and was tried for murder at the demand of Lord Lyons, has been acquitted by the naval court martial, and, it is said, not only acquitted but commended, the act having been, in the estimation of his fellow-officers, not only no crime but a positive merit. As the Saxon has been given up to its owners, and it is conceded there was no right to meddle with her, it is difficult to see how the shooting of the unarmed mate in cold blood, and without provocation, was not only innocent but commendable.

THE fluctuations in the price of gold in New York are still violent. A variation of 5 per cent. in a few hours is no longer uncommon. On April 30 the quotation was $79\frac{3}{4}$ premium.

THE FEDERAL DEFEAT AT DALTON.—One of the sharpest fights of the war, which resulted in the repulse of an attempted advance from Chattanooga, has been scarcely mentioned in the accounts of the Northern newspapers. A correspondent of the New York World throws a little light upon it in the following:—

> 'The manner in which our army was defeated at Dalton, in its recent attempt to drive the rebels from that point, proves the ease with which a comparatively small body of troops can hold the line defending Atlanta against a large hostile force. When our army advanced against Dalton, it was confidently expected that the place would be carried, and the rebels driven from it. But the very reverse took place; and the attack, well planned and brilliantly executed as it was, only revealed the great strength of the enemy's position. It was then only that it was called a reconnaissance, as all of our defeats have been called, from Big Bethel, Bull Run, and Belmont, down to Mine Run.'

ENGLAND.

The Conference on the Danish Question sat on Monday at the official residence of the First Lord of the Treasury, in Downing Street, and agreed to a suspension of hostilities between Denmark and the German Powers. The terms of the armistice are on the basis of the uti possidetis, each Power retaining its own position both by sea and land. The blockade is to be raised, and the suspension of arms is to be for one month. The Conference was to meet again this day.

The grand jury of Westminster have returned a true bill against Mr. William Rumball (case of the Rappahannock) for misdemeanour. The trial will probably take place at the sittings after Trinity Term.

The case, 'ex parte Ternan and others,' was heard on Monday last, in the Court of Queen's Bench, before the Lord Chief Justice of England and Mr. Justices Blackburn, Mellor, and Shee. The facts may be shortly recapitulated. In November last, an American schooner, the Gerity, left Matamoras for New York, laden with a cargo of cotton. Some six or seven men embarked on board of her as passengers, and at midnight of the day after the sailing of the ship rose on the crew, seized the ship, cast the master adrift in the Gulf of Mexico, and took the ship to Belize, where they abandoned the ship and sold the cargo. In January last, three of the men (two of them British subjects) were found to be in Liverpool, and on the requisition of the United States Minister, Sir George Grey issued his warrant to the magistrates of Liverpool, the magistrates issued a warrant to arrest the men, and they were accordingly taken into custody, and from time to time remanded. It was proved that the men acted under the command of Major Hogg, of the Confederate army, and that they seized the ship in the name of the Government of the Confederate States. The prisoners also stated that Major Hogg showed them instructions signed by General Bee. Now the object of the arrest, of course, was that the men might be delivered up to the United States under the Extradition Treaty. The article in the treaty relied on by Mr. Adams, is to the effect that 'the United States and Her Majesty shall, on mutual requisition by them or their Ministers, &c., deliver up to justice persons who, being charged with the crime of murder, piracy, robbery, arson, or forgery committed within the jurisdiction of either of the contracting parties, should seek an asylum or be found within the territories of the other: provided that this should only be done upon such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive person so charged should be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial for the crime alleged to have been committed.' Mr. Edward James, Q.C. had, on behalf of the prisoners, obtained a rule nisi for a habeas corpus directed to the gaoler at Liverpool for the purpose of bringing them up with a view to their discharge, and now moved to make the rule absolute. Mr. Lush, Q.C. appeared to show cause against the rule, instructed on behalf of the United States Minister. 'The question,' he said, 'was whether there was sufficient evidence before the magistrate to justify him in committing the men for trial.' The Lord Chief Justice interposed and said, that there was a question much more important, for 'Mr. Lush was in this dilemma: either the act of the men was not piracy at all, in which case the matter would be at an end; or if it is piracy, then it was cognisable by the courts of this country, and so was, of course, not within the treaty.' Mr. Lush thereupon proceeded to show that there could be a piracy not jure gentium, but by municipal law, and that there were acts punishable as piracy by the law of the United States which were not so punishable in this country. Thus the word piracy was used in both senses in the treaty. Then again as to piracy jure gentium, if committed on board an American ship, the offence would be within the jurisdiction of the American courts. In answer to the remark of the Court that the offence would be triable in England, Mr. Lush contended that the statute did not apply merely to cases triable exclusively in the American courts. The Lord Chief Justice then cited Kent's Commentaries to the effect that such treaties applied to crimes which could not be punished in the country where the offender was found. Thereupon Mr. Lush argued that the offence of piracy was peculiar and exceptional, and that the word piracy in the treaty embraced the act in question. Mr. Justice Blackburn remarked that piracy destroyed the nationality of the ship so that the crime became punishable in the courts of any country, and moreover it was clear that the treaty pointed to extradition in cases of exclusive jurisdiction. Mr. Lush maintained that piracy committed on a ship was cognisable by the courts of the nation to which the ship belonged, but the Court cited cases from Wheaton to prove that the act of piracy divested the ship of its nationality, and constituted a crime equally punishable everywhere. At length Mr. Lush was driven to argue that the country on whose ship the piracy had been committed had a greater interest in trying it, but the Court replied that the trial could be held as effectually and impartially here. Mr. Lush then said that there was the act of robbery on the high seas independently of the seizure of the ship, and that was piracy by the American law; but the Court said that the seizure of the ship was the real act, that it was either piracy jure gentium or nothing. If it was justified as the act of a belligerent, it was nothing. If it was not so justified, it was piracy. Mr. Lush then argued that at all events in any view the men were liable to be tried here and so could not be discharged; but the Court said that the men were not detained for trial in this country, but for the purpose of delivery up to the United States. Nothing in the case showed that they were detained for trial here, otherwise that might be a good return to the writ. The Lord Chief Justice gave judgment to the effect that the rule must be made absolute. The Court would not express a decision on the construction of the statute, but would wish to have before it all the materials for an authoritative judgment. The matter will therefore be argued next term. As far as the prisoners are concerned, the rule for the habeas corpus is made absolute, and they will be brought before the Court next term to await the decision of their Lordships.

Final judgment has been given by Lord Ormidale in the case of the Pampero, according to the terms of compromise agreed upon between the parties. The judgment allowed Messrs. Thomson, the builders, to withdraw from the case; allowed the minute for the defenders, Fleming and others, consenting to a verdict without any liability being incurred by any parties to the suit; and found for the Crown on the thirty-seventh count, to the effect that the defenders attempted to furnish the ship, with intent and in order that such ship should be employed in the service of the Confederate States, with intent to cruise and commit hostilities against a certain foreign State with which Her Majesty was not then at war—to wit, the Republic of the United States—and further declared that no penalty had been incurred by the defenders, and that no expenses were due from either party.

The Government, to use a vulgar saying, has been 'one too many' for Messrs. Beales, Hartwell, Nicholay, & Co. On April 23, Mr. Edmond Beales, while addressing a meeting on Primrose Hill on the subject of the sudden departure of General Garibaldi, was requested to desist by the police. Mr. Beales wrote a letter demanding an explanation from Sir George Grey, and the statement of the Home Secretary on the point not being satisfactory, the Garibaldi Committee waited on the Minister on April 27, Sir Richard Mayne being present. Sir George Grey handed over the Committee to the First Commissioner of Works. Thereupon Mr. Hartwell wrote to the Hon. W. Cowper, and informed him that the City and Working Men's Garibaldi Committee intended to hold the adjourned meeting on May 7 on Primrose Hill, and begged to know whether the Commissioner intended to interfere with such meeting. The Hon. W. Cowper, with a shrewdness which almost induces the suspicion that the advice of the skilful Premier was obtained, gave for answer that he had not the smallest objection whatever to the holding of such meeting. Now this was precisely what the Committee did not want. They were completely 'non-plussed. They were determined that, whether Mr. Cowper liked or not, the Government should interfere. So at poor Mr. Cowper another terrible epistle was hurled by the indefatigable Secretary, Robert Hartwell, who demanded a clear and distinct reply to two questions: first, whether the Commissioner claimed the right of stopping meetings on Primrose Hill; secondly, if so, then on what Act of Parliament or what principle of law such right was claimed? The discussion of all such questions was politely declined. Finding the Government impenetrable, and themselves in a ridiculous position, the Committee were, nevertheless, under the clear necessity of holding their monster meeting. So on Saturday last Mr. Edmond Beales, Mr. Nicholay, Mr. Washington Wilks, and other members of the Committee walked up Primrose Hill with a white and red banner borne before them. Members of Parliament were promised by way of an attraction, but not a single M.P. was there. On reaching the top an attempt was made to form a circle, in order that the Chairman might be seen and heard; but the attempt was a failure. The reason was simple enough. The police were not present, and so of course no order was possible. The crowd altogether numbered about 1,500 persons, and some half-dozen speeches, involving all sorts of denunciatory propositions, with which it is not necessary to trouble the reader, were delivered. The affair concluded with three cheers for Garibaldi and one more for Mazzini. A crowd of about 5,000 had collected before the termination of the proceedings. Not a single policeman was anywhere visible.

On Tuesday last Mr. Gladstone received, at his official residence in Downing Street, a deputation from the City and Working Men's Garibaldi Committee, in order to give explanations as to the part taken by him in connection with the sudden departure of the General, and to correct the universal misapprehension of the facts of the case. Mr. Gladstone said that he had no personal knowledge of what occurred before April 17: on the evening of that day he met the Duke of Sutherland, Lord Shaftesbury, Mr. Seely, M.P., Signor Negretti, General Eber, Mr. Stansfeld, M.P., and Colonel Peard, at Stafford House, by invitation. They read Mr. Fergusson's letter on the subject of Garibaldi's health, and came to the conclusion that it would be perilous for the General to go through the intended programme of visits. General Eber and Colonel Peard communicated that opinion to the General, who thereupon asked to see Mr. Gladstone privately. Mr. Gladstone then warned Garibaldi against endangering his health, and also told him 'that such a magnificent reception (as he had had) was not in the nature of things likely to bear repetition.' There was nothing whatever of a political character in the conversation that passed between them, and not a word was said about the Government desiring that the General should leave. In answer to this statement, Mr. Shaen declared that Garibaldi had expressed to him his impression that the Government wished him to go—that he had said that the explanation of Lord Palmerston in the House of Commons did not release him from the obligation to go—and that the matter had become a question between the Government and the English people. Some further questions were put to Mr. Gladstone, who denied that he knew anything about the history of Mr. Fergusson's letter, and said that he had been glad of the opportunity afforded to him of stating all he knew.

Some further correspondence between the Earl Russell and Mr. Adams on the subject of the enlistment on board the Kearsage has been published. It is not necessary to enter into a lengthened investigation of these documents. The gist of the series is simply this. Mr. Adams sees no evidence to justify him in doubting the statement made to him by the officers concerned; believes that Captain Thornton gave no authority to enlist any one in Queenstown or elsewhere; and contends that, on a comparison with the depositions of other witnesses, the statement of the Captain is credible and consistent. Earl Russell, on the other hand, regrets that the officers Thornton and Haley, who have clearly violated the municipal law of this country, are still retained in the service of the United States, and cannot see how the circumstances occurring on board the ship could have escaped the knowledge of the captain. Finally, Mr. Adams promises to submit to his Government the wish of Lord Russell for further investigation.

The Very Reverend Francis Jeune, D.D., Dean of Lincoln, has been appointed to the bishopric of Peterborough, vacant by the death of Dr. Davys. Dr. Jeune graduated at Oxford in 1827, having taken a first class in classics. He was made head master of Birmingham school in 1834, and in 1838 was appointed to the deanery of Jersey and rectory of St. Heliers. In 1843 he was made Master of Pembroke College, Oxford, and also rector of Paynton by the gift of the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester. At the time of the enquiry held by Her Majesty's Commissioners into the condition of the University of Oxford, Dr. Jeune rendered such assistance in the explanation of affairs, as secured to himself the goodwill of a party in the State rather than the respect or gratitude of the authorities in the University of Oxford. Dr. Jeune belongs to the extreme Evangelical party in the Church.

An Irish baronet, Sir Thomas Fitzgerald, committed suicide about a fortnight since, by drowning himself. The unfortunate gentleman was driven to this act by mental affliction caused by embarrassed circumstances. The jury returned a verdict of 'temporary insanity.' That decision was at variance with the view taken by the peasantry of Tipperary, who held that the deceased had been guilty of murder, and was unworthy of Christian burial. The grandfather of the late baronet had, by his severity in 1798, in the course of which he earned the title of 'the Flogger,' fixed in the heart of the people a deadly animosity against the family. Moreover, the popular belief in divine retribution had been strengthened by the evils which had befallen the Fitzgeralds since that year of cruelty, and the misfortunes had in turn justified the wrath of the believers. The heir of the 'Flogger' was drowned on board the Nimrod: a son of the late baronet had hanged himself with a cord fastened to a nail in the wall, while explaining to his little brother and sister the method pursued by the 'Flogger.' From opinion the peasantry rushed at once to action, and took measures to prevent the burial in the churchyard. The family had warning, and the funeral proceeded to the churchyard of Ballygriffin, accompanied by a few relatives and without ostentation. At the gate a mob was assembled, and in spite of all entreaties, refused to admit the corpse into consecrated ground. The coffin was borne back to the house. On the Sunday following the priest addressed the people from the altar in condemnation of their conduct. On the next day the interment took place in the presence of a force of 150 constables; and exhortations were delivered to calm the popular excitement. A guard, however, remains day and night at the grave to prevent an outrage.

The Secretary of State for War has received intelligence by telegraph viâ Alexandria, from Lieutenant-General Cameron. The despatch is dated from Head-quarters, Te Wamuta, February 25. It states that a force under General Cameron had made a flank march on February 10, and had turned the whole of the native strongholds, which had been constructed with immense labour to oppose his advance. The natives thereupon retreated to Rangiawahia and took up a strong position. On the 22nd, the men of the 50th regiment attacked and carried with great gallantry the position of the enemy. Three officers were wounded, and four men killed, and twenty-four wounded in the engagement. The English troops are now in possession of the rich country between the Waipa and Waikato rivers.

THE CONTINENT.

On Monday evening, the 9th inst., Sir George Grey read out, amid the tumultuous cheers of the House of Commons, a telegraphic despatch from Heligoland, saying that an engagement was then going on, within sight of the island, between 2 frigates and a corvette of the Danes, and 2 frigates 3 gunboats of the Austrians; and, again, another and later despatch, saying that the Danes had gained the victory; one Austrian frigate was in flames, and the remaining Austrian vessels were about to take refuge in the English waters. A more detailed account informs us that the Danes, after their victory, steered away northwards; the fire on board the Austrian vessel, the Schwartzenberg, was extinguished, and no vital injury had been sustained; but she lost her foremast and bowsprit, besides suffering in other parts. The loss of the German squadron amounted to 170 killed and wounded. When we remember how inferior are both the armament and the gunnery of the Danes, we shall not be surprised to hear great jubilations over this not very important success; nor need we be very much shocked if the glorifications on account of it are a little too loud either for its intrinsic merits or its political importance. It was really a gallant affair—a regular sea-duel, with the chances evenly balanced, or, perhaps, rather unfavourable for the Danes. If the asylum of neutral waters had not been so near, who knows but that the victory might have been made more decisive? It is better as it is. The sight of an Austrian war-steamer brought as a prize to Copenhagen in tow of a Dane, would have been a cup of triumph too intoxicating for that light-headed and violent democracy. Politically the event is of some weight; it leaves the Danes, at the commencement of a truce, winners of the last trick, and with all the solid advantages of that honour. Moreover, it exhibits to the world in plain terms the falsehood of a statement which, in the face of the best testimony, is often asserted in England, that the blockade of the German ports is a farce, an imposture, a diplomatic fiction. The German papers assert the contrary, as they foam with rage at the so-called 'piracies' of the Danish navy; the German diplomats confessed the contrary, when they tried to make the raising of the blockade a sine quâ non of an armistice; the King of Prussia allows the contrary, when he exempts foreign ships trading with German ports from differential dues for the next six months.

A great mass of speculation and theorising has been wasted during the last week on the probabilities of the armistice, the conditions sine quâ non of the two belligerents, and the mutual concessions which might be made in order to bring it about. The conclusion of a truce for a month on the uti possidetis terms, to the rejection of any notion of an armistice, has set at nought all such conjectures. The only remark worthy of record on the subject of the Conference which we can extract from the German newspapers is on another though parallel subject: 'The signal for the departure of the English fleet on a hostile errand would be the signal for the withdrawal of the German Plenipotentiaries from the Conference' (Nord-Deutsche Zeitung, May 4). This is very 'big talk.' We can afford in England to wait for the event, but we admire the boldness of the man who could describe as 'Plenipotentiaries' these German gentlemen who have been obliged, on the second meeting of the Conference, to send home for further instructions.

The hostages taken in Jutland have been released, on the payment of the exactions made by Field-Marshal Von Wrangel. The requisitions made of the town of Viborg, containing 8,900 inhabitants, are as follows: Quarters for 5,000 men, stabling for 1,500 horses, 19,600 lbs. of bread, 30,000 lbs. of oats, 380 lbs. of roasted coffee, 2,700 lbs. of rice, 380 bottles of wine, 1,200 bottles of brandy, 3,000 cigars, 1,300 lbs. of tobacco, 25,000 lbs. of hay, and 11,000 lbs. of straw. This is a sort of entrance fee only: for daily contribution, 380 lbs. of coffee, 11,000 lbs. of fresh beef or 5,000 lbs. of bacon, 300 lbs. of salt, 19,600 lbs. of bread, 7,000 lbs. of peas, 380 bottles of wine, 29,000 lbs. of oats; brandy, cigars, tobacco, hay, and straw, to the same amount as above. In the town of Habro, of 1,900 inhabitants, the amount of supplies demanded was about the same, and in addition a war contribution of 24,000 rigsdalers was levied; the unfortunate town, however, had not more than 5,000 to produce.

A despatch from Fredericia informs us that the Austro-Prussians are putting that fortress into a state of defence, and intend to occupy it with a strong garrison. The Prussian troops have begun the demolition of the Düppel works; three of the ten redoubts had disappeared on the 30th ult. The report is rife that the Prussian Government intend to require guarantees that the fortifications of Slesvig shall never be restored; they wish that the country should, at any rate, be exposed ever hereafter to their patriotic incursions.

THE Boersenhalle, in an article treating of the wonderful concord hitherto displayed between the Austrians and Prussians, observes that 'the solidity of that alliance will not be fairly tested until the foundation of the whole affair is reached; that is, until they have to ask what shall be done with the Duchies. As if to add a new complication to the question, the Duke of Oldenburg has come forward as superior claimant to the sovereignty of the Duchies over the head of the Duke of Augustenburg. A pamphlet has been published in Vienna containing a statement of his claim, and a genealogical proof of its correctness. He has at least this advantage over the Duke of Augustenburg, that he is not laying claim to a property for which he or his family have already received a good round price.

From Breslau another pamphlet has issued urging the Duchies to unite to Prussia; besides this, or probably together with this, a petition has been circulated in Slesvig, to be addressed, when properly signed, to the King of Prussia, praying him to incorporate the Duchies into his kingdom; thus only the petitioners hope to obtain real inpendence, and to protect themselves from the Danish reign of terror, which will infallibly follow the withdrawal of the German armies.

A delightful story is told of a certain small sovereign duke, so small that his name has unfortunately escaped us: being an officer in the Prussian army, he had occasion to be present in the trenches during the bombardment of the Düppel position; astounded with his own valour he returns to his quarters, and writes a despatch to his Minister of the Interior, informing him that in consequence of his own heroic conduct he has thought fit, in his exceeding graciousness, to confer upon himself the Cross of the Order of Military Merit lately instituted by himself.

THE law which reestablished the right of the noble to inflict the bastinado has caused great agitation in Mecklenburg-Schwerin. It was abolished in 1849, but restored provisionally in 1853, with the additional proviso that the canes used should, for the future, be a yard and a half long and half an inch thick, instead of a yard and a quarter long and a quarter of an inch thick, 'the old sticks not having produced the desired effect.' The noble has the right of inflicting twenty-five blows on his colonists, servants, and even temporary workmen; he may administer the punishment with his own hands. (Berliner Volks-Zeitung.)

(From the Times.) 'A very questionable honour.'—On Sunday the King of Prussia conferred the Order of the Black Eagle on His Royal Highness Prince Alfred. Who was it who said, 'Two things there are which no Prussian can escape—Death and the Order of the Black Eagle'? We cannot exempt our Royal Family from the former; but what have they done to be haunted by the latter?

A MOVEMENT is at this moment taking place in the East of Europe which excites the most painful interest in the Western world. The Russians, having taken the last stronghold of the Circassians, have intimated to the tribes dwelling in and around those mountains, that they must either bear allegiance to the Emperor of Russia or emigrate; the seacoast tribes are given five years to take the choice; the hill tribes must do so immediately. The choice has been quickly and generally taken; multitudes to the number of 300,000 are flocking to the shore, and looking out for any coasting vessel that will transport them to Turkish territory; few vessels are found, and on those few the accommodation is, of course, wholly inadequate. In the meantime the people die like sheep; some on the coast where they are awaiting transports, some in the country where they take refuge, many on shipboard during the passage; 20 per cent. is the least proportion of loss that can be calculated; of 600 passengers on a steam transport 370 only arrived alive. The Turkish Government has done what it could; the few available transports were sent to the coast, and now some men-of-war are to be disarmed for the same duty. Shelter, nourishment, and sanitary regulations have been provided to the full extent of their present means; a subscription has been started, which the Sultan has most munificently headed with the sum of 50,000*l.*; but it is calculated that the permanent establishment of the emigrants will cost the Government more than 1,000,000*l.* In the midst of disaster there are many who love to speculate on the possible advantages which may result; these people talk of the immense benefit which the addition of a strong mountain race will be not only to the blood of the country, but to its labouring powers over the vast uncultivated Edens of Asia Minor. The latter hope may have good foundation, but as to the former we must remember that the Turk is already more than half Circassian, through the continual mingling of that race with the Turkish on the mother's side. Another idea is that they may be profitably used to recruit the army; this will be a great benefit to the Turks, and we doubt not the greatest of boons to the hardy mountaineer, who may, perhaps, thus meet his oppressor and exterminator on equal terms on the plains of Bessarabia, or wherever else the next blow will be struck by Russia against Turkish independence.

The submission of the Circassian tribes has set free a Russian force of about 50,000 men. It is announced that these troops are now on their way to Bessarabia to reinforce the army of observation on the Moldavian frontier under General Kotzebue.

WE continue to hear of encounters between the Russian troops and the Polish insurgents, but the result of them is always hidden in mystery. A report is rife at Dresden that a review is about to be held of Russian and Prussian troops combined, on the Polish frontier.

A DESPATCH from Corfu speaks of fresh troubles at Athens. It was expected that the commanders of the English and the French squadrons would send their marines on shore for the protection of the bank.

Other advices from the same island state that the remains of the English garrison are to leave on June 3. The citadel and new fort are to be left uninjured. The crew of Her Majesty's ship Fox were informed by Albanians visiting their ship from the mainland, that they were only awaiting the final departure of the English to make a descent upon the island.

TURIN, May 4.—Signor Peruzzi, Minister of the Interior, in answer to some observations of the Opposition, said that it was not for the Government to declare its intentions with respect to Garibaldi and his party, until they knew what course Garibaldi had in view. He hoped that, after the encomia paid by the General to English institutions and the English loyalty, no one in Italy would permit himself to set up a policy of his own, or to aim at any object except by the means provided by the Constitution.

ON the visit of their Mexican Majesties to Rome, the Imperial party were invited to join the Sovereign Pontiff at breakfast after the celebration of mass. Cardinal Antonelli was the only other guest. Mgr. de Mérode alone was permitted to wait upon the Pope; their Majesties were served during the meal by a bishop.

THE French Senate has had rare sport this week. M. le Marquis de Boissy, the distinguished Anglo-phobist, took the occasion of the Prince of Wales's visit to Garibaldi to indulge in some excessively rude remarks upon our heir-apparent, whom, by the way, he degraded into 'heir-presumptive.' The official report of the speech omitted certain phrases of peculiar ferocity on which the Marquis especially prided himself; whereupon on Wednesday the 4th inst., he taxed the President of the Senate with intentional falsification of the debates, and called the Moniteur a liar ('Non pas Moniteur, mais Menteur autorisé du Gouvernement'); the President mildly remarked that such language was indecorous, whereon a smart discussion ensued. In the course of it the President asserted his right to erase from the records of the House anything which might disgrace it or lower its reputation. The Marquis then proceeded to insult the President himself, and was called to order; and, on his persistence, the call to order was inserted in the Minutes of the House.

The speech by M. Thiers on the financial situation of France in the Chamber of Representatives was, if less exciting, more worthy of record. It was a literary and rhetorical chef d'œuvre in this sense—that although irrelevant throughout, although adhering only nominally to the subject, it commanded the attention of the house, and evidently gave expression to many sentiments till then dormant in the breast of his hearers. He commenced with a comparative statement of the finances under the Orléans régime, under the Republic, and under the Empire, showing thereby that the budget had nearly doubled itself; then going into the details of expense, he bestowed on each unqualified praise. As to the army it is on a peace footing; 400,000 men are the least number that can be employed in foreign service and home defence. The objections of the orator turned chiefly on certain points in which he desired to contrast the imperial policy unfavourably with that of the Orleanist Government, of which he had been a member.

THE Japanese Ambassadors were received by the Emperor at the Tuileries last week: they presented to him the autograph letter of the Tycoon, and made an address, in which they expressed their profound regret for the attack made by their nation on the French ships, and for the murder of a French officer; they begged the Emperor to name plenipotentiaries with whom they might arrange all matters between the two Empires. The Emperor's answer expressed his satisfaction at the advances made by the Tycoon; and observed that they must clearly understand that any settlement must be based on a strict observance on their part of the requirements of international law.

ON the 4th inst. was celebrated, under the dome of the Invalides, the service commemorative of the death of the Emperor Napoleon I. The 5th is the proper anniversary, but the day was changed on account of the Feast of the Ascension. The service was attended by a battalion of old soldiers, decorated with the St. Helena medal, the mark of service under the old Empire. Among the more distinguished persons who assisted at the ceremony were the Comte de Flahault, and the Princesses Julie and Charlotte Buonaparte. The officiating priest pronounced the absolution; then the Governor of the Invalides, General Marquis de Laurestine, advanced to the sarcophagus, and sprinkled it with holy water; the old soldiers then defiled in slow time past the last resting-place of their beloved commander.

ON Sunday, a brilliant fête was held by the Empress and the Prince Imperial in the gardens of the Tuileries for the entertainment of children associates of the Prince Imperial's Infant Society for loans to the labouring classes (Prêts de l'Enfance au travail). Some notion may be formed of the general magnificence of the entertainment provided, when we say that a concert, several platforms for dancing, and a circus, were collected within the gardens. Every marionnette theatre in Paris was engaged, and installed in some part of the great central avenue. Last, but not least, at the foot of the great horse-shoe terrace adjoining the principal gates on the Place de la Concorde, were two immense tables with fifty refreshment stalls in their rear, laden with sweetmeats, pastry, and all the other delicacies so dear to the eye and palate of infancy. The number of tickets distributed for children alone was about 13,000; each of these was authorised to introduce also the father and mother, or one attendant not a parent, so that we may conceive the gaiety of that day to have been something out of the common, even in the gayest capital in the world.

M. ARMAND, who, after having been acquitted by a jury of an attempt to murder Maurice Roux, was condemned by the judge to pay a fine of 20,000 francs as civil damages for the commission of the deed, has appealed against the condemnation to the Supreme Court in Paris. After some argument, and a consultation of two hours and a half, the Supreme Court reversed the decision of the inferior court at Aix against M. Armand.

THE Emperor is desirous of assuring himself on the amount of military proficiency possessed by the recruits of the French army after the three months' drill to which they are subjected during their first year of enlistment. For this purpose a body of 2,000 infantry, artillery, and engineers of the class of 1862 will be assembled at the camp of Châlons from July 20 to August 20 next. They will be taken from the contingents of the departments nearest to the camp, in order to avoid the inconvenience of removing so large a body far from their native place. This month of extra service will be counted as a substitute for the two months' drill to which they would ordinarily be liable in January and February next.

IT has been decided in the Civil Tribunal of St. Etienne (Loire) that, by Art. 162 and 184 of the Code Napoléon, a marriage with a deceased wife's sister is null, and the children of the marriage incapable of inheriting.

ON Tuesday the 10th instant, the Spring Meeting at Longchamps took place. The great event was the Emperor's prize for three-year-olds, but it brought only 7 horses to the post; of these Arcturus was the favourite at 9 to 4, followed by Bois-Roussell and Baronello at 5 to 2; both the latter have won races in the last fortnight, but Baronello's temper is so uncertain that his prominence in the betting appears scarcely justified. At any rate he has disappointed his backers in his usual style, displaying great fractiousness at the post, and getting off half a dozen lengths in rear of the lot. Count de Lagrange's Antinous made the run at first, and then gave way to his stable-companion Torcière, but Flatman, on Bois-Rousseil came up with a rush, followed by Arcturus. The former took the lead and held it to the finish, winning easily by 6 lengths. Arcturus was beaten by Torcière by a neck for the second place, and the same distance separated him from Perle, who was fourth. The value of the stakes was about 1,200*l.*; the distance a mile and a quarter. The other events of the day were the Prix des Tertres won by Baron Daru's Astrolabe, who was the favourite at 4 to 1; Prix du Trocadero, won by Count Lagrange's Comme-ça, favourite, at 2 to 1; Prix du Lac handicap, won by Baron d'Auriol's Tambour Battant at 10 to 1, beating a field of 14, among whom was Jamicoton; Prix de Neuilly, won by Count Lagrange's Villafranca, the favourite at 3 to 2.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

IRISH EMIGRATION TO THE UNITED STATES.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Scully asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention had been directed to the proposed Act of the United States Congress providing for the reduction of tonnage dues on immigrant vessels, and for the appointment of a Government Commissioner of Immigration, who shall be empowered to contract for the importation of immigrants, and for their transmission into the inland districts of the United States; and whether it is the intention of the present Government to adopt any measures either towards diverting into some of Her Majesty's colonies the increased and increasing emigration from Ireland, or towards arresting that emigration by providing industrial employment at home, or by reducing exorbitant taxation, or by improving the land laws, or by abolishing religious distinctions, or by conceding to Irishmen some participation in the government of their own country, or otherwise.

Sir G. Grey said his attention had not been called to the proposed Act of Congress referred to until the previous evening. There was undoubtedly a large emigration going on from Ireland, and mainly directed towards the United States; but the reason was obviously to be found in the fact that wages of labour in that country were very high, while in Ireland they were low. Her Majesty's Government did not think it would be expedient, even were it practicable, to endeavour to resist such emigration by the providing industrial employment at the public expense. He must also say that he thought Irishmen had a fair share of the benefits accruing from reductions of taxation, and he was not aware that any alteration of the laws relating to land would tend to diminish emigration. Religious distinctions had, happily, been abolished, and as to participation in the government, Irishmen had the same rights and powers under the same Constitution as Englishmen and Scotchmen.

THE MALLORY REPORT FORGERY.

On Thursday, the 7th inst., the Attorney-General briefly stated that he had received a courteous letter from the Hon. S. R. Mallory, authoritatively denying the genuineness of the Report on Confederate Naval Affairs, to which that gentleman's name had been fraudulently appended, and which the Attorney-General had quoted on a former occasion in the House. We give elsewhere the correspondence of Mr. Mallory with Sir Roundell Palmer on this subject.

THE MURDER OF THE MATE OF THE SAXON.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, Sir J. Elphinstone asked if the Government had received any information with regard to the murder of the mate of the Saxon. He understood that the murderer had not only been acquitted, but highly applauded for the manner in which he had behaved. At the request of Mr. Layard, Sir J. Elphinstone agreed to repeat his question on Thursday (to-day).

THE STATE OF NEW YORK AND ITS CREDITORS.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Layard, in reply to Mr. Cochrane, said the Government had not received any official information that a resolution had been carried in the State of New York, by which it was proposed to pay the interest due to foreign bondholders in paper instead of specie.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

On Monday it was announced in both Houses, that the Conference had agreed upon a suspension of hostilities for one month. Earl Russell said: 'I have to state to your Lordships, with great satisfaction, that the Conference has to-day agreed to a suspension of hostilities between Austria and Prussia on one side and Denmark on the other. The terms on which the suspension of hostilities has been agreed to are on the basis of the uti possidetis, each Power retaining its own position both by sea and land. The blockade is to be raised, and the suspension of arms is to be for one month. The question was between a suspension of arms and an armistice. The allied Powers agreed to a proposition in Conference by which Jutland would have been evacuated by the Germans, and Alsen by the Danes; but the Danish Government have preferred a simple suspension of hostilities for one month.'

Early in the sitting in the House of Commons, Sir George Grey stated on behalf of the Government that 'an armistice for a month had been agreed to,' but he was quite unable to communicate the terms. Soon afterwards Mr. Disraeli said that the terms had been stated in the House of Lords. Sir George Grey replied that he had not been informed of the terms, and therefore had not withheld any explanation which it was in his power to give. [It may be quite proper for the Foreign Secretary to snub the Home Secretary, but we submit the House of Commons ought to be treated with rather more consideration.]

The feeling of the House of Commons has been strikingly manifested on two occasions. On Friday, in the course of a short debate on the Duchies, Lord R. Cecil observed that the vast majority of the members sympathised with Denmark, and this was the signal for loud and prolonged cheering from all sides of the House. On Monday, when the naval victory of the Danes was announced, there was as much loud and continued cheering as if an English fleet had just achieved a signal triumph.

THE AUSTRIAN SQUADRON IN THE NORTH SEA.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, it was elicited from Lord C. Paget that the Aurora had gone to Heligoland 'probably to ascertain the proceedings of the Austrian Squadron.'

POLAND.

On Monday, in the House of Lords, Lord Campbell moved, 'That, in the opinion of this House, the correspondence of Her Majesty's Government with the Cabinet of St. Petersburg on the Polish question has not yet reached a satisfactory conclusion.' His Lordship pointed out the difference between the speech of Earl Russell at Blairgowrie and his despatches to St. Petersburg. He considered that the balance of power in Europe, the peace of Central Europe, and in some contingencies the welfare of England, depended upon a fair adjustment of the Polish question. He thought there was no difficulty in showing that the rights of Russia over Poland were based upon the Treaty of Vienna, and that the stipulations of that treaty had not been fulfilled by Russia.

Earl Russell thought the resolution, if accepted, would impair the authority of the House. It was wrong to assert that the Russian Government had ever repudiated its obligations under the Treaty of Vienna. He believed that the time would come when the Emperor of Russia would cease to govern Poland as if it were a country in perpetual insurrection. Unfortunately, in every contest between the Government of Russia and the Polish people, there had been a strong national feeling among the Russians that the greatness and glory of their country were concerned in putting down anything like resistance on the part of Poland. When that feeling was entirely done away with, the Poles might look for a better future. He thought there had been great forgetfulness on the part of the Poles of the changes which had taken place not only in the Duchy of Poland, but, to a still greater degree, at Dantzic and in Galicia, making it hopeless to think that those provinces would ever form part of Poland again. If, however, their views were confined to Poland only, they might look forward to a better state of things, and after a time to a government conducted on principles of liberty by the Poles themselves.

Lord Campbell withdrew his resolution.

THE DISPUTE WITH BRAZIL.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, in answer to Mr. Macaulay, Mr. Layard said that no communication had yet been received announcing the acceptance of the mediation of the King of Portugal by the Emperor of Brazil. He had seen a statement in the newspapers that the Emperor had announced his intention of accepting the mediation, but no official intelligence had been received. It was the impression of the Portuguese Minister at this Court that a satisfactory communication would soon be made. No reply had been received from the Government of Brazil to that portion of Earl Russell's despatch referred to by Mr. Macaulay [to the effect that Her Majesty's Government hoped that the Government of Brazil, in its future intercourse with Great Britain, would not omit the courtesy that was usual between Governments.] It was deemed most proper not to produce the correspondence, as there were reasonable expectations entertained that relations would speedily be resumed between the two countries.

INCREASED COST OF LIVING AT BERMUDA.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, in answer to Mr. Cave, the Marquis of Hartington said the Government did not think that they would be warranted in granting an extra allowance to officers at Bermuda on account of the high price of provisions. Comparing the rates at Bermuda with those of other West Indian stations, they were not excessive. The officers were permitted to obtain provisions for their wives and families at the contract prices.

TAXATION.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, Mr. J. White moved for the appointment of a Select Committee to enquire into the operation and incidence of our present fiscal system, and to consider and report if any and what measures could be devised to secure a more equitable adjustment of the burden of imperial taxation. Mr. White advocated a system of direct taxation as being more just and more expedient. We raised 20,000,000*l.* a year for local purposes by direct taxation, and he did not see why we could not do the same for the 60,000,000*l.* or 70,000,000*l.* required for imperial purposes. At present the working classes paid more than their fair share, and though our commerce and wealth had enormously increased, there was an appalling amount of poverty and destitution. The prevalence of infanticide proved this. In the eighteen months ending in June, 1862, no less than 921 children under two years of age were found dead in ditches, ponds, and other places, while the total number of children of the same age who during the same period met with untimely deaths was no less than 5,547. If all indirect taxation were abolished, there would be more employment for the people owing to the stimulus that would be given to trade. Mr. Gladstone did not deny that some improvements were desirable, but he thought a scheme of direct taxation impracticable. He agreed with the late Sir R. Peel that the direct taxes of this country for a time of peace had very nearly reached their furthest limit. He did not object to enquiry, but the enquiry proposed by Mr. White was too extensive. Mr. White withdrew his motion.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

On Thursday and Monday the House of Commons proceeded with the Army Estimates, and passed them. On the former day, in reply to General Peel, the Marquis of Hartington contended that the cost of the English soldier was about 90*l.* per annum, whilst that of the French soldier was about 45*l.* per annum. The difference would be reduced if the strength of the army was increased, but still the cost of the English would be much greater than that of the French soldier.

POOR DEBTORS.

On Friday, in the House of Lords, a Bill of great importance to the working classes was introduced by the Lord Chancellor, and read a first time. His Lordship said the imprisonment for debt was fearful in amount, and attended with most injurious consequences. In the two years ending December 31, 1863, 17,979 persons were committed to prison for a total number of 309,777 days, and the number of days they actually passed in prison was 253,860. Many men were imprisoned 'for sums of money as low as 1*s.* 6*d.*, 3*s.* 1*d.*, 1*s.* 10*d*, 2*s.* 9*d.*; and one person was committed to prison for several days for the sum of 9*d.*' Nearly all the debtors were artisans or agricultural labourers; and taking their average earnings at 3*s.* per diem per man, and multiplying this sum by the number of days spent in prison, it will be found that the amount of labour lost to the country in trying to bring about the payment of 62,438*l.* was 43,434*l.* His Lordship denounced the system of small credits, and maintained that the creditor had no right to imprison his debtor to the detriment of the country. At all events, before he does that he is bound to show that the debt was contracted under circumstances that gave him just cause of complaint. But there was a peculiar hardship in reference to the law of debtor and creditor for the poor man. In all other cases, except county-court commitments, after a man has been imprisoned, even for a few hours, it satisfies the debt; but in the case of the poor man summoned before a county court, he can be imprisoned over and over again for the same debt. [Men have been committed several times for a single debt of a few shillings owing to a baker or a butcher.] His Lordship then explained the provisions of his Bill. It entirely abrogates the present law. And under the new law, the judge will have the power of imprisonment only in case the debt is contracted by fraud, false pretences, or without reasonable expectation of ability to pay it; and the debtor will be liable to only one imprisonment for one debt—that is, as in the case of debts above 20*l.*, the imprisonment will satisfy them. The County Court Judge is to have the power to call together the creditors of a working man, fix the amount of dividend the insolvent can pay, order the payment to be made into court, and distribute it amongst the creditors. In that way there is some hope of restoring the poor man who has been involved in debt to a condition equal and corresponding to that in which the administration of the bankrupt and insolvent law has for a long period placed those who are in a better condition of life. The Bill provides that no action shall lie, or judgment be given, for a debt owing for ale and beer consumed in an alehouse or beershop, so that the publican shall not tempt the poor man by offers of credit to drink beyond his means. All debts under 20*l.* must be sued for, or judgment enforced, within one year from the time when the last item of the account was contracted or the last payment made. In seizures for debt, a certain amount of household furniture must be left, and tools shall not be taken so as to interfere with a man's calling. [Those who know something of the fearful manner in which the poorer classes in this country are oppressed by their creditors will appreciate the value of this Bill. If it becomes law, it will vastly ameliorate the condition of the working classes, and free them from the villanous petty traders who prey upon their wages.] The Lord Chancellor makes provision in his Bill for the distribution of the property left by poor men by the County Court Judge. At present, if any dispute arise, the only remedy is a reference to the Court of Chancery, which is far too costly a process for small properties.

PUBLIC HOUSES ON SUNDAY.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Somes asked for leave to introduce a Bill for closing public houses from eleven o'clock on Saturday night to six o'clock on Monday morning, except from one to two and from eight to nine P.M. on Sunday. After a brief debate, the House divided, and permission to introduce the Bill was refused by a majority of 36.

A NEW CRIME.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Hunt asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention had been called to the committal of a whole family for three weeks with hard labour for the crime of sleeping in a tent. The prisoners were seven gipsies—a mother and her children, the age of the youngest being only eight. The case had been tried on the 25th or 26th of March last at a place called Hayle, in Cornwall, and the prisoners had been sentenced by the Rev. Uriah Tonkin. He would also move, unless there were any objection to such a course, that the depositions should be laid upon the table of the House.

Sir G. Grey said that he had received no information respecting the case referred to by the hon. member. No application had been made to him by any of the parties concerned. If the hon. gentleman would give him the particulars, he would make enquiries, but he could not give any intimation as to what the result of those enquiries would be. It was probable that the prisoners were sentenced as vagrants.

The Rev. Uriah Tonkin has written to the Times to say that the family were punished for 'sleeping under tents, having no visible means of subsistence, and not giving a good account of themselves.' We know not which is the more remarkable—the Rev. Uriah's harshness, or his obtuseness in offering such a defence.]

The Poor Negro.—It is said that General Kilpatrick attributes the failure to capture Richmond wholly to the treachery of the negro guide hung by Dahlgren. The negro was perfectly familiar with the country west of Richmond, and was sent to Colonel Dahlgren from General Meade's head-quarters, with the note dated just previous to the departure of the expedition, and found on Dahlgren's person. It is believed that upon approaching Richmond the negro's cowardice induced him to direct the command above Goochland, with the view of avoiding a fight. And upon this mere suspicion the poor negro was hanged; but he was speedily and terribly avenged.

Slavery and the War.—As to the question of slavery, it has no more to do, constitutionally or legitimately, with the 'putting down of this rebellion,' than any other local property held under local law. Do our armies not destroy property of all kinds, from houses and horses to gold watches and finger-rings? Are houses 'the cause of this war?'—are horses the cause of the war?—are family trinkets, corn, cotton, flour, cattle, fences, and pigs the cause of the war? If not, why are they burnt, carried off, stolen, used up, 'liberated' from their owners, the same as negroes, if one is not as much the cause of the war as the other?—New York Daily News.

Presidential Manœuvres.—The friends of Mr. Lincoln are unreserved in denouncing the pretended withdrawal of Secretary Chase from the Presidential contest. They say the Chase programme now is to make a great fuss about Fremont and carry the fight into the Baltimore Convention on that issue. Then when the fight waxes hot and furious, they are to propose for the sake of harmony that a new man be taken up; and that new man is to be 'General Greenbacks.'—Washington Correspondent of New York Herald.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS: May 10.

THE speech of M. Thiers on Friday was a masterpiece of tact, playing with figures as agreeably as Mr. Gladstone ever did. He attacked the budget, its items, and the form in which it was presented. He complains that the monster which had two heads in his day, now has three. There were of old the ordinary and extraordinary budget, and now there is the special one. M. Thiers, who had disapproved, but had acquiesced in the first two divisions, when himself in office, is alarmed at the third. What cake, thinks he, will satisfy such a Cerberus? But he commands the attention of the Assembly because he declares that his 'voice is still for peace.' The other one, I think, said 'war,' but the meaning is the same. But while he spoke for peace, he declared that with less than 400,000 men under arms, and the power of increasing this force to 750,000 men in a few weeks, as a peace establishment, France cannot be safe; and so, with such ideas on the subject of the army, his strictures, which were confined to a few details, made little impression. He approved, as was to be expected, the expenditure on the navy. Passing from the National Budget, which was before the House, to the Budgets of the Towns, which were not under discussion, he made out a primâ facie case against the present mania for destruction and rebuilding, which was unquestionably the strongest feature in his speech. But as regards the Budget itself, his whole argument rested on a fallacy. In 1847, the Budget was sixty millions of francs in round numbers; why is it in 1864 about eighty-eight millions? That is, the earth stands still, and for him all financial Galileos cry out in vain 'and yet it moves.' Since 1847 even England has added some twenty millions to her budget, and what is the history of the budget in France? In 1806, Napoleon's normal budget, that which he considered sufficient in all times of peace, was twenty-four millions sterling. In '29, the Restoration had brought this up to thirty-eight millions, say forty, when M. Jacques Lafitte, who was preparing the overthrow of the dynasty, declared that such an enormous expenditure could result only in ruin. The revolution of which he was the tool, if not the author, exceeded this sum even in '31, and in '47 the budget of France had for several years been hard upon sixty millions. It is now eighty-eight millions, but some small expenses which did not formerly figure in the budget are now included in it. Thus the progressive increase of the last few years is by no means abnormal, while the wealth of the country has increased out of all proportion with the increased taxation. If in round numbers the forty millions which the government of Charles X. cost the country had become sixty millions in seventeen years, without any foreign war—that is, had been increased by one half—the sixty millions of '47 may well be 90 in '64, after two foreign wars, the annexation of Nice and Savoy, and many distant expeditions.

The Moniteur of this morning announces in a dry paragraph the suspension of hostilities for a month, so that there is no ground for the alarm with which the Débats would have inspired its readers when it declared yesterday that the rejection of the armistice would produce a general war 'unless England and France were decided to resign their position as great Powers.' But we are too well satisfied that the Dano-German quarrel is foreign to French interests to lend an ear to such vaticinations, and we find no lack in subjects to divert our attention from such political preoccupations. We have had M. Armand's appeal against the strange judgment of the Court of Aix, which, after he had been acquitted of any assault on his servant, condemned him to pay him twenty thousand francs, on the ground, I suppose, that it was in his cellar that Roux was discovered half-strangled. There are countries where all the persons found near a murdered man are arrested and required to prove their innocence; in some parts of India or China, a poor man who has a spite against a wealthy one sits down at his door and starves himself to death in the intention of making the other legally responsible. The Aix judges must have had some such notion, but the Court of Cassation did not appreciate this train of reasoning, and has quashed their judgment. The Armand affair has absorbed more than enough of public attention, and, of late, interest in it has flagged, notwithstanding the graceful tribute which the fashionable world paid to his popularity. The Armandine is the last new figure of the cotillon; it is danced with the hands tied behind the back with coloured ribbons.

A real cause célèbre commenced yesterday, and is likely to last at least through the week. Before this reaches your readers the name of Conty de la Pommerais will probably be familiar to them. As yet I can speak of the facts only from the indictment, which, as is usual in French law proceedings, is as dramatic and well worked-up a narrative as one of Balzac's novels. He is accused of being a homœopathic doctor, and this part of the indictment he does not deny, but it goes on to tell how he poisoned first his mother-in-law, and afterwards his ex-mistress, after he had insured the latter's life for a large sum. Judging, like James I., only from the allegations of the indictment, I should convict him with all the extenuating circumstances which the relations of the parties suggest, although, when his story is told, I may be equally ready to acquit him. It is, therefore, best to hold the prudent silence which is due to justice.

I fear it is not much to our credit that we are already tired of the Japanese embassy, especially since some of its members or servants have put themselves body and tail into European clothes, the tail being stuck under their coats. The Government has therefore determined to send them to see the ports, and has provided them with a steamer. The tone of the Emperor's answer to the speech of the First Ambassador on his presentation, is well adapted to the understanding of Asiatics, and deserves to be much admired.

The last brilliant successes in the South are welcomed here as likely to lead to an end of the struggle. The France says: 'It is certain that the South everywhere proves its superiority over the North, notwithstanding its numerical inferiority. It becomes daily more and more impossible to regard men who fight with such unexampled courage and energy as insurgents or rebels. It is evident that they are a people struggling for national independence.'

A VOLUNTEER NAVY.—We learn that the amount of capital already subscribed upon the books of the Virginia Volunteer Navy Company exceeds one million of dollars. The charter of the company authorises a maximum capital of $10,000,000, but operations will be commenced as soon as an amount sufficient for the inauguration of the enterprise has been subscribed and paid in. Ninety per cent. of the prize profits go to the company and crew, and ten per cent. to the Government.—Richmond Whig, April 15.

A SOUTHERN VIEW OF MISCEGENATION.

[From the Richmond Dispatch, April 14.]

THE Yankee project of commingling their breed with the African race is open to this dreadful objection—What will become of the Yankees?

We feel assured they have never weighed the awful consequences of such a catastrophe. The Yankee race blotted out of existence! They have threatened to exterminate the South, and behold, they are about to exterminate themselves! Alas! what will become of the cause of civilisation, of humanity, of progress, without Yankees? What will the world do for steam engines and wooden nutmegs, philanthropic associations and paper-soled shoes, and patent medicines, puritanism and pumpkin pies, cuteness and codfish, without Yankee Doodles?

Did that blessed Mayflower cross the wide ocean for such an end? Was Pilgrim Rock consecrated for such a superstructure? Did the saintly Pilgrim Fathers fit out slave-ships for the coast of Africa, and sell the cargoes to the South, with any idea that these sable heathens were to be united in wedlock to the descendants of the true believers? We wish that their grim old spectres could revisit the earth, and receive the due reward of their deeds in beholding the final result of their notable system for improving the morals, religion and politics of mankind.

It is not for us to complain of the great loss which mankind at large must suffer from the deprivation of Yankees. Three years of self-denial have enabled us to dispense with even such luxury as their companionship. We find that, by dint of manly fortitude and abstemiousness, we can manage to exist without Harper, Beecher, Greeley, Everett, or any of their works. But how can Yankeedom give itself up in this wholesale suicide, immolate the memory of its ancestry, and slaughter that 'manifest destiny' which was to appropriate the whole continent of America to the Yankee race?

The Confederacy can look with philosophical composure upon this tragical performance. We are not to be astonished at this time of day at any exhibition which Yankees may make. After all the atrocities and diablerie which for three years we have beheld and suffered, winding up in the effort to make a bonfire of a city of fifty thousand souls, we are not to be amazed by any new wickedness which Yankee ingenuity can invent. Having cohabited spiritually with the devil till their souls have become as black as the ace of spades, it is right and proper that they should adopt some process by which their bodies will approximate the complexion of their souls. Our only sympathy is with the sable medium of this national transformation. The polishing of Yankee boots, which has hitherto been their chief occupation in the free States, will now give place to the polishing of the entire Yankee nation, an achievement which no human power has yet been able to accomplish. A quarter of a century hence, the United States bids fair to be an empire of mulattoes, inheriting some improvement, perhaps, upon its abolition blood; but a sad depreciation of the African stock, which, in its lowest thraldom, was never so debased as when its 'rich currents' commingle with the vile spawn of Black Republicanism.

THE SOUTHERN PRESS ON THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

[From the Richmond Dispatch.]

THIS ridiculous doctrine—which never had the sanction of Mr. Monroe, and is, therefore, most improperly called by his name—was revived a few days since in the Yankee House of Representatives, and of all other men, by Mr. Henry Winter Davis, the man who probably has said more and bitterer things than all other persons combined, and who once wrote a foolish book, with a foolish title, to prove that Russia and the United States were to fight out the final battle of monarchy and republicanism on the soil of the Western Continent. It seems, however, that Mr. Davis is not prepared for any immediate step of a warlike nature. He does not propose that the Yankee Congress shall say in so many words to the Emperor of the French: You shall not establish a dependency of your empire in this hemisphere; if you do we will fling you and your soldiers into the sea. He only goes to the length of letting that ruler know that if he does so, the Yankee Congress will be very much displeased.

We wonder if the French Emperor did not know that before Mr. Davis took the trouble to assure him of it! We wonder if he is ignorant of what all the rest of the world has known and been commenting on for the last twenty-five years. We wonder if he is not aware that the universal Yankee nation has long fixed its greedy eyes upon Mexico—has long been looking forward to the day when it might find a pretext for making a meal of it, regrets the present war with the Confederacy chiefly because it has raised a lion in the path to the silver mines and gold beds of the dilapidated republic. We wonder if the French Emperor never reads the editorials of Yankee newspapers, or the speeches in the Yankee Congress, or has never heard of the 'Manifest Destiny' of the amiable and interesting Yankee people. If he has heard and read of all this, we suggest that he was well aware that the Yankee Congress would not take his movement kindly, and that Mr. Davis's motion is, therefore, an oath of supererogation, especially as it is not to be backed by any material thunder. The Yankee Congress is to 'protest,' and if that protest does no good it is to protest again. If Napoleon still turns a deaf ear, Mr. Davis will then follow the advice of Dogberry, and tell him, 'he is not the man he took him for.'

While this farce is in course of enactment at Washington, Mr. Dayton, in Paris, hastens to prostrate himself before Maximilian and declare the readiness of his Government to send a minister to Mexico, as well as to receeive a minister from her Whatever may be the real feeling of the Yankee Doodle upon the subject, and we doubt not that it was fully expressed by the resolution offered by Mr. Davis, their Government dare not hold back at such a crisis. The whole process through which it has been compelled to go from the beginning to the end, finds no parallel, except in the persistent resolution with which Fluellyn compels Ancient Pistol in the play to swallow the leek which he had to scoff at, though the badge of a brave and honourable nation, and Yankee Doodle has swallowed the leek 'with a vengeance!' He did not even wait for the Emperor of the French to resort to that last persuasive of obstinacy employed by the valiant Welchman, blows. He gaped and swallowed without waiting for the infliction of the cudgel, although he had rather have swallowed arsenic or prussic acid, or any other drug that most speedily divorces soul and body.

The 'Monroe Doctrine' is, from this time forth, an exploded humbug, and the Yankee nation will not rule from the St. Lawrence to Cape Horn. They might have thus ruled, had not the Confederate States forbidden it, and thus far the world owes them a debt of gratitude which it seems in no haste to pay.

The last foreign news announces the departure of the new Emperor of Mexico for his Mexican home and empire, on the 13th, i. e., to-morrow. As the reader is aware, from our paper yesterday, it has been stated by the London Globe that Mr. Slidell, our Commissioner to France, sought an interview with the Emperor while he was in Paris, which was 'courteously but firmly declined.' Very little attention need be paid to this statement. If true, it is of but little moment; but it is very doubtful. The recognition of the Emperor of Mexico is of small interest to us, except so far as it may involve that of the Emperor of France. Indeed, Maximilian stands more in need of our recognition than we do of his, though a polite bow from either to the other just now could confer no material advantage, and only give assurance of that sympathy and friendship which we all know must of necessity exist by force of circumstances. We all know that the power by whose aid alone Maximilian can become firmly seated on his throne is decidedly friendly to the Southern Confederacy, and that nothing will grow out of the Franco-Mexican policy that can be prejudicial to us.

Even the Yankees cannot chuckle over this bit of diplomatic rumour, as they know these facts as well as we. Moreover, they find enough in their own relations with Mexico to absorb their attention. If rumour, also from Paris, be correct, Mr. Dayton, United States Minister, has tendered to Maximilian amicable resolutions on the part of the United States with the Mexican monarchy, and this tender the Federal House of Representatives has just unanimously repudiated.

So the Confederacy is easy—has nothing to apprehend from Mexican relations—while the Yankees are neither easy nor inapprehensive on the subject.

NORTHERN COMMENT ON THE REPORTED MASSACRE AT FORT PILLOW.—Writing about this Abolition story, the Philadelphia Age observes: 'Large allowance must of course be made, in reading the reports of the capture of Fort Pillow, for the imaginative tendencies of Cairo correspondents, and the statement that a steamboat was hailed, and large numbers of wounded put on board, is not entirely consistent with the assertion that they were all murdered in cold blood; but even if the accounts were in every respect true, as the Abolition organs assume them to be, one cannot help thinking that it does not lie in their mouths to find fault with the conduct of the Confederates. Their patron saint planned an extensive insurrection, by which he hoped to massacre women and children by the hundred, and the only object aimed at in making soldiers out of the negroes was, that the slaves might be incited to outrage and murder the non-combatants, who were thought to be defenceless in their homes. This purpose was boldly avowed by the pet orators of the League; and Miss Anna Dickinson was never so jubilant as at the prospect of an outbreak on the part of the blacks. This scheme of rapine and devastation, however, has miscarried; and not only have the slaves failed to slay and ravish as had been hoped, but "the incarnate Confederates," as the telegraph calls them, seem abundantly competent to protect their wives and children against the "Black Regiments" poet Boker can find to sing about. That it is this fact which now so exasperates the philanthropic heart is unfortunately clear, not only from the avowals of their design in raising these regiments, but from the utter indifference which they show in reference to the mangling and killing of white men.' The Boston Courier remarks: 'It is not perhaps at all singular, that those disposed to make the most of the Fort Pillow affair against the rebels, are the philanthropic hearts, who think it positively treason to refuse to justify the proposed extermination of the whole body of inhabitants of the revolted States! Would it not be well for those persons to read anew the orders which Colonel Dahlgren proposed to have executed in Richmond, supposing he had effected entrance into that city? After much indignant denial of such atrocious purposes, those orders are now authenticated.'

THE RED RIVER RAID.—The New Orleans correspondent of the New York World says that in the route of General Banks's expedition, 'every mule, every horse, every ox, every cow, every hog, and every sheep have been driven off, and everything portable carried away from most plantations, and even the cabins of the negroes burnt up and their patches and chicken-coops robbed of all they contained. It is asserted here that it is all done by the Western men who were out with Sherman in his raid through Mississippi. How they acted there you may discover from the following statement in the Mobile Tribune of March 25:—"People from Mississippi say that it is painful to pass over the track of Sherman's Vandals. The newspaper account of the whipping of a lady is unquestionable. She is one of the most respectable of her sex—her husband a man of considerable wealth. They maltreated her shamefully, in such a way as one can hardly mention in print. The reason of this brutal act we have not heard. Probably, however, she could not suppress the expression of her 'treason' in the presence of these shameless scoundrels."'

THE TENDER MERCIES OF THE WICKED.—The Vicksburg correspondent of the New York Tribune gives the following account of the condition of the negroes torn from their homes by General Sherman in Mississippi:—'Some 3,000 slaves of all ages and colours reached here yesterday. It was one of the saddest spectacles witnessed for a long time in Vicksburg. The women and children were almost starved and half naked. Such a terrible picture of abject want and squalid misery can neither be imagined nor portrayed with pen. Many of the women and children were sick with fevers, brought on by the great fatigue and exposure of the long march from Meridian, Enterprise, Quitman, and other places. Will not the friends of freedom and the humane philanthropists of the North come forward at once, and with their generous hands rescue these liberated slaves from premature graves?' We learn from the Boston Courier of a later date that the suffering of these poor homeless wretches continued in all its intensity. No more political capital could be made out of them, and nothing was done to help them. They were free to perish.

Justice and mercy are characteristics of a civilised, humane, and christian people, but these are not qualities to be found in the Federal Administration, whether civil or military; and when this war ends, and the records of it are written, the pages of history will be stained with the narrative of some of the worst crimes that ever disgraced a nation.—Letter from an Englishman in Richmond.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1861, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

Subscription, 26s. per annum; post-paid, 30s.: payable in advance.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MAY 12, 1864.

The Recent Victories.

THE North must surely begin to feel its dream of conquest flitting away in the presence of the terrible reverses now telegraphed to Washington from almost every Southern State in which the Union flag has been planted. Hitherto it has been the boast of the Northern advocates that the progress of the Federals has been slow but sure—that wherever they have effected a footing they have maintained it—that, whether on the Rapidan or the Mississippi, in Tennessee or in Louisiana, they have never receded for any length of time—and that the end of the campaign has always found their outposts further advanced into the 'rebel' country. It would be easy to show that this boast is a hollow one, but it has a certain amount of truth in it. No doubt in many quarters the overwhelming numbers of the Northern armies have, by sheer weight, borne back the Confederates, and we will do the Yankees the justice to admit, that wherever they have gained half-a-dozen miles of territory they have, in a very short space of time, contrived by the use of the spade, which they handle better than the bayonet, to render them tolerably secure from attack. But, with the exception of the positions at Chattanooga and Knoxville, their outposts have been gained principally by the cooperation of a fleet, to which the South had nothing to oppose, so that, considering their immunity from attack, the boast is, after all, not a triumphant one. Now, however, at the beginning of the fourth year of the war, things are changed. The Confederates have everywhere taken the aggressive, and in quarters where for two years past every Confederate soldier has been a stranger and an outlaw, the Confederate flag is flying. BURFORD in Kentucky, and FORREST in Tennessee, have for weeks occupied large tracts of country without opposition. The latter has stormed Fort Pillow, one of the earliest acquisitions of the Union forces; and it is admitted by the New York press, that all the Federals can do is to watch him at a safe distance and pick up stragglers. At the latest date FORREST is reported to be retiring unmolested, with long trains of provisions and captured supplies, from Western Tennessee, to reappear, it is supposed, in increased strength, upon some unguarded point in SHERMAN'S communications. The Federals have made very little of the affair of Fort Pillow. They even affect to regard it as a sort of trap for the dispersion of the Confederate forces. But the last week has brought us the news of a similar disaster, on a much larger scale, nearer home. North Carolina was the scene of the earliest triumphs of Northern arms. The capture of Roanoke Island gave the Federals the command of Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds, and of all the adjacent coast of North Carolina. Their gunboats steamed up every inlet and river, and, one by one, all the important towns of the neighbourhood were occupied by their troops. Newbern, and Plymouth, and Washington (North Carolina), were among the first to fall, and they have been securely held until now. The advantages of the position were obvious. They obtained a firm footing in a State a portion of whose inhabitants were supposed to be of very doubtful allegiance to the Confederate authorities; they occupied an apparently unassailable base, whence, by a sudden movement, they might easily intercept the communications of Richmond with the South, and even direct a formidable attack upon the Southern capital. So much was this position valued that at one time nearly 50,000 Federal troops were concentrated there under General FOSTER, and even within the last six weeks it has been currently reported that an advance viâ Newbern formed part of General GRANT'S programme.

Suddenly and unexpectedly the Federals have been deprived of all the advantages they possessed in this quarter, and it is within the range of probability that, by the time these lines reach the public, they may have been compelled to evacuate North Carolina. It had been known for months that the Confederates had been collecting a small flotilla up the Roanoke river, and that they had in course of construction an iron-plated ram, with which an effort was to be made one day to drive the Federals out of Albemarle Sound. Another ram was said to be building up the Neuse river, with a view of effecting a junction with the sister craft, and making a dash at Plymouth and Newbern. The attack came off last month. About the 17th ult., a considerable land force drove in the Federal outposts round Plymouth, and planted batteries commanding the Federal fortifications. The Federals had placed obstructions in the river to prevent the descent of the rams, and had called up two or three powerful gunboats to assist in the defence. They could do nothing, however. One was sunk by a land battery; another was struck by the ram, pierced, and sunk within a few minutes. The rest of the squadron steamed off, with the ram leisurely pursuing them. We ought to mention that with the ram Albemarle was another vessel of ingenious construction called the 'Cotton Plant,' armed with light guns and rifles, a sort of tender to the ram, intended probably to prevent her from being carried by boarding. The Federal garrison, consisting of 2,500 men, made a gallant resistance for a time, but were compelled to surrender. The trophies of General HOKE, the Confederate commander, were thirty guns, many of them of large calibre, upwards of 2,000 prisoners, the fortifications and town of Plymouth, and a small steamer. But the most important gain is the command of Albemarle Sound. Whether the victory is to be followed up by a march upon Washington (North Carolina) or an attack upon Newbern, it is impossible to say. It is said that the object of the expedition is accomplished with the capture of Plymouth, that a Federal advance from North Carolina is now out of the question, and that HOKE'S forces will be held in readiness to reinforce LEE, if they are required. But we shall not be surprised to learn that Newbern is threatened, and that, as well for the diversion it would create, as for the prestige success would confer upon the Confederate arms, the attempt will be made to procure the complete evacuation of North Carolina.

The confirmation of BANKS'S decisive defeat in Louisiana will add to the confidence of the Confederate army. Notwithstanding the efforts of the Administration to conceal its severity, it is now beyond a doubt that the battle of Pleasant Hill has resulted in one of the most disgraceful reverses of the war. BANKS, who has never yet displayed the qualities of a general, has suffered the fate we have always predicted for him when he should encounter the Confederate commanders in Louisiana in anything like equal numbers. The issue seems never to have been in doubt. BANKS was led completely into a trap. His advance was made with as little precaution as if there had been no enemy in front; when the skirmishing began, his only tactics were to send regiment after regiment and brigade after brigade into the fight, without any attempt at forming a line. The consequence was the army was beaten in detail, and the remnant only saved by the determined stand of the rear of the army on some well-protected ground, and a retreat, or rather a flight, of forty miles in twenty-four hours. Correspondents describe it as a second Bull Run. Artillery, trains, treasure—all were lost, a fearful number of killed and wounded left upon the field, and 4,000 prisoners captured. To add to the disaster, the Red River fell, leaving a portion of the Federal flotilla unable to get up or down, and General BANKS was at the latest date entrenching himself at Grand Ecore on that river, the Confederate generals marching to attack him. The expedition to Shreveport is, of course, abandoned, and the problem is how BANKS is to reach New Orleans. We have yet, however, to receive the Confederate accounts of this great victory; when they reach us, we shall probably hear of such disasters to army, transports, and gunboats as have not yet been recorded during the war.

These reverses, though not bearing immediately upon the issue of the campaign, tell their tale. They reveal more clearly than ever the growing weakness of the North; they show that such concentration of strength as GRANT thinks necessary for the successful conduct of an advance against Richmond can only be obtained by dangerous reductions in other quarters; and they inspire but faint confidence in the judgment of the man to whom the North, as a last hope, has given the almost irresponsible control of its entire military resources.

Gold and Greenbacks.

THE United States is not the first nation that, at the beginning of a great war, has flattered itself with a brilliant, though unreal and shortlived vision of increased prosperity and growing wealth. Unless war bring disaster in its train, such is usually its first effect. It creates a new demand for capital and labour, long before it begins to impair that which peace had fostered; it enables a certain number of pushing men of business to make rapid fortunes; it stimulates certain trades and manufactures into preternatural activity; it raises the rate of wages and the rate of interest at the same time; it promotes for the moment a state of excitement in the markets, and increases the profits of those busy and noisy classes whose prosperity is taken to be the prosperity of the nation; and thus it happens that a nation which can protect its commerce and its frontiers generally imagines itself at first enriched by war. In the Northern States, another circumstance has contributed to the stimulation of commercial activity, and the creation of that semblance of prosperity which commercial activity involves—that is, the rapid increase of the currency by the issue of inconvertible paper to meet the necessities of the Government. While the currency increases, prices are of necessity constantly rising; and the inveterate habit of measuring value by price, and regarding money as its standard, prevents men from clearly realizing the fact that this increase of prices is a mere delusion. The sharp men who have money are eager to invest it in property whose value will endure after the crash which they know to be inevitable; the dull and thoughtless men who have property are tempted to dispose of it when they are offered twice as many dollars as they gave for it three or four years ago. In the meantime the fluctuations in value which the currency itself undergoes, and which, as the fortune of war has varied from time to time, have been in the United States peculiarly frequent and extreme—furnish employment to a host of speculators, and enable hundreds to rise in a few weeks from absolute poverty to affluence. The wealth so easily gained is lavishly spent—as lavishly as if the conditions under which it had been won would last, and as if the speculator would expect to make in future years the same income he has just been realising. Consequently the trades that minister to luxury and ostentation are very busy; the city assumes a gayer aspect than it wore during the brightest years of its peaceful and real prosperity; and we need not wonder that a people like the Americans, imagine that by some mysterious process war is really increasing their wealth, and set at nought the teachings of historical experience and the warnings of economical science.

Of course this state of things will not last. Our New York correspondent, in his last letter, gave a graphic account of the shock which a comparatively trifling occurrence had given to the insubstantial fabric of wealth founded on speculation and built of paper—a shock which ought to warn the sanguine believers in a war-begotten prosperity of the utter overthrow which is in store for them. By negotiating for temporary assistance from the Banks, Mr. CHASE so limited the means of the moneylenders as to bring dozens of speculators to ruin, and to send down stocks of all kinds by ten, twenty, or even forty per cent. By selling a certain quantity of gold from the Government coffers he sent down the value of that commodity so fast and so far as to reverse all the calculations of those speculators who were not in his secrets, and to reduce to poverty and to bankruptcy those who had made fortunes by judicious anticipation of the events of the war and their effect upon public feeling. Of course this stratagem was altogether disreputable; of course a Government has no right to rig the market in order to revenge itself on private individuals whose mode of doing business indicates distrust of its solvency: and if such a thing could occur in England it would consign the offender to total and ignominious exclusion from the councils of the Queen and the society of gentlemen. But it behoves the believers of the prosperity of the North to ask themselves what that prosperity is worth which a trick of this kind can so affect; what can be the foundation of that trade, that vast edifice of apparent wealth, which a Minister can shake to its foundations in a single morning; and what, if so slight a cause can produce such consternation and ruin so many fortunes, would be the effect of the financial revolution which would follow a serious disaster in the field, or a confession of Mr. Chase's inability to meet the obligations he has contracted. The hollowness of that fabric of seeming prosperity, over whose rapid creation the wiseacres of the Federal press are jubilant, has been clear from the first to all in Europe who are either scientifically or practically acquainted with the nature of a paper currency or the course of stock-exchange speculators. Recent events ought to make it apparent even to those who have helped to construct it, who have found shelter within it, and who are in daily peril of being crushed by its fall.

Mr. Chase's sales of gold, and of certificates receivable in payment of duties leviable in gold at the Custom-house, sent down for some time the premium on gold below its natural rate. This was to be expected; but effects obtained in this manner cannot last beyond the moment. The new supply of gold was speedily absorbed, and the market rose again nearly to that point from which Mr. Chase's violent interference had reduced it. After some fluctuations it stood at last at 181, making the paper dollar worth about 55 cents. It is possible that the effect of Mr. Chase's stratagem may be to make speculators more cautious, and bargains shorter, in fear of a repetition of such practices. But one effect it will have which the Minister, in his anxiety to take vengeance on the speculators, appears to have overlooked. A portion of the interest on the debt of the United States must be paid in gold; and the time will come when Mr. Chase will have to purchase back for this purpose the gold he has sold; and then he will do at least as much to raise the market as he has now done to lower it. The loss which the Treasury sustains by such operations is hardly worth mention. A Government which is spending 200,000,000*l.* a-year on devastating and plundering the South need not be chary of throwing away a million or two for the sake of revenge on the disaffected brokers of Wall Street. But Mr. Chase is not satisfied with so poor a vengeance as this. It is not enough for him to have ruined a number of speculators; he wants to put down speculation altogether. He proposes to make it penal for a man to buy gold, except to be delivered on the spot and for cash down: that is, to punish all speculators in the precious metals as our Plantagenet kings were wont to punish "forestallers and regrators" of provisions. The spirit which actuates him in this proposal is much the same as that which induced the French Government, during the Reign of Terror, to make it treason to refuse to accept assignats at their nominal value in all transactions. The Federal Government thinks, as Robespierre thought, that it is disloyal to prefer gold and silver to a currency which derives its value from the sanction of the Executive: and Mr. Chase, following the French anarchs at a humble distance, as he and his colleagues have done throughout, substitutes for the guillotine the milder method of fine and imprisonment. Of course, it is as impossible to keep up in this way the value of greenbacks as it was found to prevent the rapid depreciation and final demonetisation of the assignats. It may or may not be possible to interrupt the regular course of business, and put down the open practice of speculation in gold; but the only result would be to make the fluctuations more frequent, more violent, and more mischievous.

It argues a strange blindness in so astute a financier that Mr. Chase should attribute to the malice of speculation the impossibility of maintaining at a uniform value a currency which is perpetually increasing in quantity. Of late the issues of greenbacks have been at the rate of ten millions sterling per month; and the amount now floating is not less than 130,000,000*l.*, besides some 45,000,000*l.* of other inconvertible paper money. This is a sum so very much larger than the business of the country can possibly require, that the only matter of surprise is that the paper dollar should be worth so much as 55 cents. That it will continue to depreciate, and that with increased rapidity, whatever may be done to prevent, puzzle, or punish speculation, is absolutely certain. Over-issue and depreciation act and react upon each other. As the Government issues more paper to meet its expenses, the value of the paper falls; as the value falls, larger and larger sums are required to meet the expenditure of the Government. What can be done by the issue of loans and the conversion of currency, Mr. Chase will be wise to do; but it seems quite clear that he must continue for the present to issue some 10,000,000*l.* of paper money every month, and that if he does so, the price of gold will continue to rise, and even more rapidly than it has risen during the winter. Unless the expenditure of the Government can be defrayed by some other means, the fate of the French assignats will be that of American greenbacks.

Mr. Chase himself is not unaware of this. A currency of 175,000,000*l.*—a debt, apart from currency, of about two hundred millions sterling, besides unfunded obligations to between a tenth and a fifth of that amount—an expenditure, at the nominal value of paper, of 200,000,000*l.* a-year—these are the facts that stare him in the face. If the progress of depreciation is to be checked—if a commercial crash is to be averted—if, in a word, the Government is to remain solvent for any considerable period, it is plain even to Mr. Chase that a large proportion—he says one-half—of the expenditure of the year must be met by taxation. The rest he supposes himself able to borrow, if credit and confidence could be restored by the exhibition of a revenue equal to one-half the yearly expenditure of the Union raised by taxation within the year. That is, to save themselves from commercial ruin and national bankruptcy, the people of the United States must submit to raise by taxation nominally 100,000,000*l.*, but really about 55,000,000*l.* sterling.

At first sight, to a European observer, this does not seem altogether a hopeless undertaking. The United States are rich and prosperous; as rich, probably, man for man, as any country in Europe except Great Britain, and wealth is much more evenly diffused among the people than in European countries. Great Britain, with a population of 30,000,000, has raised as much as seventy millions annually; and it does not seem quite impossible for the United States, with a population of 20,000,000, to raise four-fifths of that amount. But, in the first place, we must remember that the Federal taxes, in America, are but a portion of the public burdens; that the States and cities also impose a heavy direct taxation for purposes of internal government and municipal administration; and that this must be added to the sums demanded by the Federal treasury in any comparison instituted between American and European taxation. Taking this into account, it would seem that to levy 55,000,000*l.* for Federal purposes, the total taxation per head would have to be very nearly twice as high as in England. Again, we have to consider not merely the total amount of taxable wealth, but also the manner in which it is to be reached. In this point of view, the States are a peculiarly untaxable country. The income-tax has proved a dead failure. The Customs serve protective rather than revenue purposes; and can never yield a large revenue in a country which produces at home so large a part of its consumption. Direct taxes would be of necessity the sole resort; they would be very expensive in collection, and very oppressive to the payer; and to raise by a property-tax or other direct impost even 30*s.* per head of the population (30,000,000*l.*), would be a most painful operation. We do not, therefore, entertain any belief in the success of this, Mr. Chase's last scheme of financial redemption. We believe that he will be obliged to go on trusting in fortune and issuing paper: that the depreciation will continue and increase, and that ere long the Federal Government will find itself on the verge of bankruptcy, and Wall Street on the point of absolute ruin.

It does not follow that the North should be forced to abandon the war. The example of the South has shown that it is possible for a nation to pass through this very ordeal, and to come out of it with financial honour unstained and with national strength unimpaired. The ruin which suspends over the commercial classes of the North overwhelmed those of the South within a year after the outbreak of the war. That lowest depth of depreciation to which the Federal currency is slowly sinking was reached by the currency of the South before the end of 1863. Yet the South has sustained her courage, has contrived to restore her finances, and enters upon a fourth year of warfare with more hope, strength, and confidence than she has ever before displayed. The North, with greater resources, and being yet at some distance from that gulf out of which her rival has struggled, may save and retrieve herself, if she be prepared to make such sacrifices as the South has made—if she will endure for the lust of empire all that the South has borne for the love of independence. But if she will not do this; if she be not ready to sacrifice her commercial interests, to undergo a grinding taxation, to suffer a searching investigation into her state, and to apply the severe remedies which it requires—if she have not the courage to postpone everything else to the gratification of her vindictive passion—she is approaching a crisis which will sorely try her resolution, and which may possibly bring about a considerable change in the sentiment of a people who have hitherto shown themselves much more ready to sacrifice others than themselves at the shrine of a false patriotism and an evil ambition.

The Confederate Navy.

This war has disabused Englishmen of a good many strange delusions concerning the condition of the Southern States and the character of their people. It was a common idea, in 1860, that the planters of the Cotton States were a degenerate race, scarcely superior to the Mexicans and infinitely inferior to the freemen of the North both in moral and physical vigour; that the negroes were a suffering, discontented, oppressed race, sighing after the freedom of which they had been robbed, and ready at a moment's warning to rise in murderous revolt; and that the majority of the white population—all those who did not hold slaves—were in a state of ignorance and degradation hardly to be paralleled in Europe. The boasts of the North, that its armies would in ninety days crush the rebellion and overrun the South, were, by a certain number of English readers, thought not altogether absurd, or were ridiculed rather on geographical than on moral grounds. The events of the war—the fidelity of the negroes, the superiority of the Southern soldiery, the disciplined courage of the troops, the steadfast endurance of the people, the maintenance of law, order, and liberty in the midst of a struggle for national existence, the intelligent devotion of all classes of the population to the common cause—have dispelled most of these absurd misconceptions. Here and there an Abolitionist fanatic, who has read nothing on American affairs that did not bear the imprimatur of the Federal Government, and takes his ideas in equal proportion from Mr. J. E. Cairnes and Mrs. H. B. Stowe, is found still to believe in roasted negroes and to talk of 'mean whites;' but the sane portion of the English public has forgotten that it ever believed such nonsense, and has recognised in the Southerners a kindred people, English in blood and character, in virtues and in principles—a race surpassed by none in chivalric courage, in heroic endurance, in devoted patriotism, and as different from the effeminate and indolent sensualists painted by 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' as Englishmen from Greeks, or Danes from Neapolitans. Still, we are not sure that there is not a lingering trace of the old delusions in the idea of the Southern character at present popular among us, and suspect that Englishmen have very little idea indeed of the busy, energetic, striving life of a planter in the Cotton States. And we are sure that, in spite of the notices which have from time to time appeared in the press concerning the development of manufactures connected with the war in various parts of the Confederacy, there is an impression abroad in England that the South has been indebted for the means of carrying on the war—for arms, ammunition, and clothing—almost entirely to English blockade-runners. This impression is altogether inaccurate. It is true that during the lull which followed the Battle of Manassas Junction, in June 1861, while as yet the blockade was extremely inefficient, the Confederate Government had the forethought to introduce from Europe a quantity of arms and stores to meet the immediate needs of the next campaign. But at the same time the President and his Ministers were busying themselves in establishing manufactories of every kind to supply their own wants in future, and it is on these that they have chiefly depended. The Southern armies have taken far more rifles and cartridges from the enemy than they have obtained from England; and they have supplied themselves with munitions of war in a manner and to an extent perfectly astounding when we remember in what condition they were when the war broke out.

They had been accustomed to employ their whole labour in the production of food or of articles for export. They had scarcely a factory for weaving cloth or cotton; and, except among the small farmers, those domestic manufactures which thirty years ago had been practised in almost every household had gone entirely out of use. They had imported everything they required—clothing, shoes, arms, iron, sulphur, saltpetre, powder, the necessaries of life and the necessaries of war. The Government, foreseeing at the outset the long duration of the struggle, set itself diligently to work to provide all these things at home, and it was energetically seconded by the inventive genius of the people. The South had iron in abundance, but no practical iron-miners, and no iron mines. Science was made to supply the place of practice, and iron mines were opened and worked, which are supplying the railroads as well as the Government. Foundries were established where as yet no iron had ever come but in a finished state from abroad; and, till the mines should supply them sufficiently, all the old iron that could be found was collected for their use. Factories, cotton and woollen, have been enlarged, to clothe the negroes and the army. Southern ingenuity has obtained sulphur from the copper mines, and salt from the floors of the smoke-houses where hogs were formerly cured with imported salt and saltpetre; and powder mills have been established, whose machinery, from first to last, had to be made in the South. Guns have been cast, and Southern forts and field batteries are armed with home-made cannon, where they have not been provided by the spoils of the enemy. Such proofs of ingenuity and skill in invention and adaptation no people ever gave before; for no people of Anglo-Saxon race, accustomed to the shifts and enterprises of a half-peopled country, and having their wits sharpened, and their hands taught to turn to everything by a quasi-colonial life, were ever before subjected to so stern and sudden a necessity.

Mr. Gladstone, in giving to the Southern President the praise which is his due, and expressing the sentiment of respect and admiration which nearly all English gentlemen entertain for Jefferson Davis, remarked that the leader of the Southern people had made an army, was making a navy, and had succeeded in making a nation. The second clause gave offence to some English critics, who know of no Confederate navy except that which has been purchased—as Sir R. Palmer affirms, illegally purchased—in England. This is a common mistake; but it is one which reflects no great credit on the memory of those who make it. We should be as reluctant as any one to detract from the merits of Capt. Semmes and Capt. Maffit. The Alabama, the Florida, and the Georgia have done a dangerous and disagreeable duty with wonderful energy, skill, and tact; they have inflicted severe injury on Northern commerce, and done something to revenge the sufferings of their country. But so did the Sumter and the Nashville, which sailed from Southern ports. And there are Southern vessels which have had an opportunity of rendering service and achieving glory altogether denied to mere cruisers. The Virginia destroyed two Federal men-of-war, and sustained a combat on equal terms with the Monitor. The Arkansas defeated and scattered a Federal squadron in the Mississippi. The rams which are still lying in Charleston harbour once beat off the blockading squadron, and opened the port for twenty-four hours. Another ram has just sunk two Federal gunboats and kept a flotilla of transports at bay, thus intercepting the enemy's succours, and contributing materially to the capture of Plymouth, N. C. Her consort, a floating battery carrying sharp-shooters, seems also to have done terrible execution. The injuries which Federal vessels have received from torpedoes are another remarkable feature in this war. These vessels, as employed by the South, are an entirely new weapon of naval warfare, and promise, when practice has made them more efficient and more manageable, and remedied the defects which at present interfere with their complete success, to be a most formidable one.

There are now in various Confederate ports, and at points on the inland waters of the South, ironclad vessels as formidable as those which rendered such good service to their country, and spread so much terror and dismay among the enemy, at Hampton Roads and at Plymouth. It may be that they are very much inferior to the wonderfully powerful vessels which constitute the chief naval strength of England and France, nor do they seem to be intended for ocean service. But, considering that they are built by a nation which had to begin with no military dockyards, and scarcely a building yard of any kind; which had been used to import its iron and purchase its ships, and which has had no opportunity of profiting by the experiments and examples of Europe; considering that they are intended for the defence of ports and of inland waters; that they have gained repeated victories, and sustained only one total defeat, due to the overwhelming weight of the enemy's broadside; we must say that the existence of a navy of this kind reflects no little credit on the inventive skill and energy of the Southern people, and on the resolution and enterprise of their Government. They might well have despaired of having a navy, and contented themselves with the effort to resist their enemy on shore. Russia, much less seriously overmatched, did this when assailed by France and England: she sank her ships, and confined herself to a defence by land. The Confederate States, encouraged by statesmen who have let slip no chance of benefiting their country or striking a blow at the enemy, have contrived to keep the sea with their every port blockaded, and at home they have prepared for a naval contest against such odds as never before were encountered as patiently and diligently, adapting their ships to the conditions of the conflict, and waiting the time when they shall be strong enough to engage with a reasonable prospect of success. That time seems now to be approaching. Report affirms that some thirty-five ironclad vessels, of one sort or another, are ready for active operations in the various harbours and rivers of the Confederacy. They are manned by seamen whom those of England might be proud to greet as brothers, and commanded by the best officers of the late navy of the United States—among others, by the American officer who remembered, when English lives were in danger, that blood is thicker than water. In their construction, we cannot doubt that the defects of the Virginia will have been repaired. The campaign of 1864 has opened with the fairest auguries for the success of the Confederate army; and it is no small element in the calculation of its probable issue, that for the first time the Confederates have a navy to bear its part in the struggle.

Monarchy in the New World.

The common idea of Europe has been that the statesmen of the American Revolution adopted the system of a Federation of democratic Republics from a firm conviction that it was the best and wisest of all forms of government — the one prescribed by Nature, and only postponed by the selfish and corrupt ambition of nobles and princes; and that the great and unexampled wealth and progress which America had enjoyed, the diffusion of prosperity among all classes, the absence alike of enormous estates and of grinding poverty—all that favourably distinguished the condition of the United States from that of European countries—was due to that form of government. And this delusion is probably as prevalent in America as in Europe. Yet it would scarcely be possible to misread more grossly alike the records of the past and the phenomena of the present. It certainly is not true that Washington and Hamilton were democrats, whatever Jefferson might be. It is not true that the original form of the Constitution of any of the older States was properly democratic; it is certain that none of the fathers of the Union dreamed of a democracy where the reins of government are in the hands of a landless, half-pauperised, foreign-born proletariate; and certain that if Washington or Hamilton had conceived of such a thing, they would have taken every precaution in their power to provide against it. It is not even true that they deliberately chose a Republican form of government because they believed it to be the purest and best of all. On that point opinions were divided. But the fact was that they had simply no choice about the matter. Nothing but a Republic was possible under the circumstances of the United States. The revolt against the English Crown, spontaneously commenced, and assuming larger proportions by degrees, naturally developed in each colony a Republican government, and formed the colonies into a defensive confederation. Nor was there at the command of the Convention any material out of which a monarchy could be constructed. No monarch could have been named who would have had any natural hold on the affections and reverence of the people, unless it had been Washington; and even Washington, as one of the people, would hardly have seemed to stand so high above them as undisputably to wear a crown. Again, there was no class which could be or become an hereditary nobility; and without an hereditary nobility no monarchy has yet been able to stand. Driven back upon Republicanism, the States were also forced to adopt a very liberal form of franchise, and to exclude no freeholder from citizenship; but, as yet, those principles which have become ingrained in the political faith of America, and have placed the newly-arrived Irish labourer on a level with the chief merchants of New York and Boston, had not prevailed, and in every State a qualification was required. Thus, in the best days of the American Republics, the States were not democracies in the modern sense of the word. And most assuredly the Federal form was not adopted by choice, but simply because all that was permitted to the Convention was to form a Confederacy. The States would not part with their perfect independence and individual sovereignty, and it was impossible to merge them in a single Republic under one central and sovereign power. Thus it appears that those peculiarities which have been extolled as the fruit of the highest political wisdom on the part of the founders of the Union were essential conditions of their task, or faults which they fain would have avoided—so completely has American history been mistaught.

A delusion quite as extravagant is that which ascribes to democracy and to Federalism the prosperity of the American people. That prosperity — that even diffusion of wealth — that general possession of independent means—belongs to their colonial, not to their imperial condition; it arose in their earliest days from the same cause which has hitherto sustained it—the abundance of land and the immense value of labour. Where every man can buy good land for a dollar and a quarter per acre, and where every man can earn, by two years' labour, the price of a farm, it is clear that no man who is willing to work need remain poor; and whether the United States be governed by martial law or by universal suffrage, so long as the fruits of industry are secured to the labourer, the people of the United States will be a people consisting chiefly of small farmers farming their own land, until all the available land be taken into cultivation. Wherever there is plenty of land and scarcity of labour, there, under any government under which property is safe, grow up necessarily great prosperity and great social equality. So far from these blessings being the fruit of democratic institutions, it is these that have brought democracy into the States and made its working there possible. It was because all classes stood on a tolerably equal footing in the Northern States, that those States found it impossible and undesirable to maintain in political rights distinctions which had no root in social circumstances. You cannot have an aristocratic government in a country where all men are tolerably equal in means and education, where there are no hereditary fortunes, and where the man who is poor to-day may, if he will but display ordinary talent and more than ordinary energy, be in ten years independent, and in twenty years rich. It was not, we repeat, democratic government that diffused wealth among the people: it was the diffusion of wealth that made democratic government inevitable.

This being the case, it is clear that no mistake could be greater than to conclude that institutions which have worked tolerably well in a country where no natural distinction of classes exists would work well where such distinctions are great and strongly marked. Constitutions must be the growth of social conditions if they are to have in them any germ of stability. Where social equality exists, political distinctions would be purely artificial, and therefore utterly unstable. Where equality is excluded from social conditions, it cannot be artificially maintained in political institutions except by the expedient to which all nations which have tried the experiment have been brought—that of a despotism reducing all classes to the political level natural to the lowest. You can keep down a class below that level of political rights for which it is fitted; you cannot raise it above them; and, therefore, if you are to maintain political equality among classes widely unequal in fortune, education, and independence, it must be by depressing the highest to servitude, not by elevating the lowest to self-government.

It should not be forgotten that the Americans themselves have practically shown their consciousness of this truth in its most obvious application—in the case of distinct races. Without discussing at this point the question whether or not, through the education of generations, and by a gradual extension of personal, civil, and political rights, the negro can be brought up to the level of the white man, no question exists of his present vast inferiority. To make him the free citizen of a free country, equal with the white man, would be to carry out logically that principle of political equality which European democrats deduce from American precedents. If this had been done, and successfully done, then we should have had an instance of political equality enforced in a case of social inequality. But this has not been done. In no State wherein the negroes are present in force have they ever been admitted to any political privileges. From every State which has given them civil freedom they have been as far as possible deported. In spite of political theory, the political instincts of America have recognised the falsehood of that which is supposed in Europe to be the American principle of democracy; and in the one case in which there exists in the late United States a real and marked social distinction of classes, such as is the natural condition of European society, the application of the doctrine of political equality has been carefully eschewed. Even, therefore, if the example of the United States were one to be quoted with satisfaction by the democratic philosopher, it tells against, and not in favour of, the application of his principles to cases in which a great and marked social separation of classes exists.

America, however, furnishes one example to his hand; an instance in which an endeavour has been made to build up a structure of political equality on a basis of social distinction—an artificial democracy resting on a natural hierarchy of classes. The history, the character, the population of Mexico were as utterly different as possible from those of the United States. In climate and soil, indeed, Mexico had the advantage, as she has the advantage of every country on the face of the earth. She has the richest territory that exists in the world; she has a climate varying from that of Southern India to that of Northern Italy, but, situate as she is between the two oceans—a country of snow-capped mountains in the tropics—she has less to suffer from extreme heat than the one, and less to endure from cold than the other. She can grow everything—rice and bananas, coffee and sugar, tea and cotton, wheat, maize, and barley. She has silver mines of unrivalled richness and unlimited extent. But she had not, like the British colonies, a training in self-government, nor an English ancestry, nor a homogeneous people. Her native inhabitants had been excluded from all share in the offices of government, and but one-sixth of them were of European blood. That sixth were Spanish by extraction; they came of a race courageous in war, but unused either to political freedom or to reverence for law; the rest were half-castes and Indians. The example of the United States made Mexico first a Republic, and then a Federal Republic, both arrangements taking their rise not in her natural circumstances, but in the desire to imitate her powerful and prosperous neighbour. What has been the consequence? Anarchy that has plunged the wealthiest regions of the earth into abject poverty; anarchy that has made cowards of the Spaniards, and robbers and banditti of all classes; anarchy that has driven foreign capital and enterprise from the country, that has degraded, demoralised, pauperised the natives, and made a hell on earth of what Nature meant for an earthly Paradise. We need look no further than Mexico to learn the folly of those who dream of emulating the peculiar prosperity of the United States by borrowing their institutions, and conceive that Federalism and universal suffrage contain in themselves some hidden virtue capable of redressing the evils inherent in national character or incident to national circumstances, of fusing distinct classes and diverse races, and making the wages of labour as high in densely-peopled Europe as in those vast American States where half the cultivable land is yet without an owner. Mexico under Spanish misgovernment pottered on in tolerable comfort; Mexico under a central Republican government sank lower and lower every year; Mexico under a Federal system has reached the lowest depth of misery at which a civilised people ever retained their national existence, and at length welcomes the footsteps of a conqueror, and places all her hope of recovery in the advent of a monarch of the House of Hapsburg—the representative of the European idea of hereditary monarchy. True, the circumstances of Mexico were exceptionally unfavourable to the Federal and democratic experiment, as those of the United States were exceptionally favourable. We do not apprehend that under any system of government England or France could sink to the Mexican level. But, nevertheless, the Mexican lesson is that which it behoves us most attentively to mark and to digest—which teaches us that Republicanism has no more chance than monarchy to root itself in an uncongenial soil and unpropitious climate; that to force political equality upon a community composed of social strata distinctly and naturally separate and subordinated, is to doom that community to convulsions which can only result in chronic anarchy or all-levelling despotism. The example of the United States alone seduced Mexico into an experiment of Republicanism for which she was totally unfitted, and into Federative Republicanism, which, in her case, unlike that of the United States, was purely artificial. The experiment has ended where it commenced, and she has now returned to the only form of government which is suited to the habits and traditions of her populations, and therefore the only one in which order can be consistent with individual liberty.

RAILROADS IN THE SOUTH.—The Baltimore correspondent of the New York World writes: 'The road from Danville, in Virginia, to Greenborough, in North Carolina, was completed a few months ago; and the rolling-stock was placed on it a few weeks before my informant left Virginia. Railroad iron is now manufactured at no less than eight different places in the South. The Tredegar Iron Works at Richmond (which the Abolition newspapers of the North removed to Alabama some months ago) has been engaged day and night for two months past in the manufacture of bars of railroad iron for a new railroad in Georgia. The other places where railroad iron is made are at Charleston, Raleigh, Lynchburg, Danville, Fayetteville in North Carolina, Rome, and Atlanta. At Macon, in Georgia, and also at Atlanta, locomotives have been built for more than two years past. During the last six months a large number of skilled machinists from Scotland have arrived at these two places, and locomotives are turned out now more rapidly than heretofore. They are at work on nearly all the Southern roads, and are said to work as well as those formerly brought from the North. Passenger cars and freight cars are now being built at Savannah, Fayetteville, Greensborough, and at other two points in Georgia. The cars are sadly deficient in the painting and gilding and ornamental work that distinguishes the passenger cars on the Northern railroads. But in point of strength and substantial comfort they are said to be all that could be desired.'

THE LATE MRS. GENERAL BEAUREGARD.—A grand requiem high mass for the repose of the soul of Caroline Deslondes, the lately deceased wife of General Beauregard, was celebrated at Mobile on April 7.

THE MALLORY REPORT FORGERY.

THE following is the correspondence briefly referred to by the Attorney-General, Sir Roundell Palmer, in the House of Commons, May 5:

Confederate States of America,
Navy Department, Richmond, March 10, 1864.

Sir,—My attention having been called to the debate in the House of Commons of Tuesday the 23rd ultimo, and to the paper introduced by you on that occasion, and read to the House as an authentic 'report of the Secretary of the Confederate Navy to his Congress,' I deem it proper to inform you that the paper in question is a forgery.

As you have thus inadvertently been misled into lending the authority of your name to a paper fabricated by the enemies of my country for purposes too obvious to require explanation, I confidently appeal to your own sense of justice and propriety for the correction of your mistake with the same publicity as was given to the erroneous assertion.

With great respect, I have the honour to be
Your obedient servant,
(Signed) S. R. MALLORY.
Sec. Navy, C. S. A.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Attorney-General, &c. &c.

6 Portland Place, W. London, May 4, 1864.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 10th March, which I propose, with the permission of the House, to read on an early day in the House of Commons.

In so doing I shall only repeat, on higher authority than before, the acknowledgment of an error, which I regret having been led into by circumstances which seemed to myself (in common with others) to give credit to the document, since ascertained (and now authoritatively stated by yourself) to be a forgery.

Thanking you for the courtesy of your communication,
I remain, Sir, with much respect,
Your very obedient servant,
(Signed) ROUNDELL PALMER.

The Hon. S. R. Mallory, &c. &c.

THE QUARTERLIES.

THE April number of the Quarterly Review contains three articles of special interest for our readers. The first is entitled, 'The Prospects of the Confederates.' It is a very readable article. It deals with a multitude of very interesting and very important facts, and it contains some information altogether new both to ourselves and to our readers, though it deals much more extensively with the past than with the future, and Southern prospects occupy comparatively a small part of the writer's space and attention. As to the relative positions of the two belligerents, and the probabilities of the ensuing campaign, we find the following very just and sensible passage:—

'Secondly, let it not be forgotten that the combatants advance to this fourth and (as seems likely) deadliest collision under circumstances of greater equality than have heretofore existed. It is idle to pretend that the Federals have 500,000 effectives, or anything like it, now under arms. It is not denied at Washington that there are at least 250,000 Confederates in the field, and to this number, without exceeding the truth, might be added 50,000 more. It is hardly necessary to state that in cannon, small arms, and gunpowder, the Confederates are now as well found as their opponents. Bearing these facts in mind, the reader will understand the force of the following passage in President Davis's recent address to the Confederate soldiers:—

'"The enemy's campaign of 1864 must, from the exhaustion of his resources of men and money, be far less formidable than those of the last two years, when unimpaired means were used with boundless prodigality, and with results which are suggested by the mention of the names of Shiloh, Perryville, Murfreesboro', and the Chickahominy, Manassas, Fredericsburg, and Chancellorsville."'

In his estimate of the past history of the war—the extreme difficulties with which the Confederate Government had to contend—the mischievous effect of that period of triumphant security which followed the victory of Bull Run—the manner in which the Federals wasted their enormous resources—the extravagant caution displayed by their best general, M'Clellan—the gradual approach of the combatants to equality—the vast superiority in numbers which failed to achieve victory for the North at Antietam and Chancellorsville—the writer is at once sound and original. The curious anecdote which he contributes to the secret history of the first campaign in Maryland, showing how it happened that, several days before the battle of Sharpsburg, General Lee's orders for that battle were in M'Clellan's hands, is certainly deserving of notice, if not of implicit credence. And we are glad to find that the writer has rendered justice to a statesman who has been very much abused, and who has not obtained a fair share of that credit which, as the second personage in the Southern Government, he is justly entitled to divide with his chief and colleagues. We ought not to pass unnoticed the collection of documentary evidence by which the reviewer establishes, out of the mouths of Abolitionist witnesses, the infamous maltreatment and neglect of the negroes by their pretended liberators—maltreatment and neglect under which the unhappy human prey of the Northern marauders have perished, and are perishing, by tens, by hundreds, and by thousands, in the outskirts of the camp, or in the plantations whereon they have been re-enslaved to harder taskmasters than they ever encountered in their lives before. The article is carefully and scrupulously accurate; its estimates of books, men, and things are for the most part exceedingly just. Perhaps, however, the writer has hardly done full justice to General M'Clellan. In censuring that officer for over-caution, account should be taken of the quality of the troops whom he led. A European officer commanding an army of Hindoos would be warranted in displaying a caution wholly without relation to comparative numbers, if he found himself opposed by English soldiers. General M'Clellan had been made aware of the infinite inferiority of his mercenaries to the Confederate volunteers, and there can be no doubt that this knowledge had much to do with his determination not to be tempted by any disparity of numbers to expose himself to a crushing blow from such an antagonist as Lee—a blow which would, perhaps, be easily endured and returned by French or English troops, but which would have proved fatal to his demoralised and half-disciplined soldiery. At Antietam, moreover, it should not be forgotten that he commanded runaways who had been tremendously beaten, despite all advantage of numbers and artillery, by the very troops they there encountered, and who needed all the encouragement that overwhelming force and the conviction of the presence of strong reserves could give them. Had M'Clellan commanded a disciplined army of foreign soldiers, he would hardly have thought it necessary to employ that extreme caution which has afforded so much matter for newspaper criticism, and which, after all, did not suffice to save him from one crushing disaster.

Another article treats of the Empire of Mexico, which the writer, in common with all Englishmen who do not look at the subject through spectacles supplied by the Government and press of the United States, regards with exultation and with hope. This paper contains one of the best and most succinct sketches of the past history of Mexico—of her wealth and her poverty, of the errors that have made her the most miserable among nations, and of the gifts which, under any decent Government, should make her the most prosperous.

A third article reviews at length the foreign policy of Lord Palmerston's Government—the acts of high-handed violence against the weak and submissive concession to the strong which have distinguished Lord Russell's administration of the Foreign Office. First, there was the quarrel with Brazil. A ship had been wrecked on the Brazilian coast, in one of the wildest portions of that vast and half-peopled empire. It was said, but not proved, nor was any evidence offered to show, that the crew had been murdered: the coroner's inquest found a verdict of 'found drowned.' It was said, but not proved, nor was any evidence offered to show, that the wreck had been plundered. The Brazilian Government caused enquiries to be made. Lord Russell was not satisfied; he demanded that Brazil should reimburse the owners for the ship and cargo; he used violence, and Brazil yielded to violence and paid under protest. There was another ground of quarrel. Three officers from Her Majesty's ship Forte went ashore to dine. Returning home in a state of great exhilaration, they were taken up for assaulting the police, and being in mufti were locked up. As the offenders could speak no Portuguese, and the police could speak no English, it is possible that misunderstandings had arisen, and that neither party was so much in the wrong as the other supposed. Lord Russell chose to treat the arrest of the three jovial gentlemen in plain clothes as an outrage on the British flag which they did not carry, and on the British uniform which they did not wear, and demanded the punishment of all concerned in the arrest. The matter was referred to the arbitration of the King of the Belgians, who pronounced Lord Russell utterly in the wrong. But the noble Lord has made no apology or amends, and diplomatic relations with Brazil are still suspended. Per contra, two instances are cited in which British subjects were imprisoned by the Federal Government, without show of law or reason, for acts done not on American but on British soil, and detained not for hours but for months—released only after the exaction of unlawful oaths, and at the good pleasure of Mr. Seward—in which Lord Russell demanded no indemnity or redress whatever; avowedly because he was sure that it would be refused, and because the idea that he might be asked, 'Why did you not treat the United States as you treated Brazil, and employ against Abraham Lincoln the mode of argument used with Pedro II.?' never entered into his Lordship's mind. The contrast is drawn with great skill and force, very much in the tone and style in which Lord Robert Cecil handles such subjects in the House of Commons. The reviewer criticises with great force and distinctness the policy pursued towards Japan. He gives an exact though succinct account of the circumstances under which Mr. Richardson was murdered; shows that the Japanese Government was in nowise to blame—that there is no evidence whatever to prove that the assassin was a follower of the Prince of Satsuma—that both the Tycoon and the Daimio did their best to get hold of the murderers, but were unable to do so—and that, under such circumstances, the exaction of a pecuniary indemnity from the Tycoon and the private war waged on Satsuma were acts of extravagant lawlessness. Turning to Europe, Lord Russell's conduct in the case of Poland has done serious injury to our credit, honour, and influence. It was open to him to be silent; it was open to him to enter a solemn protest, and, having recorded that protest, then to be silent; or it was open to him to offer counsel and remonstrance of a peremptory character, on the understanding that if they were not regarded he would go to war: and if he had taken any one of these courses, he might have commanded the support of the country. But what he did do was the only thing which he was not at liberty to do, and which the country could not endorse. He said, virtually, 'We don't wish to quarrel; but if you won't listen to our advice—if the insurrection goes on—if you offer no concessions to the Poles—it will be impossible for us to forbear.' This is the only construction which can be put upon the language he held to the Russian Ambassador. By that language he did three things. He encouraged an insurrection that had been commenced and continued only in the hope of foreign interference. He induced France, relying on his support, to join in his menaces, and assume a position from which no honourable retreat was open. Lastly, he pledged England, by every tie of honour, to enforce a better treatment of the Poles, if need were, by war. The conditions of forbearance were not fulfilled. Russia did not listen to advice: the insurrection went on; and, instead of offering concessions to Poland, Russia increased the severity of her repression. Yet, to the disgust of England, the disappointment of Poland, the astonishment of Europe, Lord Russell declared that nothing should induce him to put his clearly implied menaces into execution. He would betray the Poles; he would leave France in the lurch; he would submit to the sneering rebuke of Russia and to the contemptuous ridicule of Europe; he would be scoffed at, kicked, 'posted'—but he would not fight. After the close of the Polish negotiation, England stood in the position of Charles Sumner; she had been struck in the face, and she had crouched to the striker. The contempt of Germany and the distrust of France paralysed her efforts on behalf of Denmark; and thus Lord Russell's blustering threats and timid retractation have already borne terrible and practical fruit. They have not only dishonoured England; they have dismembered the Danish monarchy, and buried five thousand brave men under the ruins of Dybbol. This article contains the best account that can yet be written of the Danish negotiations. Thus much is certain: that up to the moment of the outbreak of war, in abandoning Holstein, in revoking the Patent of March, in offering to repeal the Constitution of November, Denmark was acting under the advice and direction of England, and of course with the understanding that, while she followed that advice, she was entitled to the material support of England; that in obedience to this policy she sacrificed the chance of utterly annihilating the Federal army of execution, and making a stand in Holstein even against Austria and Prussia; and that, after this, Lord Russell not only refused her the aid of England, but intercepted that which Sweden was prepared to afford. Every line of the indictment contained in the Quarterly article is true; and certainly such a tale was never before told against a Minister of England.

The Quarterly contains also a most interesting article on the Excavations at Pompeii, worth the attention of all who are capable of taking pleasure in information which throws light on the domestic life of the greatest nation that ever ruled on earth—that is to say, of all who do not think that a copy of the Times contains more wisdom than the whole of Thucydides. It notices a valuable discovery made by the present guardian of the buried city—that it is possible, by pouring plaster into the cavities where the volcanic mud has suffocated and buried the inhabitants of Pompeii, to obtain an exact model of the form, features, and dress of the sufferers, as they were at the time of their destruction. In this manner some interesting figures, and some curious details as to the secrets of a Pompeian lady's toilet, have been procured. It is a surprise to find the garment which was held peculiar to the Celtic barbarians—so peculiar that it gave a name which distinguished Transalpine Gaul (braccata) from Cisalpine (togata)—worn by the women of an Italian city thoroughly and completely Roman.

The Edinburgh is dull. It has chosen its subjects badly. The only article of any present interest is on Rifled Ordnance—tolerable. There is one on the 'Diaries of a Lady of Quality,' written after the pattern of the Athenæum, with a good many readable extracts; and one on Charles Victor de Bonstetten, of whom we never heard before, and suspect that few others ever heard, of whom the reviewer has nothing to tell that is worth knowing, and of whose uneventful life no records seem to remain. Renan's 'Life of Jesus' comes in for a late castigation, not effective enough to be worth administering now: and Mr. Kirk's 'Charles the Bold' and its author are the subject of a considerable amount of merited rebuke. The sleepiness and ponderosity of the whole number are unaccountable, unless we are to suppose that a duke of a 'Revolution family' has assumed the editorship, and that the author of 'Don Carlos' has been one of the principal contributors, assisted, perhaps, by Sir Charles Wood and Mr. Milner Gibson.

Whatever else it may be, the Westminster is never exactly dull. The Radical organ is always saved, if only by its flippancy and ferocity, from that leaden level of dead and dignified dulness which characterises a bad number of the Edinburgh. This time it contains four articles which are at least capable of arresting attention. The first is on Strikes and Cooperation. It is incomplete, especially in regard to the first branch of the subject, and does not abound either in original information or original thought; but as there are many people who have not yet made themselves acquainted with the achievements of co-operation in this country, and as this article puts those achievements readably before us, it may doubtless do good. Another article, on Capital Punishment, maintains in a moderate and sensible tone, though without much force or logic, the doctrine of those philanthropists who hold that only innocent men ought to die violent deaths. The Abolition of Religious Tests is a theme which calls forth all the power and all the bitterness of the Westminster reviewers; but its article on this topic is little more than an amplification of Mr. Goldwin Smith's arguments, which are reiterated with all the fervour of hatred and feebleness of moral apprehension which characterise that distinguished advocate of everything that Englishmen in general abhor. The article on New Zealand, which takes the native side in a moderate and discriminating spirit, is good and clear the only good and clear account of the Maori quarrel that we have seen. It is difficult to believe that it is written by an habitué of the violent and venomous school whose extravagant crotchets generally hold exclusive possession of the Westminster.

The National Review has several articles which come up to its usual average, but none which reminds us of those very excellent and thoughtful essays which it has from time to time contained. The first and last articles treat of the Apocalypse, and of the growth of 'Messianic Ideas.' The second and eighth are literary, and deal with Mendelssohn, Sterne, and Thackeray. The third and fifth are historical, and treat of the Provincial Assemblies of France, and of Mr. Kirk's 'Charles the Bold.' The Races of the Old World is not a subject to be satisfactorily disposed of within the limits assigned to it by the editor of the National. The paper on the Germanic Diet is easily written, and contains information worth preserving for future reference; and that on Ireland, but for the intrusion of a very violent and unnecessary tirade against the Irish Church, wholly unworthy of the general tone and tenor of the article, would be very good indeed. As it is, it contains much that is true and worth remembering, but the writer, like every one else, fails to suggest any remedy for the evils which still render Ireland an eyesore and a reproach to the British Empire. It is worth note that he, a rigid economist, is inclined to feel some alarm at the disproportionate emigration of persons in the prime of life, which threatens in the next generation seriously to impair the labour supply of Ireland; but for the rest, he considers the removal of a large portion of the Celtic population, and the introduction of Scotch and English in their place, as the only means, and not a very certain means, of rendering Ireland gradually content, prosperous, and loyal. To us, the truth seems to be this—that England has made the fatal mistake of giving to a Celtic people an Anglo-Saxon form of government, and institutions which require for their success virtues altogether alien to the Celtic character; that an unnatural system of government has failed in the first object of government, the preservation of order and the maintenance of security for life and property; that this failure has excluded Ireland from the benefits which the increasing wealth and growing intelligence of England would otherwise have conferred upon her; that the defect is political, not economical; and that the remedy must be applied to the root of the mischief in the lawlessness of Ireland, rather than to the consequences in a disproportion between labour and capital. If you could cure the Irish of shooting landlords who dare to improve, and striking against employers who will carry on their trade in their own way, trade would speedily return to Irish towns, and English capital would make the land of Ireland capable of supporting her population.

Southern Resistance.—The rebels are striking blow after blow, while the Federal armies seem to be entranced in a spell of lethargy. There is a fearful task before us if we persist in the attempt to subjugate a people possessed of such elements of resistance. There is no lack of prospective Federal victories—fought and won in the buoyant anticipations of the war press—but meanwhile the rebels are culling substantial triumphs in the actual field. We are confirmed in our opinion that the power to resist is greater with men of calm attributes than the power to compel. We are nearer to the ruin of the North than to the submission of the South.—N. Y. Daily News.

MARYLAND.*

Mr. Buchanan, in the pamphlet before us, deals with a subject the bare mention of which is sure to evoke a vast amount of enthusiasm amongst Southerners. The State of Maryland has done much and suffered very abundantly for the cause of the South, and what she has done and endured will never be forgotten. Mr. Buchanan gives a résumé of the ties that unite Maryland to the Confederate States, and of the mutual advantages that are incident to their political connection. He also gives an account of the conquest of Maryland—for Maryland is indeed a conquered State—and of the brutalities of the Lincoln despotism. This part of the pamphlet deserves the attention of the European reader. When the history of the Second War of Independence comes to be written, it will be found that the treatment of Maryland affords the best and most conclusive evidence of the designs and character of the now dominant party in the North.

It has been assumed that at the outset Mr. Lincoln's intentions were good, that he did not contemplate the overthrow of the Constitution he had sworn to defend, and that the exigencies of an unwise and unjust war have forced him to become a despot. It has been supposed that Mr. Lincoln believed in Mr. Seward's fiction of Union feeling in the South, and that he had to deal with a conspiracy and not a national uprising. Mr. Buchanan's pamphlet demonstrates from official documents that from the beginning Mr. Lincoln was fully aware that Secession was the will of the Southern people, and that he was prepared to overthrow the Constitution and to resort to tyranny. On September 11, 1861, Mr. Cameron, Secretary of War, ordered General Banks to prevent an act of secession by the Legislature of Maryland, and, if necessary, to arrest all the members. Next day General M'Clellan wrote to General Banks, urging upon him the importance of 'secresy and success.' Mr. Seward was advised as follows of the condition of the Legislature:—

The Senate—
Secessionists arrested	11
Secessionists absent from the State	1
Secessionists at large	3
Union men at large	6
	22
The House—
Secessionists arrested	40
Secessionists at large	10
Union men at large	15
	73

So out of 22 Senators only 6 were for the Union, and out of 73 members of the House only 15 were opposed to Secession. Such being the case with Maryland, a border State, Mr. Lincoln could not have been in doubt as to the thorough unanimity of the South, and he must have known that Maryland was being kept in the Union solely by fraud and force and entirely against her will.

Of the infamous rule of Mr. Lincoln's military satraps in Baltimore we have recorded many instances. It has been a brutal war on women, children, and defenceless citizens, and a system of robbery. On this occasion we will reproduce an account quoted by Mr. Buchanan from the New York Times:—

'But perhaps no case can compare in wanton malignity with that of the treatment of the Rev. Mr. Harrison, the father-in-law of the Rev. Dr. Hoge, and brother-in-law of the Rev. Dr. Backus, the well-known Union clergyman of a Presbyterian church in Baltimore. This reverend gentleman pays large taxes on property in the United States, but upon being asked if he had property in Virginia, and answering in the affirmative, he was required to make out a list of it that it might be taxed also. On presenting it to the official, he made the remark that it seemed rather hard he should have to pay taxes on property from which he derived no income. He was arrested on a charge of 'treasonable utterance,' confined in a small room with six others, kept there for several days—was tried, but allowed to employ no counsel. If he attempted to speak for himself, Don Piatt, the worthy tool of his prototype, General Schenck, shook his fist in his face, cursing him and calling him fool and liar. On Sunday, between 1 and 2 o'clock P.M., this venerable minister, sixty-three years of age, was marched down under a broiling sun, with a gang of deserters, to Fort McHenry, a distance of between two and three miles from the Gilmore House. When he reached there, he was so utterly exhausted that he dropped to the earth, where he was suffered to lie, without a morsel of food or a drop of water, till the following morning.'

A Useful Publication.—The Speech of Mr. Long, on the recognition of the South, in the Federal House of Representatives on April 7, has been neatly published in pamphlet form by Mr. Anderson Eadie, printer, 14, Princes' Square, Glasgow. It is sold at the low price of 1*d.* or 9*d.* per dozen. By the quantity, it is furnished at 35*s.* per first thousand, and 30*s.* for each additional thousand.

The Florida Expedition.—In the investigation before a Congressional Committee on the origin, objects, and results of the ill-starred Federal expedition into Florida, the following characteristic letter from President Lincoln to Major-General Gilmore was produced:—'Executive Mansion, Washington, January 5, 1864.—Major-General Gilmore: I understand an effort is being made by some worthy gentleman to reconstruct a legal State Government in Florida. Florida is in your department, and it is not unlikely that you may be there in person. I have given Mr. Hay a commission of major, and sent him to you with some blank books and other blanks to aid in the reconstruction. He will explain as to the manner of using the blanks, and also my general views on the subject. It is desirable for all to cooperate, but, if irreconcilable differences of opinion shall arise, you are master. I wish the thing done in the most speedy way possible, so that, when done, it be within the range of the proclamation on the subject. The detail labour will, of course, have to be done by others, but I shall be greatly obliged if you will give it such general supervision as you can find consistent with your more strictly military duties.—A. Lincoln.' The result of this little operation was to bury in the swamps of Florida more Federal soldiers than the number of citizens required to reorganise the State under Mr. Lincoln's proclamation.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York: April 25, 1864.

Banks's defeat in Louisiana—the cotton haul—disappointment of the Yankees—the capture of Plymouth—it interferes with Grant's plans—Butler not a military man—the situation in Virginia—Grant's military reputation—the efforts to reinforce Grant—in what sense the campaign may be decisive—the capture of Fort Pillow—the story of the massacre—the negroes placed in front by their white officers—the position held by the Confederate government in reference to negro troops.

The past week records two important achievements of the Confederate arms—the repulse of the Banks expedition up the Red River in Louisiana, and the capture of Plymouth on the Roanoke River in North Carolina by the Confederate troops.

Your accurate correspondent in New Orleans will doubtless send you by this steamer fuller accounts than are received and published here of the extent of the disaster of General Banks. The bulletins and despatches from that quarter are framed on the principle laid down by General Halleck, the late General-in-Chief, never to confess a defeat. But, with all the glosses which the art of lying can put upon it, this is a signal defeat. The expedition, instead of going forward to the capture of Shreveport, and thence on to further occupations, has been shattered in battle and turned back to Alexandria. The Federal reports for the press, in the midst of claims of victory—which consists only in the fact that the army was saved and enabled to get back without being captured to Alexandria, come freighted with a good many explanations why it will be found expedient to stay at that place for a good while. The main reason, though suppressed, is transparent. Banks suffered such terrible losses that he is unable to go on; and an important condition for his remaining where he is is omitted—it is not so clear that the Confederates will let him go on. Passengers by the transports which bring the latest accounts confess, in private conversation, that the Federal forces were terribly cut up.

The cotton haul has been a very meagre one. The army got a few hundred bales, which went down to New Orleans. The navy picked up more; it is estimated that between two and three thousands of bales were sent up the river as the gunboat spoil. But after the fall of Fort de Russy the torch was applied by the Confederates as they retreated up the river, and the planters helped the work of destruction by firing their own cotton wherever there was danger of its falling into the hands of the Yankees. For mile after mile along the rivers and bayous, there was an incessant smoke from the conflagration of this precious material. The reports of the Confederates, who are not unwilling to exalt the merit of this sacrifice by their friends, as well as the private reports of the disappointed cotton-robbers, as to the amounts destroyed, are very vague, and doubtless exaggerated. They talk of a hundred thousand bales as having been burned, but there will be some abatement of these figures. The number is, however, very large, and the losses are enormous. The Yankees are very indignant at this wanton waste of property, and complain more bitterly than the men who owned it and helped to destroy it. It is cheating them out of so much of their pay for saving the Union.

The exploit of the Confederate ram on the Roanoke, which resulted in the capture by the land forces of the town of Plymouth with the whole Federal garrison, has astonished the Yankees exceedingly. Since they got over the shock of the Merrimac, they have begun to think all Confederate attempts to build ironclads and rams at home a contemptible failure. This was a dashing and brilliant affair, and the results are in other respects important. It interferes seriously with that part of General Grant's combinations which included an advance from North Carolina, simultaneously with other concentrating columns, upon Richmond. There will be occupation in North Carolina to take care of Newbern and protect their coast possessions, which will hinder, if it do not break up, the projected movements into the interior. Grant has undertaken to manage some very extensive combinations, and here is a serious accident at the outset to one of the most important of them.

Plymouth is in the military district of General Butler. That personage has military mishaps wherever he goes; his forte is in bullying women and old men, insulting and robbing the defenceless, and disgracing his uniform by the manners and morals of a brigand. He has lately announced that he intends to take the field in person. Its enemies could not wish the arms of the Union worse luck.

The air from the Potomac comes heavily laden with rumours of military movements on a grand scale. The Government is very reserved; and when it does communicate news, or allow news to be transmitted by the telegraph, the suspicion immediately attaches itself that there is something suppressed, or that what is told is meant to deceive. We have accounts one hour that heavy columns are marching in one direction, and the movements are precisely explained, even to the hearing of the sound of the cannon, and the listening public are taught that the great shock of arms cannot be delayed; the next, it is as positively stated that all this is imagination or invention. The forces and the position of the opposing armies are described with the exactitude of certain knowledge, when, at the same time, any careful observer must know that much is positively false, and a great deal impossible to be true. I continue in the belief that there will be no battle brought on by General Grant for some time to come, if he can avoid it. His scheme is, doubtless, a grand enveloping one, bringing immense forces from different points into a simultaneous movement against Richmond. I am much mistaken if General Lee does not break up his combinations.

Notwithstanding the journalist laudations of the new Lieutenant-General, there is a misgiving that he is not a match for the consummate general who commands the Confederate defences. General Grant has been suddenly raised to a higher military rank than has been conferred except upon General Scott, since Washington, for a military success which, when carefully analysed, is found to give no proofs of military genius or knowledge of the science of war. He prevailed, by the force of overwhelming numbers, over a defence gallant indeed and stubbornly maintained, but imperfectly and unskilfully conducted. He has yet to be tried against the best master of the art of war, on this continent at least; and his claims to the distinctions which have been heaped upon him in advance are to go through an ordeal, of the issue of which his best admirers may well feel doubtful. At Richmond, the confidence in Lee's genius and fortune is buoyant.

It is evidently felt at Washington that the campaign now opening with so much pomp of preparation is to be a decisive one, and extraordinary efforts are made to swell the Federal troops in Virginia to the highest point of numbers and efficiency. In addition to the recruits collected under the recent call for 500,000 men and the supplemental call for 200,000 more, the President has authorised the raising of 85,000 militia for a hundred days in the Western States, to guard the frontiers and do garrison duty, while all the enlisted troops are sent forward to swell Grant's forces. They mean at Washington that this shall be a crushing and closing campaign, with which to finish up the war. In one sense it may be. The defeat of Grant will be the signal for such a revulsion of popular feeling and such a financial collapse—already foretold by the Secretary of the Treasury—that the war for subjugation will be practically over. I am sure all noble hearts in England pray with me that this consummation may come thoroughly and quickly.

The capture by assault of Fort Pillow, and the great loss of life among the besieged, particularly of the negroes who were in the fort, raised a great outcry in the North against rebel barbarities. The journals, on the first report, which was drawn up in exaggerated terms to cover the shame of the defeat, clamoured universally for instant retaliation, man for man, two men for every victim of what was called a cowardly massacre. Congress took it up; resolutions were adopted demanding a stern inquisition into the facts, and urging thorough measures for retaliation in this case, and a stern system for the protection of the negro soldiers in all the rights of prisoners of war when taken hereafter, by reprisals on the white soldiers of the Confederacy in the prisons of the United States. The President encouraged this clamour in a speech at Baltimore, in which he assumed that the facts might be as charged, and only hesitated about the kind and manner of punishment and retaliation.

The truth is coming out slowly, but is very faintly acknowledged. Fort Pillow was taken by assault, after repeated demands for surrender and refusals. In the fight, the negro soldiers were placed by their white officers in front. When the fort was entered the white officers surrendered. The negroes, through terror or despair, continued to resist, running with their arms and firing on their pursuers. The white Union officers could not restrain them. So long as this resistance was continued, the usages of war leave no doubt that the killing was justifiable, as against the right of the enemy to make complaint.

It must be borne in mind, that the Confederate Government makes no distinctions on account of colour in its practices between the white and the coloured troops employed by the United States in its armies. A negro volunteer, duly enlisted as a free man within a 'loyal' State, is held, when captured by Confederates, to be a prisoner of war, however offensive to them the use of such troops may be as an instrument for subjugating them. But the pretension of the United States is, that it may go into the Confederate States and take away a negro, bound by the law of the place to certain duties, put arms in his hands, and incite him to do acts against his legal superiors which are highly criminal, and punishable with heavy penalties; and, if he should be taken with these arms and in the act of committing the crime, that the uniform he has put on holds him safe against the reclamations of the laws he has violated. By the law of the Southern States insurgent slaves are criminals, punishable as social enemies, whom the common safety requires to be dealt with severely. Besides being made traitors to the sovereign authority of the State, they are offenders against its criminal laws. The United States would not respect the claim of the Confederate States to protect a murderer who, having escaped from the city of New York, had taken service in the Southern army, and, being captured, was reclaimed by the courts to be tried for the crime. Yet the claim would be as reasonable and as well founded in law as that of the United States, that they can, by putting a Federal uniform on an insurgent slave within the State against whose society he is a conspirator, secure for him immunity under the laws of war, and make the life of a Confederate prisoner of war a hostage for his safety.

The subject is capable of copious illustration, showing how untenable it is. Indeed, the pretension is only another form of that Federal insolence which holds the South to be a rebellious mob to whom none of the courtesies of war or the rights of a belligerent are to be extended, unless extorted for the time by the power to enforce them; and it will never be submitted to by the South, whatever may be the consequences.

New Orleans as it is.—Alas! what a change! In three short years the long line of ships and steamers have almost entirely disappeared; what few there are left seem drowsily looking on in sorrow and dilapidation at their own loneliness, and the apparent helplessness and decay which surrounds them. The long, broad, and boasted levee is now a chocolate-coloured plane, except dotted here and there with a few barrels of molasses, a stray hogshead of sugar, and not cotton enough to keep a one-horse factory running on half time! Whole squares, and long rows of fine stores, are vacated and unoccupied; while many were left in a half-finished condition, some without roofs, and all going rapidly to decay. 'Decrepitude and decay' is certainly written upon everything in New Orleans, and, were it not for the army, one might as well be in the wilderness of Judea. The city looks sorry, the citizens look sorry and mad both; while the strangers and soldiers go it on the high-pressure principle, looking in vain for that peaceful 'good time' which is said to be coming, but which 'I don't see.'—New York World.

A Trophy of Sumter.—We have the pleasure of chronicling a most delicate and deserved tribute paid by one of the most distinguished men in the South to the first Englishman who, in Parliament, proposed the recognition of Confederate Independence. Mr. W. H. Gregory, M.P. for Galway, has just received from Charleston a fragment of the flagstaff which so long and gloriously held aloft the Southern flag over the battered ruins of Fort Sumter. This interesting trophy bears the following inscription:—

Head-Quarters, Department of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida.
Charleston, S. C., February 10, 1864.

Piece of flagstaff of Fort Sumter, Harbour of Charleston, sent with my compliments to W. H. Gregory, M.P. for Galway. The flagstaff of that fort has already been shot down forty times by the enemy's fire since the commencement of the siege, July 10th, 1863.

The Democratic Party a Peace Party.—The Cincinnati Enquirer, the foremost Opposition paper in the West, affirms: 'The Democratic—at least in these Western States—is a peace party. It ought to be so everywhere; and its members are settling down upon its organic principles thus to become.'

A LANCASHIRE MAN IN RICHMOND.

Our Manchester Correspondent has forwarded to us a long and interesting letter dated Richmond, March 29, from a gentleman who was one of the chief promoters of the Confederate movement in Lancashire, and who has since migrated to the Confederate States. The impressions of an intelligent Lancashireman visiting Richmond just now for the first time, can scarcely fail to be of interest to many of our readers, and therefore we have much pleasure in making the following extracts:—

When I left England for the Confederate States, if I had put my trust in the representations of Northern fanatics in Manchester or London, I ought to have found, on my arrival in the South, a disaffected army, a half-starved and dissatisfied people, the slaves uneasy and insubordinate, and everything at sixes and sevens.' But all these things I found to be dreams, without the slightest foundation in fact. On the other hand, the first thing that takes the attention of the stranger is the method and care which characterise the transaction of public business in the several departments. The machinery of the Confederate Government is working as smoothly and satisfactorily as though it had been in existence for fifty years. As with the Government so with the people—no breath of discontent anywhere, but a determination to make any sacrifice that may be required of them.

I see from some of the London papers (Daily News and Star), that we are short of food in Richmond. That is the first I knew of it. Scarcity, I assure you, there is none: the only inconvenience the people suffer arises from the temporary difficulty of getting supplies from the country. I am now staying at the American Hotel, an establishment equal in size to your Queen's in Manchester, and the waiting is done by four hundred coloured servants, who are exceedingly civil, well-mannered, and obliging. As for the 'destitution' that prevails, I can only say that anybody can live here at half the cost he can in Manchester.

I have been to the Libby and Belle Isle prisons several times, and found the prisoners looking very well and enjoying themselves over the chess-board and at other games. I thought Neal Dow looking better than when I last saw him. The Sunday before he left (by the exchange 13th) I was invited down by the Rev. Chaplain Cameron, and was surprised to see the prisoners doing a soldier's justice to ham, bacon, and chickens. Everything was very clean and tidy, the doctor going his rounds every morning, or as often as his services are required. The mode of 'exchange' shows that the terms are pretty much at the dictation of the Confederates. For every ten prisoners the Federals send, the Confederates send seven; but the Southerners will not recognise Butler in this matter, nor will they surrender any captured negroes. Many exchanges have taken place of late, so that few prisoners now remain here.

I have travelled through a great portion of the South, and have had more than ordinary opportunities of observing the institution of 'slavery' in all its forms. The other day I met a clergyman of my acquaintance in Main Street, who invited me to accompany him some sixteen miles in the country, as he was about to preach on the following day (Sunday) to some 400 slaves on a plantation. It occurred to me, as a piece of pleasantry, that, by accepting the invitation on the spot, I should give the horrid planter no time for preparing for my reception, by decorating his kitchen with hams and bacon, which, according to the Union and Emancipation Society, are hung up for the delectation of visitors, but which the slaves 'smell but never touch.' We drove on together, and arrived at the estate of a Major Allen, by whom I was received and entertained for seven days with the greatest hospitality and the most gentlemanly feeling. The estate consists of about 4,000 acres, and is one of the finest in Virginia. I found the negroes living in cottages in different parts of the plantation. They receive their supplies weekly, and cook them as they please. By the way, it is the practice to pay the slaves for overwork, and I know many instances of slaves making a considerable sum of 'pin-money' or bounty annually. There is a church on the estate for the benefit of the negroes, and a hospital, which I found very clean, with separate divisions for men and women. I went into several of their dwellings, which I also found very clean and comfortable, the walls hung with pictures, floors well swept, chairs, tables, flock-beds, clean white sheets and bed-covers, &c., &c. The boys and girls were clean and well clad, and made courtesies to me as I took them by the hand. Major Allen is a gentleman in heart as well as manners, and is well known to Mr. Lawley of the Times.

Before the war, the South had paid no attention to manufactures, although iron, lead, and other mineral ore were known to exist in great abundance. But things have wonderfully altered since then. Your Lancashire friends will be interested in hearing that several spinning and weaving establishments have been opened, and 10s. yarn is being sold at forty dollars the five-pound bundle. The looms are made of wood and iron, and run 110 per minute. It is out of the question to compare cloth made from these looms with Manchester cloth, the former being the best as regards the cotton, but at present ill-managed. As an instance of the necessities and perseverance of the Southerners, it may not be amiss to mention that nearly all the planters find some difficulty in buying clothing for their slaves, and they have therefore resorted to the common spinning-wheel and hand-loom for the manufacture of woollen and cotton. A few days ago the first thing that attracted my attention on a plantation I was visiting was the sight of a negress weaving by hand; and, by the way, in two mills I visited at Richmond, I found slaves, both men and women, engaged in weaving by power, in the card-room, at the throstles, mules, winding and warping, and heard upon inquiry that they made tolerable hands. But to come back to what I saw on the plantation. There was neither picking stick nor any other article to throw the shuttle across, that operation being performed simply by the hand. I saw no signs of either Arkwright or Crompton. The work-people were using a pair of cards or strickles measuring 12 in. by 3¼, and costing $75! These answered all the purposes of machinery up to the mule. After the cotton is combed, the ends are twisted together, and, by the aid of the spinning-wheel, it is thus finished for the loom. You may imagine the kind of cloth produced.

Little or no hope is entertained as to European recognition. The people are confident of their ability to win their independence on the field of battle. The forthcoming campaign will, no doubt, be the most active and decisive of any during the war. I know for a certainty the arsenals are well stocked, and you may look to hear great news before midsummer.

Richmond is a fine place, and I only wish some dozen of you were coming over. The country is delightful, the people hospitable, women beautiful, and everything full of heart and hope. You can get as much shooting as you like, free of license or other cost.

Rates of Freight at New York.—In consequence of the absence of cargoes at New York, flour is now conveyed from that port to Liverpool at the rate of about ½d. to 1d. per barrel. Wheat is brought as ballast and without charge.—Telegraph.

Great activity continues to be displayed in connection with Clyde shipbuilding. There has been launched from the yard of Mr. Denny, an iron screw steamer 1,200 tons, named the Kentucky, fitted by Messrs. Denny & Co., Engineers, with direct acting engines of 200 horse-power.

Messrs. Aitken & Mansel launched from their yard, Whiteinch, a paddle steamer of 630 tons, with oscillating engines of 180 horse-power, by Messrs. James Aitken & Co., Cranston Hill.

The new screw steamer Penguin, built by Messrs. Tod & McGregor, made her first voyage from Greenock in a little over sixteen hours against a head wind all the way; she steamed 12 knots per hour. She is 220 feet long, 28½ feet beam, 15 feet depth of hold, and 876 tons, builder's measurement.

The Alfred, built by Messrs. Caird & Co., ran the distance between the Clock and the Cumbrea lights in fifty-five minutes, or at the rate of more than seventeen miles an hour.

The Lillian, a paddle steamer recently built by Messrs. Thomson & Co. of Glasgow, has adjusted her compasses at Garelock.

The Lafayette, the second of the three steamers which Messrs. Scott are building on the Clyde for the French Compagnie Générale Transatlantique, has been receiving her engines at Greenock.

Messrs. Scott & Co. have launched another of the extensive series of powerful steamers intended for the Nassau trade, her engines to be fitted by the Greenock Foundry Company.

The new paddle steamer Dumbarton, on her trial trip down the Clyde, ran at the rate of fifteen statute miles an hour.

Messrs. Blackwood & Gordon have launched a screw steamer named the Ta Pang Nyo.

Messrs. Barclay, Curle, & Co. have a paddle steamer called The Vivid, of great power.

American Cotton Still King.—In an article on our cotton industry, which appeared in the Times of Tuesday week, it is observed:—'But the truth is, we cannot have our old cotton trade with our new cotton. What we want is not so much 3,500,000 bales in place of 2,500,000 as good cotton in the place of bad, and certainty instead of speculation in prices. The inspectors tell us of a singular state of affairs in the manufacturing districts. There is confidence in the future, but no contentment with the present. The manufacturers are building new mills and enlarging old ones, but not for the trade as it now is, or the cotton which they now get. The operatives are hanging on with similar expectations, reluctant to migrate, and clinging to their homes, but sorely discontented with Surat cotton, and compelled in many cases to eke out by the acceptance of relief what would otherwise be insufficient earnings. What form the desired consummation is expected to take it would be hard perhaps to say, but probably the leading idea is that some day or other cotton will come from America once more. This would not only furnish a good material, but would remove the present element of risk. As things now stand, there is on one side an actual supply of indifferent cotton, and on the other a possible supply of excellent cotton; so that, besides the dissatisfaction created by Surat, there is the chance or prospect or anticipation of some such sudden influx of American as would turn the market upside down. As long as the American War continues a revolution in the cotton trade will be a possibility at any moment. Whenever it ends, Lancashire industry will take a fresh start. Those seem to be the impressions prevailing in the cotton districts, and in the meantime there is work enough to keep the mills going, and to enable the employers and employed together to hold out for better times. . . . Perhaps American peace may not bring us American cotton as before, and yet the misfortune is that hitherto no other cotton has taken its place. Lord Derby expressed his hope that we should never again be dependent on a single source of supply; and it is certain, that, as far as mere bulk of imports goes, we seem to have outgrown this risk. But it is, we fear, equally certain that the new supply is not accepted as the equivalent of the old, and that either the former must be improved, or the latter must be forgotten, before the cotton trade can really be revived.' We have on several occasions shown that, though cotton can be procured from India and other countries, yet a substitute for American cotton is not to be found. Without American cotton, our staple industry cannot resume its former dimensions.

True Charity.—The New York Daily News, in commenting upon the Great Sanitary Fair to raise money for the relief of sick and wounded soldiers, says:—'A charity worthy of a Christian people is to stop the war. The millions you may contribute to those now suffering will not shield others from like agonies. To-day you give comfort to the wounded of yesterday, and to-morrow another field will be strewn with mangled men. Look into the future and think, if this war continues, how little your most lavish outlay will avail to staunch the torrents of blood that must flow, to heal the thousands of ghastly wounds that must be given. It is well that Charity should go to the fought field and minister to the wounded and the dying; but it is better that Charity should interpose before the battle, and, summoning Reason to be her interpreter, should plead for peace. If it be mercy to heal the sick, how much more merciful to abate the pestilence! If it be charity to mitigate the horrors of war, how much more charitable to end the war!'

Who 'Proclaimed War?'—The New York Times, in its issue of the 6th ult., in an editorial taking issue with Thaddeus Stevens for stating that the rebel States are belligerents, and 'that they are no longer in the Union,' writes this down as a fact that cannot be gainsayed: 'The Confederacy wanted peace, and sent Commissioners to Washington to secure it. We would not receive them, and proclaimed war! They accepted war. The question who fired the first gun is nothing.'

Negro Soldiers.—When we consider the philanthropic pretences under which Abolitionism so long assailed and finally destroyed the peace of the country, it is impossible to suppress the feelings of disgust and contempt which this treatment of the negro inspires. To the miserable victims it is in the last degree treacherous, inhuman, and base—a fit commentary, however, on that hypocrisy which Abolitionism for years has been acting before the world. Boasting of twenty millions of whites to our five, they yet stoop to do what no pressure of the war has extorted from us; and calling on Africa to save them, they thrust the poor negroes in the front ranks of the battle, and drive them to the slaughter with fixed bayonets.—Richmond Sentinel, March 15.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL & COMMERCIAL.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

Wednesday Evening.

The state of the money market has rather improved the last few days. Although the Bank directors placed the rate at 9 per cent. last week, it created no panic; and, notwithstanding the tendency was slightly unfavourable, the pressure gradually wore away, and there has been since comparative ease. Of course, the principal business has been at the Bank, where the demand has been stimulated by the caution of the brokers out of doors; and it may be well imagined that if the directors charged 9½ and 10 per cent. for exceptional transactions, it kept the bankers and other persons associated with financial affairs in a state of nervousness. The influx of gold since from America, with a disposition to exercise by the banks more freedom towards their customers, has produced a favourable effect, and the impression is that the rate for the moment will not go higher. The Bank of France have raised the minimum to 8 per cent., but that was to be expected after the movement on this side of the Channel. There is no necessity for the Bank of England to take further restrictive measures, with bullion following forward in the manner it does, but if there should be any extraordinary change in the prospect of things, it is not at all improbable that an advance would take place. The bill brokers in their respective operations charge 9 and 9½ per cent. for the engagements they conclude, and to-day (Wednesday) a stronger enquiry ensued than was looked for even among the bankers and brokers themselves. On the Stock Exchange the demand for accommodation was partially influenced by the approaching half-monthly settlements, and in consequence of the belief that in arranging differences money will temporarily command high terms.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The general aspect of the bullion market has greatly improved within the past week, the advances in the rate of discount having for a time quite changed the aspect of affairs. The amount of gold sent into the Bank during the week has been 526,000l., whilst the withdrawals have been only 100,000l., for transmission to the Brazils. The arrivals of gold have also been large, having reached 622,809l., of which 159,772l. was from New York, 67,400l. from Port Phillip, 83,340l. from New Zealand, and 12,297l. from the Brazils. The shipments of specie to the East by the Baroda to-morrow amount to 117,800l., of which 86,000l. is in gold and 31,800l. in silver. The Brazil mail took out 117,450l., of which 100,950l. was gold and 16,500l. silver. The silver market has not been particularly active; the bar silver brought by the last West India steamer has been sold at 61d. per oz., being a decline of ¼d. as compared with previous prices. The Mexican dollars by the same mail have been sold at 61¾d., which is also at a decline of ¼d. per oz. The gold ships already announced as on their way from Australia, are the Agamemnon with 12,500l., the Red Rover with 30,000l., the Kosciusko with 14,000l., and the Chile from New Zealand with 119,000l. Later telegrams from Melbourne announce further shipments to the amount of 186,000l.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The market for the English funded securities has within the last few days presented a greatly improved appearance. Business, under the brighter aspect of the money market, has increased, and prices show a corresponding advance. The brokers appear to have more confidence, and their operations are conducted with increased freedom. Consols closed this evening at 91¼ for money, and 90⅝ to 90¾ ex div. for the account, which is a rise as compared with this day week of nearly ½ per cent. Exchequer bills have also improved, being now at 9s. to 13s. dis. The foreign stock market has also been more animated, but prices have not shown so much fluctuation as might have been expected under the circumstances. Greek stock has declined ½ per cent., being now at 22½ to 23. Mexican, on the other hand, are up to 43¼ to 43¾, being an advance of ¾ per cent. Spanish Passives are 31¼ to 31¾, and the Certificates 11¾ to 12, being an advance of ¼ and ¼ per cent. respectively. Turkish are without change; the six-per-cents. of 1851 being 88 to 89, and those of 1862, at 71 to 71½.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The stock of the cotton loan still attracts attention. But for the high rate of money, a further advance would have taken place. As it is, its value is becoming more appreciated daily, and we shall shortly see a further advance. The price in the midst of the financial pressure receded to 62 and 64, since again it has reached 65 to 67; buyers for amount at 66½. To-day it fluctuated with the other markets, and was last called 63 to 65.

The Economist of 9th instant has the following:

'Our readers will not be surprised to learn that the crude and financially unsound scheme for "the redemption of the Confederate Cotton Loan" by means of blockade-running, which we noticed in our publication of 2nd April last, has been definitively abandoned by its concoctors.'

Our usually accurate contemporary is likely to lead its readers into more than one error by this announcement. First, the scheme of redeeming Confederate Cotton Bonds by running the blockade is not only not abandoned, but is at this moment being prosecuted with singular activity and success. Within the week we have learned of the return of the Denbigh to a neutral port, after three round trips, in each of which she has brought out over 400 bales of cotton pledged to the redemption of bonds. This conversion of the bonds is open to all the holders, and the success of the Denbigh has caused her example to be very extensively imitated. The particular scheme to which the Economist refers as 'crude and financially unsound,' is probably one which the Confederate Government discouraged for this very reason, but this scheme proposed to absorb nearly the whole loan, and to make the Government a sharer in the profits of the enterprises. The Confederate Government, besides being in principle averse to partnership transactions, has no interest in withdrawing the loan, which, despite many fluctuations, has been in the main eminently successful, from the market. The only interest it could have in doing so would be to place a new loan, and this, in the opinion of the Confederate Government, is unnecessary, and the Congress, before its adjournment, declined to give the requisite authority. But if holders, at their private risk, wish to convert the bonds into cotton at 6d. per pound, the Government not only cannot prevent them, but is in honour bound to give them all necessary and reasonable facilities; and of this an increasing number of persons interested in blockade-running continue to avail themselves. This is, doubtless, the true reason of the steady rise in the loan, and it is supposed that but little remains in the market except what had been purchased, generally in moderate amounts and for permanent investment, at the issue price, and which, therefore, the holders will not part with, even at the comparatively high quotations of the last few weeks.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

American Government and Railway Securities are more depressed than ever, and scarcely any business is now transacted in them, and under present circumstances there appears very little chance of improvement. Except under special orders, the dealers may be said to be out of the market. The only transactions recorded during the week have been in United States Six per Cents., at 60; Virginia State Six per Cents., at 34 and 32½; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvanian Section, at 74; Erie Shares, $100, all paid, at 59; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, 28 and 29 dis.; and do. do. all paid, 66.

BANK MEETINGS.

At an extraordinary general meeting of the Bank of London, Sir J. V. Shelley in the chair, it was agreed to increase the capital of the bank by the sum of 200,000l., to be issued at 70l. per share premium. The Chairman said he was sure it would be admitted on all hands, that the success obtained by the bank was most satisfactory. A larger business had rendered an increase in the capital necessary, and he believed that the premiums to be obtained on the new shares would, by the increase made to the reserve fund, tend greatly to confirm public confidence.—At an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Mexican Bank, with which is amalgamated the London and South American Bank, Mr. J. Paterson in the chair, it was resolved to alter the name of the Company to 'The London Bank of Mexico and South America,' and also to amend the articles of association, in order to prevent the monies of the Company being invested in its own shares.—At the third annual general meeting of the London and South African Bank, a dividend for the half-year ending 31st December last, on the original capital, at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, free of income tax, was declared.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Notwithstanding the agitated state of the money market business in the railway share market has been rather brisk; but although in the early part of the week prices were much depressed, a considerable improvement has taken place since the money market became more settled. As compared with the quotations of this day week, there has been an advance in Metropolitan of 3½ per cent., in Midland of 2½ per cent., of 1 per cent. in Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, North Staffordshire, and Vale of Neath; of ¾ per cent. in North British, and of ½ per cent. in Caledonian, Great Eastern, London and North Western, and North Eastern (York). On the other hand, there has been a decline of 1 per cent. in London, Brighton, and South Coast, and Shropshire Union, of ¾ in London, Chatham, and Dover, and of ½ per cent. in North Eastern (Berwick). The dealings in foreign railway shares have been to a fair extent, with a slight improvement in prices, and for those connected with British possessions rather more business has been doing, and quotations are well sustained.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the annual meeting of the Trust and Agency Company of Australia, a dividend of 7½ per cent. free of income-tax was declared, making a total distribution for the year of nearly 10½ per cent.—At a meeting of the shareholders in the City of London Brewery it was agreed to authorise the issue of 24,000 shares of 5l. each, to rank as ordinary shares. At the annual general meeting of the proprietors of the Vauxhall Bridge Company, the report, which was unanimously adopted, showed a decrease in the receipts during the year of 27l. 10s. 11d. A dividend of 17s. per share free of income-tax was agreed to. The purchase money is 13,000l., and the vendors guarantee a minimum dividend of 10 per cent. per annum, for three years.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The recent advance in the value of money has put a sudden stop to the issue of the prospectuses of the new companies, which have been so prolific of late, only one or two, and those of minor importance, having been put forth during the week, the chief being that of the Cadiz, Oporto, and Light Wine Association (Limited). The capital is placed at 150,000l. in 15,000 shares of 10l. each, of which 10,000 shares have been privately subscribed for, the remaining 5,000 being now offered to the public. The object is to acquire and carry on a business which has been conducted for several years by an association bearing a similar name, and which is described as 'exceedingly profitable.'

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

With diminished stringency in money, the produce markets are becoming more animated, and whilst purchases of some of the primary articles have already extended perceptibly, prices have in several instances improved. During the last day or two cotton has been very active, the closing transactions showing an advance of ½d. to 1d. per pound on the rates of the previous week. The colonial wool sales, which will offer over 100,000 bales, are progressing with considerable spirit, at fully the rates of the previous series to 1d. per lb. advance for combing descriptions. Russian hemp is firmer, and a fair trade is passing. Clean is quoted 35l. to 37l. per ton. At the decline quoted last week jute is more saleable, both on the spot and for arrival. The quarterly sales of East India indigo, comprising 9,343 chests, have opened at an advance of 2d. or 3d. on the rates of last auctions for Bengal and Kurpah, and also for the better qualities of Oudes and plant Oudes. Dry leaf Madras is saleable only at a small discount. Other dye stuffs are inactive; cochineal has declined 1d. per lb. for Mexican, and 1d. to 2d. for Teneriffe grain. No particular change has occurred in the petroleum market; 2s. 3d. per gallon is still the price for American refined; crude is quoted 19l. per ton. The provision trade continues dull in most departments, with very little variation in prices. American bacon is firm, and there is a moderately good demand for boneless middles. Lard is still extremely dull. Cheese moves off slowly at 52s. to 60s. for American. Linseed oil, after receding to 38s. 6d., to-day advanced to 40s. Rape oil is also firmer, brown having made 41s. 6d. to 42s. per cwt. Sperm oil remains inactive at 73s. for foreign fishing. Common fish oils offer on easier terms, owing to recent favourable reports from the Greenland seal fishery. Palm oil sells steadily at 35s. 6d. to 36s. per cwt. In drugs and chemicals there is not a great deal doing, and prices show scarcely any change. Exceptionally sulphate of quinine has been purchased rather extensively at 6s. to 6s. 1d. for French. Camphor remains quoted 100s. to 105s. per cwt. Gums of all kinds are in steady request at full rates. The spice market is not active, but quotations of cloves, nutmegs, and ginger are well maintained. Cassia lignea and pepper have sold on slightly easier terms. Sugar has been very dull of sale until the last two days, when rather an extensive demand sprang up, resulting in an advance of fully 6*d*., and in some instances 1*s*. per cwt. Floating cargoes have been most in request. Ceylon coffee has also risen 1*s*. on plantation kinds, and Rio continues firm.

LIVERPOOL, WEDNESDAY, MAY 11.

The improved state of monetary affairs has given quite a reinvigorating appearance to the Cotton Market here. Business has greatly improved within the last few days, and prices have again advanced considerably, with a tendency to a still further improvement. A large quantity has been taken by the manufacturers, and a larger quantity than usual for exportation and on speculation, the total sales having reached 72,000 bales, of which there were taken for speculation and for export 26,500 bales. The total sales this year have been 901,110 bales, and to the same period last year 725,300 bales. The imports this year have reached 792,110 bales, and in 1863 they were 463,414 bales. The exports this year have been 133,091, against 135,829 bales last year. For consumption there have been taken this year 532,600 bales, and in 1863 381,800 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 125,910 bales; last year the number was 176,180 bales. The computed stocks at the present time are 357,600 bales, and at the same period in 1863 they were 328,220 bales. The latest quotations to-day were: American descriptions, 26¼*d*. to 28¾*d*.; Panamas, 29*d*. to 29½*d*.; Maranhams, 28½*d*. to 29*d*.; Maceio and Bahia, 27½*d*. to 27¾*d*.; Egyptian, 28¼*d*. to 31½*d*.; Smyrna, 22½*d*. to 24½*d*.; Surats, 13½*d*. to 21*d*.; China, 19*d*. to 19½*d*.; and Peruvian, 28½*d*. to 29*d*.

The improved and agitated state of the Liverpool Cotton Market has had a corresponding effect upon the Manchester markets, and for most descriptions of goods a large business has been transacted. In shipping yarns the dealings have been very extensive for all descriptions, and the advance may be quoted ½*d*. to 1*d*. per lb., purchases having been made for all the markets, particularly those of India, Germany, and the Mediterranean. There has also been more doing for the home markets, but only at very extreme rates, the advance being quite equal to that on shipping yarns. In the cloth market there has not been quite so much doing, buyers showing but little disposition to meet the high rates demanded by the manufacturers. The improved aspect of affairs, however, has increased the pretensions of sellers. Buyers still express their willingness to operate, particularly for goods in stock, at the old rates, but they appear quite indisposed to give anything like the increased rates at present demanded by manufacturers. In fact the great advance demanded has put a very material check on business.

NAVAL EXPERIMENTS.—A letter from on board the new United States gunboat Metacomet (double-ender), states that on the passage from Key West to New Orleans she rolled tremendously, so that she was momentarily expected to go down. Her pilot-house and foremast were swept away, and two or three of the guns were shifted. When she reached the Mississippi she was so crippled as to be unfit for active service until thoroughly overhauled on the dry dock.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.—A return has just been published of claims of British subjects against the United States Government, from the commencement of the civil war to March 31, 1864. There were 450 claims and 2,871 despatches and letters to and from the Foreign Office. A memorandum states that this return comprises the result of the fullest examination of the correspondence in the Foreign Office, and is believed to be complete as far as that correspondence goes. In order, however, to [illegible] prejudice which might result to British claimants from their claims not being inserted in this list, it is necessary to observe that the return is not to be taken as conclusive, and this reserve is the more necessary inasmuch as it is understood that numerous claims have been registered in the British Mission at Washington, though not reported home, which may not even yet be brought before the Government of the United States.

GENERAL FAIDHERBE, Governor of Senegal, has sent to the Jardin d'Acclimatation some chrysalides of a new silkworm discovered in that country; the scientific name of the moth is Bauhinia reticulata; the grub feeds on a plant spelled (we dare not say pronounced) [illegible], which grows there in great abundance; the fly is a contrast to our old friend the silkworm moth, being rather more than three inches broad, white in colour, with a broad purple and yellow border, and a large blue eye at the point of each wing; it is a variety of the Bombyx Atlas. The silk is naturally grey, brilliant, and very strong; some specimens of it were to be seen in the London International Exhibition of 1862.

THE REMOVAL OF BRITISH CONSULS FROM THE CONFEDERATE STATES. The official correspondence respecting the removal of British Consuls from the Confederate States, was presented to the House of Lords yesterday. The letters which, irrespective of enclosures, are twelve in number, range in date from June 9 to November 20, 1863. They refer to the removal of Mr. Moore from Richmond, Mr. Cridland from Mobile, Mr. Walker from Charleston, and Mr. Fullarton from Savannah. The correspondence was moved for on April 5 last. A return moved for at the same time of all copies or extracts of all correspondence with any agents of the Confederate States in this country, was also presented to the House of Lords yesterday. It consists of letters exchanged between Earl Russell and Mason, and extending from March 2 to October 6, 1863.

In the Palais de l'Industrie of the Champs Elysées is a very curious collection of poisons from the west coast of Africa; among these is the remarkable plant called the 'bean of ordeal,' or, botanically, physostigma venenosum: it is used by the monarchs of Old Calabar as a cheap substitute for the judge and jury required by the formalities of colder climates. When prosecutor and prisoner come before the king, he administers to each a bean, whether poisonous or not he himself knows not at the time. One party dies, sometimes both, and judgment is delivered accordingly. The bean is also used for executions; the king reserves to himself the possession of the plants producing this useful fruit. The medicinal value of the poison has been discovered by an Edinburgh physician, and it has been found of great use to produce a contraction of the pupil of the eye, the contrary of [illegible] belladonna, whose property it is to dilate the pupil.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

BUST OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE only Bust extant of the President of the Confederate States, modelled by Volk, at Richmond, and the most faithful Likeness of this eminent Statesman, has been kindly lent by the owner for reproduction for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund of Liverpool. In conformity with the intentions of the donor, the Bust has been registered under the Designs Act, and a number of casts (quarter size), limited to 500, are offered to the public at the following rates:—

Plaster . . . . . . 5s. 0d.
Ditto Enameled . . . . . 7s. 6d.
A l'Ivoire (composition of Wax and Plaster) . 10s. 6d.
Carriage free to all parts of the United Kingdom.

The Bust may be seen at the studio of JAMES REDFERN, Esq., 29 Clipstone Street, Fitzroy Square, W., who will also receive orders to execute it in marble; and at the INDEX OFFICE, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

The proceeds of the sale of the 500 casts being for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund, all orders must be addressed, and money orders made payable, to Mr. HENRY HOTZE, 17 Savile Row, W.

THE Presidential election occupies more space in the Northern papers than the great and momentous campaign in Virginia. There are those who believe either that General Grant will be prevented from moving on Richmond, or that his defeat will be insured, to prevent his becoming a too formidable rival to the present occupant of the Presidential chair. Others hold that Mr. Lincoln must have military success to insure his nomination. Every way the situation is becoming alarming. The President has taken the responsibility, and he is held to it. He has made himself the Government, and is called to account for its misdeeds. Too fast for the Conservatives, too slow for the Radicals, and surrounded by ambitious and unscrupulous aspirants to the position he has abused, only the military power can save him, and that, perhaps, will be the first to destroy him. The war is almost forgotten in the fight of Northern factions. General Fremont is about to assemble his Radical, Red-Republican, and German admirers at Cleveland, Ohio, to nominate him leader of the 'new nation.' Mr. Chase, vainly trying to lay the gold demon in Wall Street, is accused in Washington of favouritism, corruption, and treachery, and of connivance at the grossest frauds and the most shameless debauchery. Major-General Blair accused him of crimes which should hurl him from office if they did not consign him to a penitentiary, and the President endorses his charges by appointing him to an important post in the army. Mr. Chase threatens to resign, but holds on to a place in which he can enrich his friends with greenbacks, if not with gold. Mr. Brooks, of New York, followed up the attack of General Blair with charges against the Treasury department of profligacies which he would not describe while there were ladies in the gallery!

FEDERAL officers have resorted to the use of torture upon their unhappy victims. A correspondent of the New York Daily News gives an account of the use of the cold douche to extort testimony at Washington, and the Albany Evening Journal alludes in the following matter-of-course way to the use of the thumb-screws, a horrible mode of torture:—'Johnson, the deserter, after the thumb-screws had been put to him at the barracks, owned up yesterday. He said that he enlisted in this city, and gave the number of the regiment to which he belonged. He escaped from the barracks.'

A VERY important decision has been made in the Philadelphia Court of Common Pleas, in which it was held that the Treasury notes of the Federal Government are not legal tender for the extinguishment of a ground-rent where the covenant required lawful money of the United States. This ruling, if confirmed by the higher courts, may lead to important consequences.

MR. CLAY, an Administrative Member of Congress from Kentucky, in a speech on the treatment of the negro, denounced the cruelties to which he has been subjected by the Federal civil and military authorities. 'Thousands of contrabands,' he said, 'were dying in camps of all diseases ever described or imagined. They are rotting in filth. Such mortality is the result of your system. You care no more for the negro than you do for a horse. I would rather be a slaveholder than a robber, stealing all over the country. The system inaugurated is worse than the system of slavery. More money is required to carry it out than it costs to provide for the slaves of the South.' The Boston Courier remarks: 'This is a very strong denunciation of the philanthropists, who carry on the war to emancipate the negro and then leave him to perish, but it is just. They care nothing for humanity, but seek to indulge their spite. It is robbery and murder, not honourable warfare.'

THE Washington correspondent of the Cincinnati Enquirer says the President has received information that a fleet of ironclad rams and gunboats of the most approved structure is ready to come out of the James River, and not only destroy Washington, but threaten Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. This is one of the many excuses for the panic now pervading the Administration circles.

THE charges against Mr. Chase, Secretary of the Federal Treasury, brought by General Blair, brother of another member of the Cabinet, and Mr. Brooks, of New York, and which are of so serious a character as to demand a committee of investigation, are the employment of men of bad reputations in his department, giving permits to buy cotton of and sell supplies to the enemy, enriching his friends, relations, and agents to the amount of millions, and selecting venal, corrupt, and purchasable men to carry into effect his trade regulations. There is also a charge of quartering a large section of the 'social evil' on the Government, as female clerks in the Treasury department.

FORGERY appears to be growing more and more in favour in Federal politics and diplomacy. The forged report of the Confederate Secretary of the Navy, palmed by Mr. Seward upon Earl Russell, has been blandly confessed by the Federal diplomatist as the ingenious fabrication of a 'gentleman of New York.' A few weeks ago, a member of the House of Representatives at Washington made some charges of corrupt malfeasance against General Blair, a fellow-member, supported by documents which were proven to be forgeries; and now it is settled that the letters produced in the House by General Garfield, purporting to have been written by J. S. Davis and D. R. Eckles, of Indiana, were also forgeries. The Indianapolis Sentinel states that they were written at the desk in the office of a hotel in that city, and that they were fabricated for the spy Rankin in the hope that they might protect him in case he fell into Confederate hands.

'Go where we will,' says the New York Commercial—'to Charleston, Ringgold, Olustee, Meridian, Camden, or up the Red River—we find a force confronting us sufficiently large to accept battle.' It might have added that, according to Federal reports, this force always meets them in 'overwhelming numbers.' One of Mr. Lincoln's grim jokes was to tell an anxious enquirer that the Confederate armies must amount to three millions, because he had a million himself, and wherever he sent his troops they were met and beaten by three times their number. Another paper accounts for the 'backbone of the rebellion' still remaining unbroken by the fact that 'the Southerners have an immense and fruitful territory, have slaves to raise the necessaries of life, and, as all legitimate business has been destroyed, the whole arms-bearing population can take to the field.'

THE Northern ladies are coming to the relief of Mr. Chase and the Federal Treasury by forming a league, and pledging themselves to purchase no goods of foreign importation during the war—no tea or coffee, silks or laces, jewels or ornaments from foreign parts. The gold is to be kept at home; but these fair ladies have no idea of bating their extravagances. At a masquerade ball in Madison Square, where everything was as gorgeous as if there were no war, or debt, or depreciated greenbacks, the hostess appeared in a coronal of living flame. Attached to her hoop-skirt was a small gasometer, and a connecting pipe, passing up between the elaborate braids of her back hair, secured the brilliant triumph at the risk of the wearer's life.

GENERAL MAGRUDER, who has a reputation in the Trans-Mississippi department very similar to that acquired by Stonewall Jackson in Virginia, is reported to have an army in Texas, 30,000 strong, on the Guadaloupe, Colorado, and Brazos rivers, with 5,000 at Galveston. Texas having been almost entirely abandoned by the Federals, its army will be free to cooperate with the Confederate forces in Louisiana.

THE health of General Johnston's army is reported to be excellent, and the hospitals in the south-west are almost emptied. The army was being filled up with sturdy young recruits, who, as soon as they arrive at the military age, hasten to join their fathers and brothers in the camp. Food is so abundant, that West Alabama and East Mississippi alone could supply the whole Confederacy with corn and nearly with pork, if it were not for the difficulties in transportation.

WHILE the chief of the Federal Treasury is in hot water at Washington, some of his subordinates at New York are not comfortable. Their offence is having received bribes of Confederate agents to permit the shipment of supplies for the Southern States. These transactions having come to the knowledge of a gentleman engaged in the laudable occupation of counterfeiting the bonds of the Confederate States, he was arrested by an order procured from Washington, and shut up for four months in Fort Lafayette, to get rid of his testimony. Thus this gentleman forger was prevented from serving his country by circulating counterfeit bonds, while the officers of the Government were pocketing heavy bribes for conniving at treason. These precious scoundrels, high and low, seem to be quarrelling so violently, that honest men have a prospect of hearing the truth.

THE sudden increase of the exorbitant duties of the Morrill tariff, fifty per cent. for sixty days, was one of those effects of pressure and panic which sometimes produce indescribable confusion. The entire commercial press of all parties condemns it as unjust, useless, and mischievous. The effect has been, to empty the bonded warehouses before the act became a law, to raise the price of goods, to put enormous profits into the pockets of American manufacturers and holders of heavy stocks of goods, to cause smuggling on a large scale, to paralyse commerce, irritate merchants, and not to increase the revenue.

THE New York Herald of May 4 says, with a quiet irony which, we suspect, is scarcely appreciated in the North, of the situation in Virginia, and the rumours of movements and battles:—'We are told that the only fear is that General Lee will "attempt to escape" from his position before General Grant moves upon his works. It may be a vague fear, however, which need not distress those who are anxious upon the question. It is far more likely that such a sagacious strategist as Lee has proved himself will not change his base, except it be for a stronger position.'

As a preparation for a battle in Virginia, fifteen car loads of sick and wounded soldiers in the hospitals of Washington were sent North, and additional accommodations provided for twenty thousand.

WHILE Mr. Chase is violently attacked in the House of Representatives, a commission has been appointed to examine into the conduct of General Butler, who has been regulating preachers, bankers, and schoolmistresses at Norfolk, and gorging himself on greenbacks, if reports are true, from every possible source of plunder. His claims to a presidential nomination are easily disposed of. Theft may not be a disqualification for the presidency, but being found out is, and General Butler is no longer feared as a candidate.

THE Federal senate has rejected an amendment to the National Bank Bill, requiring the redemption of notes in specie six months after the rebellion shall be crushed, considering, possibly, that such a clause would be equivalent to an indefinite postponement.

THE pay of the Federal troops has been raised to sixteen dollars a month, and the negro raised to an equality, in pay and rations, with his white comrades. But sixteen dollars in greenbacks, now worth little more than half that amount in money, may soon be much less, and not enough to tempt black or white men to risk their lives in a useless contest.

THE Confederate Colonel Ponors, with two hundred cavalry, is reported to have dashed into Port Hudson, killed and wounded ninety Federals, and captured one gun and nineteen prisoners.

THE Confederate ram Roanoke, which did such good service at the capture of Plymouth, North Carolina, and which may have joined the rams in the Neuse, in the attack on Newbern, appears to possess extraordinary powers of resistance; for Federal officers report that several pointed steel bolts were fired at her, from the Miami, at not more than twenty feet distance, without making the least impression.

THE rear of General Beauregard's army, consisting of the reserves from South Carolina we presume, is said to have passed through Petersburg, Virginia, on the 30th ult. General Lee is reported to have a well-equipped cavalry force of 22,000.

A fire in Wilmington is said to have consumed property to the value of $5,000,000, including a cotton press and several thousand bales of cotton.

The first act of the Federal troops in the campaign of Virginia was characteristic. It was to burn the beautiful village of Madison Court House—a harmless rural village, with beautiful residences and delightful scenery, having a population of about 1,000 persons, made homeless by this Vandal atrocity. The pretext of justification was that a squad of Confederates, driven by a superior force of Federals, used some of the houses to defend themselves—a thing that has happened, we presume, in almost every town in Europe. This destruction, however, is in accordance with the doctrine laid down in a recent letter of General Sherman, in which he asserts that the Northerners have a right to take the lives and property of the whole Southern people.

The Federals have evacuated Washington, North Carolina, without waiting to be attacked, and it was rumoured that the Confederates had invested Newbern. North Carolina, with its great sweep of rivers and bays, is almost freed from the invader.

Admiral Wilkes has been sentenced by a naval court-martial to be publicly reprimanded, and suspended from the service for three years. This is the gentleman who received ovations for having taken the Confederate Commissioners from a British mail steamer. His offences appear to have been failing to capture the Alabama, and speaking disrespectfully of Secretary Welles.

General Forrest is said to have gathered recruits in West Tennessee and Kentucky, to the number of 12,000 or 15,000, and to have joined General Johnston at Dalton, who was expecting an attack from the Federals. Another rumour represents him as about to attack Memphis.

Taking gunboats with cavalry appears to be a regular portion of Confederate tactics. The Federal gunboat Petrel was boarded and captured, April 23, near Yazoo City, by a portion of General Wirt Adams's cavalry. General Adams's force is estimated at 3,000 to 5,000, operating chiefly against steamboats on the Lower Mississippi and its branches.

General Banks has not only reestablished slavery in Louisiana, with all its hardships of enforced labour, and without its modifying and beneficent features, but he has reorganised the slave trade; and negroes, escaped from their masters, and who imagined they were free under Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, are captured by Federal soldiers, confined in gaols, and then sold for ten dollars a head to speculating Yankees who have seized upon Southern plantations.

The military movements in Virginia, up to May 4, seem to have been only obscurely guessed at. General Grant appeared to be concentrating all available forces for an advance on Richmond, but the wary Confederates, while bringing troops from Charleston to Richmond, did not forget that there was a Federal army in Tennessee, and that Atlanta was to be guarded as well as the capital. According to the most reliable statements, General Lee, with an army of 90,000 men, was strengthening the line of the Rapidan, extending from the Blue Ridge, about forty miles to the Rappahannock; and here it seemed probable that he would await the attack of the Federal Commander-in-Chief, while a smaller force, commanded perhaps by General Beauregard, would dispute an advance up the Peninsula.

The Federal disasters in Louisiana have not been exaggerated. General Banks may or may not be removed from his command, but he is removed far enough from competing with Mr. Lincoln as a candidate for the Presidency. A sudden fall in the Red River, aided by the diversion of its waters into one of the bayous of the great delta of the Mississippi, has left Federal ironclads aground, and Federal transports above the falls, in imminent peril of capture. Some of the gunboats had already been attacked by infantry.

There are rumours that the column of General Steele was at Camden, entrenched, and awaiting reinforcements, which can scarcely be sent. The mendacious New Orleans Government papers, which have invented for General Banks battles never fought, and victories never won, reported that General Steele had taken Shreveport, a place quite impregnable to any Federal force now west of the Mississippi.

ENGLAND.

The Conference met on Tuesday last. All the members were present. After a lengthened discussion, the meeting adjourned until Saturday the 28th inst. We understand that the Austrian and Prussian representatives have formally intimated that their Governments consider themselves released by the war from all the obligations of the Treaty of London.

The Queen left Windsor Castle on Friday last for Balmoral, where she arrived on the afternoon of Saturday. Her Majesty was accompanied by Prince Leopold and Princesses Helena, Louise, and Beatrice.

Her Majesty the Queen held a Court at Buckingham Palace on May 11. On the evening of the same day a State concert was given, to which about 800 persons were invited. Madlle. Titiens, Madame Parepa, Mr. Santley, Signor Giuglini, and Herr Mayerhofer were the principal singers. Mr. Anderson conducted. The Princess of Wales held a Drawing-room at St. James's Palace on Saturday. On Thursday last the Earl of Granville gave a soirée in the new courts of the South Kensington Museum. The Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duchess and Princess Mary of Cambridge, and about 1,000 guests, were present.

Mr. Kelk has commenced the works in connection with the Albert Memorial. The excavations for the foundation in Hyde Park, opposite the Horticultural Gardens, are in course of progress. The memorial will be 160 feet in height, and the base of it 130 feet square. There will be a double flight of steps of grey granite. The basement of the memorial proper will be of marble, and the figures thereon will be in high relief and of life size. The columns supporting the superstructure will consist of groups of red granite pillars. Beneath the canopy will be placed the statue of the Prince Consort, who will be seated on a chair in robes of state. The figure will be formed on such a scale that if erect it would attain to the height of 30 feet. The spire which terminates the canopy will be built of red and grey granite and Darley Dale stone. The surmounting cross will be of copper gilt. The work will occupy four years in completion, and Mr. Kelk has contracted to finish it for the sum of 120,000*l*.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Montpensier, with their family and suite, arrived at Southampton on Monday last, on board the Spanish war steamer Isabella Secunda. Their Royal Highnesses are staying at Claremont.

The Ladies' Polish Committee in London have received an earnest and pitiable appeal from the Ladies' Committee at Cracow. The letter bears date May 1. It states that the Committee is at the end of its means, and that doubt of ultimate victory is still far from them. They, therefore, as the wives and sisters of the martyrs to their holy cause of liberty and civilisation, address the ladies of Great Britain. They have given all they possessed, even to their marriage rings. The prisons overflow with victims of both sexes nearly deprived of clothing and medical assistance. Many ladies have been imprisoned for attending their wounded relatives, and these, if discovered, are given up to the Russian authorities. The Committee then once more calls for aid. Madame Schwabe and the Countess of Shaftesbury are Treasurers of the Polish Fund. Messrs. Ransom, Bouverie & Co., and Messrs. Barnett, Hoare & Co., receive subscriptions.

Five ships belonging to the Channel squadron arrived in Plymouth Sound from the Downs on Friday afternoon: namely, the Edgar, 71, Captain Hornby, Flag of Rear-Admiral Dacres, C. B.; the Black Prince, 41, Captain Wainwright; the Warrior, 40, Captain Cochrane; Defence, 16, Captain Phillimore; and the Prince Consort, 35, Captain Willis, C. B. The ammunition and shells were discharged from the Warrior and Defence, and they were docked on Saturday. The Black Prince and the Prince Consort were also to be docked. The officers of the squadron were not, however, expecting to stay more than ten days at Plymouth.

The pilot-boat Whisper put in at Plymouth on May 11, and landed Captain Howes, his wife and two children, three officers, the steward, and some of the crew of the ship Avon, of Boston, United States, 151 tons. The Avon was captured on March 20, in lat. 14° 40′ N., long. 33° W., by the Confederate war steamer Florida, Captain Morris. The Avon had a cargo of guano from Holland Island in the Pacific, and was bound for Queenstown. After her crew, provisions, &c., had been removed, she was set on fire. Captain Howes was put on board the Francis Milly, Captain Eynon, from the Mauritius. Ten of the crew of the Avon joined the Florida.

The memorial submitted last year to Earl Russell with reference to the Foreign Enlistment Act by certain shipowners of Liverpool has been followed by a petition to the same effect to the House of Commons. The petition has been forwarded to Mr. Horsfall for presentation. It has been signed by all the firms which signed the memorial, with one exception. The document declares that the petitioners view with dismay the future consequences of a state of affairs which permits a foreign belligerent to construct in British ports and send to sea vessels of war in contravention of the provisions of the law; that the effect of placing at the disposal of the foreign belligerent a small number of steam cruisers has been to paralyse the mercantile marine of a powerful maritime and naval nation, inflicting within a few months losses direct and indirect on its shipowning and mercantile interests which years of peace may prove inadequate to retrieve. The document then proceeds to contemplate the dangers which threaten England in the event of her becoming a belligerent from the like cause, and states that the sea carrying trade will inevitably be transferred to neutral flags to the ruin of the petitioners. A regret is next expressed at the successful attempts made to evade the Act, and a hope that the law will be amended by the English Parliament, and efforts made to induce other Powers to adopt similar regulations.

On Monday last, Mr. Laird, M.P. for Birkenhead, laid the foundation-stone of the Birkenhead Workmen's Hall. This undertaking is being carried out by a Working Men's Company. The building is to be of great size, and will contain reading, smoking, and coffee rooms, a lecture room, and a large hall. Mr. Laird, in the performance of the ceremony, said that this would be the most complete building of the kind in England, and that the success of the undertaking was mainly to be attributed to the fact that persons of all shades of opinion had cooperated in its accomplishment.

The Rev. James Amiraux Jeremie, D.D., the Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, has been nominated by the Crown to the Deanery of Lincoln, vacant by the elevation of Dr. Jeune to the Bishopric of Peterborough. Mr. Jeremie was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which society he became a Fellow. He was ordained in 1830, and appointed Professor of Classical Literature in the East India College at Haileybury. In 1833 he was elected Christian Advocate in the University of Cambridge. In 1848 he was made sub-dean and canon residentiary in Lincoln Cathedral, and in 1849 he was appointed by Lord John Russell to the Regius Professorship. Dr. Jeremie is the author of the articles on 'The History of Rome from Constantine to the death of Julian,' and 'The History of the Church in the second and third Centuries,' in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, and of a great number of pamphlets and sermons on various theological questions. He preached the Latin sermon at St. Paul's, at the Assembly of Convocation in 1852, and in 1862 he preached in the French language to a large congregation of foreigners in Westminster Abbey. The appointment of Dr. Jeremie to the Deanery will give universal satisfaction.

Of the numberless parties who celebrated Whitsun Monday by keeping high holiday, there were few who had so rich an opportunity of enjoying their holiday as the three battalions of Volunteers who were brigaded at Leatherhead under Colonel McMurdo. Not even the plenteous dust of the high road between the station and the Downs sufficed to spoil the poetry of that beautiful woodland scenery, in which every shade of green, every variety of foliage, every most exquisite undulation of landscape combined under the glorious May sun to form a picture which made Englishmen thrill with pride. The Inns of Court, four companies of the London Rifle Brigade, the 2nd and 8th Tower Hamlets, and the 20th Middlesex (the two latter being formed into one battalion) were the corps which took advantage of so fair an occasion. The Inns of Court were the first on the ground, and were immediately sent out in pickets to watch the edge of the brush-wood covering the south of the position. On the arrival of the remaining battalions the brigade was formed facing to the east, and after a few preliminary movements advanced in line to meet the supposed enemy. The ground was eminently favourable to cavalry, who, of course, seized the opportunity to make a charge on our lines; but the wily brigadier, disdaining the obsolete formation of square, threw his flank battalions into echelon of companies, formed four deep, and prepared to receive the attack in that formation. It is needless to say that a well-directed fire emptied the opposite saddles, and completely checked the advance of the supposed horsemen. The brigade then changed their front to the right and advanced up a slight incline. The London Rifles were thrown out in skirmishing order to cover the front. The tide of war rolled over the plain with steady progress. Soon the skirmishers were in the midst of the brushwood, driving the enemy before them relentlessly; but beyond the brushwood and between that and the skirts of the forest beyond was an open space, on which the shattered lines of the enemy might be re-formed. The 'Devil's Own' stole off towards the right, and found a narrow but practicable passage through the yews and juniper, leaving the line of skirmishers to their left. They gained the open space in the nick of time, just as the enemy had been driven in on the left. The shouts of the victorious Tower Hamlets were heard as the head of the column emerged from the brush. The brigade re-formed, and again advanced on the luckless foe; a few volleys were exchanged, and the whole line advanced in a magnificent charge, driving all that remained of the opposers into the shelter of the forest. Enough, even of victory, is as good as a feast; the brigade prudently retired to its original ground as fresh forces came on to the attack. One more charge down the southern hill, and the enemy was taught, on that side at least, the Leatherhead Downs were not to be taken. The brigade then formed mass, and were addressed by Colonel M'Murdo. He said that he had put the Volunteers on that day to a hard trial by ordering the execution of divers brigade movements 'on the move,' an ordeal to which even line regiments were not subjected. He made some remarks on the peculiar brigade formation used that day to receive cavalry. He thought that in these days of Enfield rifles the old formation of squares was passing away. No cavalry would dare to attack except in front; any flank movement on their part must be made on the circumference of a wide circle, of which the infantry would be the centre, and would consequently be exposed to a continuous and murderous fire. If by chance a flank attack was made, the flank battalions, being in echelon, could be quickly wheeled back to meet it. The field day thus ended, under the last rays of the sun, the battalions returned to the station, whence they came, tired but merry, covered with glory and dust.

Before the publication of our next number, the great event of the year in sporting circles will have been decided. The race for the Derby Stakes at Epsom promises to be of unusual interest, for it is difficult to point to a year in which the number of really magnificent competitors has been so great. We think it right, therefore, to give the names of the horses that now attract public attention, with the state of the betting. Lord Glasgow's General Peel, by Young Melbourne, his dam by Orlando out of Brown Bess, is first favourite at the odds of 5 to 1, his position as such being of course due to the victory in the Two Thousand Guineas Stakes at Newmarket. Captain White's Cambuscan by Newminster out of The Arrow, bred at Her Majesty's paddocks at Hampton Court, and sold last year at Lord Stamford's sale for 5,100*l*., presses hard on General Peel at the odds of 6 to 1. Cambuscan won the July Stakes and the Croome Stakes last year at Newmarket. Next comes the Scottish Chief, by Lord of the Isles out of Miss Ann, the property of Mr. Merry, the winner last year of the First Biennial Stakes at Ascot and of the Chesterfield Stakes at Newmarket.

The odds against Scottish Chief are 7 to 1. Next follows Lord Westmoreland's Birch Broom, by Idle Boy out of Bavaria, who beat twenty-six horses last year at Ascot for the Maiden Plate, and also won the Two-year-old Stakes at Hampton Court. The odds against Birch Broom are 8 to 1. Then follows Coastguard, by Saunterer, out of Lady Elizabeth, the property of Mr. Naylor, who last year won the Derby with Maccaroni. Coastguard won the Gimcrack Stakes last year at York, and also a sweepstakes at Doncaster, beating Prince Arthur and Fille de l'Air, and the odds against him are 12 to 1. Against Mr. R. Ten Broeck's Paris, the son of Mildew and Daisy, who ran second for the Two Thousand Guineas, the odds are 14 to 1. This horse won the Findon and the Mersey Stakes last year at Goodwood. Next follows Mr. W. I'Anson's Blair Athol, who has never yet ran, but who boasts for his sire the renowned Stockwell, and for his dam Blink Bonny; thus combining in his blood the prestige of victory in the four great races, for Stockwell won the Two Thousand Guineas and the St. Leger, while Blink Bonny won the Derby and Oaks. These are the most notable of the colts who will contest the great prize at Epsom on Wednesday next. We shall not hazard a prophecy on the result, but content ourselves with stating that the event will probably be very much in accordance with the betting; for the market this year seems to take a very just estimate of the merits of the horses. Our anticipations on the Two Thousand Guineas proved true to the letter; but to anticipate the result of a Derby is a more daring enterprise.

THE Court of Aldermen of the City of London has been thrown into a complete state of panic by the introduction of a bill into the House of Commons. From time 'whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary,' that honourable Court has held and exercised a stringent control over persons following the calling of 'brokers' within the City. To obtain admission it was necessary to show to the Court, by a certificate signed by six respectable merchants, that the applicant was a man of fitness and integrity, and on admission the broker entered into a bond for himself in the penalty of 1,000*l.* and two sureties in 250*l.* for the honest execution of his office, and also pledged himself by a solemn oath that he would truly and faithfully perform his work 'between party and party, and in all things appertaining to it, without fraud or collusion, to the best of his skill and knowledge.' Moreover, the Court took cognisance of the behaviour of the brokers, more especially with a view of preventing them from being dealers and brokers at one and the same time. The brokers have now promoted a bill before Parliament entirely abolishing the jurisdiction of the Court of Aldermen in this respect, and therewith sweeping away fees heretofore payable to the corporation to the amount of 5,000*l.* a year. On the merits of the question, it is urged on the one hand that the supervision of the Court is necessary to secure to the trader not only honesty on the part of the broker, but also to prevent the broker from indulging in business on his own account. On the other hand, it is said that if the broker act fraudulently, the person wronged can appeal to the law of the land and obtain more satisfactory redress than he can from the Court of Aldermen; and if the broker chose to act in the double capacity of broker and merchant, his clients would soon find him out, and his business would suffer in consequence. The Lord Mayor lately presided at a meeting of the Aldermen, and an animated debate ensued, in which Messrs. Aldermen Rose, M.P., and Copeland, M.P., ably upheld the privileges of the Court, and a motion was carried that a copy of the bill, with the evidence adduced before the Committee, should be furnished to the members of the Court. Much indignation was caused by the discovery that three Aldermen had given evidence not unfavourable to the bill, and that neither the City Remembrancer nor the City Solicitor had exerted themselves to sustain the rights of the Court.

AUSTRALIA.

BOTH Houses of the Parliament of the Colony of Victoria have agreed to certain resolutions in answer to the despatch of the Duke of Newcastle on the convict question. That despatch announced that the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners would not be carried out, but that transportation from England to Western Australia would be continued for a short time at the rate of 500 persons a year. By the resolutions the Houses desire to acknowledge the consideration paid by the Home Government to the remonstrances of the Parliament of Victoria against the continuance of transportation to Western Australia. They learn, however, with deep regret, the determination to maintain the existing system, and protest against it. They deny the right of the colonists of Western Australia to calculate on the continuance of the policy, which has produced mischievous effects to the other colonies. They record their belief that so long as convicts are transported to Australia, the feelings of attachment of the people of Victoria to the Crown of England will be mingled with a deep sense of unmerited wrong inflicted upon the colony by the advisers of Her Majesty.

The vintage in Victoria had failed, and breadstuffs had gone up 40 per cent.

Dr. Patteson, Bishop of Melanesia (Salomon Islands), had been in Victoria on a visit. He addressed large audiences in Melbourne in support of his mission, in which he had met with considerable success. He had gone on to Sydney.

The 'All-England Eleven' were in Sydney. Their trip to New Zealand had been most fortunate, and they were shortly expected in Melbourne. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean had met with a splendid reception at Ballarat, where Mrs. Kean had been presented with a large nugget of gold. On the whole, their tour had been successful.

INDIA.

Sir Charles Trevelyan has made his financial statement to the Council. The surplus realised has exceeded Mr. Laing's estimate by more than a million and a half sterling. The Land Tax showed an increase of 710,000*l.* The whole increase in the revenue during the past five years is nine millions sterling. The estimated surplus for the coming year is 800,000*l.* It is probable that next year the Income Tax will be entirely removed. The Government further promised to consider the introduction of gold into the currency.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

The only important news from China is the continued success of the operations of Major Gordon against the rebels. He had captured three cities and was rapidly isolating Nankin. It was said that Chung Wang, 'the fighting king,' was collecting his property in Nankin with a view to a retreat. The siege at Hangchow was progressing vigorously. Her Majesty's gunboat Cockchafer had captured three piratical junks. The pirates confessed to having taken two Portuguese lorchas and a French schooner laden with arms.

From Nagasaki we have news of an attack on an Englishman—Mr. Sutton—by a Japanese two-sworded official. Sir R. Alcock had been received at Yokohama, with the usual marks of respect.

AFRICA.

The insurrection at Tunis has progressed in the provinces, but has not yet affected the tranquillity of the capital. It is understood that Italian, French, and English troops are to be disembarked in order effectually to protect the interests of their respective nations. It appears that the revolt originated in a mutiny among the soldiers of the Bey, whose pay was in considerable arrears. The army of the State consists of 12,000 regulars, and a mass of irregular troops. It is said that should any untoward circumstance deprive the Bey of life, the military chiefs are prepared to nominate a new sovereign immediately in the person of Sid-Hamouda, the heir-presumptive to the vice-regal title.

Some of our readers may remember a considerable amount of excitement which was caused by the death of Radama II., King of Madagascar, whose heterodox notions on foreign policy had made him insupportable to his Ministry. Whether poison or yet more violent measures were used, does not appear to be clear; it would evidently, however, be worth while to clear up that point, as the report now obtains in the island that the late King has returned to life, and is soon about to reappear. Great excitement has been caused at Tananariva, the capital, and an order issued forbidding the sale of powder to the natives.

Advices from Abyssinia state that complete anarchy now reigns there. The Emperor Theodore is hemmed in by his revolted subjects. All the troops are concentrated at Goudar.

His Majesty the King of Dahomey has been defeated with enormous loss in an attempt to capture the city of Abbeokuta. His Majesty entertained a settled hatred of that new city, which bade fair to outgrow in wealth and strength the dominions of the King, and he had moreover expressed to Captain Wilmot, on the occasion of the visit of that officer to the King's capital, his determination to reduce the obnoxious refuge. So about two months since the King set his army in array, and marched forth with a force 10,000 strong and three brass six-pounders to glut his sweet revenge. On March 16 he appeared before Abbeokuta. The Egbas (for by that name the 200,000 people who dwell around the rock 'Olumo' are called) had received due warning, and the Abashorun had made preparations for the attack. The assault of the Dahomians was delivered with the most reckless fury, the Amazons forming the storming column, and fighting with desperate valour. But the defeat of the King was complete, and as he broke up from his position and retreated, the Egbas pursued and slew without mercy the beaten host. The country people also rose and joined in the general massacre. The King of Dahomey lost 3,000 troops, 1,000 killed and 2,000 prisoners. The King, however, with the remnant of his army made good his retreat.

MEXICO.

As the day approaches for the arrival of the Emperor Maximilian, the feelings of expectation and joy take the place of every other. Even politics are suspended, and the whole activity of the nation is concentrated on the magnificent welcome which it is preparing for its sovereigns. It is said that all the Ministers will tender their resignation, and submit to the Emperor's inspection a report of their respective administrations. All Mexicans hope that, after fifty years' civil war and tumult, an age of peace and happiness is in store for them. The news from the interior and from the coast of the Pacific is good. Three French men-of-war are at San Blas, another at Mazatlan, and others are about to occupy Manzanilo and Guaymas. Thus commerce will find for itself new vents. M. Cota, a deputy in the legislative body, has just returned from a tour of financial inspection in the provinces. He reports that in them, as in the capital, commerce, agriculture, and industry of all sorts have returned to their normal condition; and a still greater development is anticipated as soon as the Prince so anxiously expected shall come to take the reins of the Empire.

Juarez is determined either to prove that 'there is life in the old dog yet,' or to give his Yankee friends a more decent excuse for the faith they still have in his authority. He has issued a proclamation saying that whereas Signor Vidaurri, Governor of Nueva Leon, has demanded of the people a vote on the question of peace or war (that is to say, of adhesion to Maximilian or Juarez), the said Vidaurri has been guilty of treason, and every person voting according to the proclamation will also be guilty of treason, and liable to be punished in person and property.

GENERAL BUTLER.—The general has never been under fire since the commencement of the war, and never will be even by accident. His discretion is perfectly well understood to be too great to permit him to expose himself to the foe, but he is immense in his onslaughts upon rebels in petticoats in general and rebel property in particular.—New York World, April 28.

THE CONTINENT.

THE details of the naval action between the Danes and Germans off Heligoland, on May 9, have come to us; they confirm the previous despatch in all important particulars. It appears that on the 7th inst. the Austrian frigates Schwartzenberg and Radetsky, in company with the Prussian gunboats Adler and Blitz, started on a cruise after the Danish flotilla; the search was fruitless, but immediately on their return to their anchorage a telegram was received stating that three Danish frigates were off Heligoland. Captain Tegetthof, who was in command of the squadron, immediately got up steam, and soon came in sight of the enemy, who showed every willingness to meet him. The opposing forces were, on the German side, the Schwartzenberg, 50 guns, the Radetsky, 30 guns, the Adler and Blitz, iron-plated gunboats, carrying 4 guns each; on the Danish side, the Niels-Juel, 42, the Zylland, 44, and the Hindal or Daymar, 16. Captain Tegetthof immediately ran the Schwartzenberg in between the Niels-Juel and Dagmar, and delivered a double broadside; the Danes lost no time in returning it, and the engagement soon became general. The Niels-Juel used her shells very effectively, and the Schwartzenberg was soon on fire in two places; a lucky shot carried away her bowsprit, and her foremast was burnt down. The Radetsky attempted to divert the enemy's fire from her partner, but without success, receiving herself some damage. The Prussian gunboats kept out of range, and appear to have been of no use. The Germans, finding themselves so severely handled, prepared to beat a retreat; this, however, was not effected without difficulty, the Danes hanging pertinaciously on to their victim. The Austrian frigates succeeded, however, in getting into English waters, and their foes steamed away northwards. The losses on board the Schwartzenberg were one officer and thirty men killed, forty-four severely wounded, and between thirty and forty slightly wounded—total about 110; the Radetsky lost one naval cadet and five men killed, and thirty-one wounded—total, thirty-seven: making the whole loss 147. The Danish loss, according to a despatch addressed to the Minister of Marine, amounts to fourteen killed and fifty-four wounded. The news of this action was received at Copenhagen amidst the most tumultuous joy; nor were the Austrians dissatisfied with the conduct of their ships, who were in truth fighting against some odds: the Emperor has sent to Captain Tegetthof his admiral's commission in token of his approval. On the other hand, the burst of applause raised in the House of Commons by the receipt of the telegraphic news respecting the engagement has caused the liveliest irritation at Vienna. Some of the journals assert that the English ships Black Eagle and Aurora gave notice to the Danes of the inferiority of their enemy, and so forced on a disadvantageous battle.

The Austrian squadron under Admiral Willerstorf is now at Cherbourg, and consists of the Kayser, 90; the Don Juan, iron-plated frigate, 31; the Königin Elisabeth, 10; the Archduke Frederic, 22; and the Wedl, gunboat, 4.

THE following is the text of the suspension of hostilities between the two belligerents: 'There shall be a suspension of hostilities by land and sea, to begin on the 12th of May, and to endure for one month. On that date Denmark shall raise the blockade. Prussia and Austria pledge themselves, during the suspension of hostilities, to put no obstacle on commerce, or the communications, or the regular course of administration in those parts of Jutland which are occupied by their troops; also not to raise war contributions, but, on the contrary, to pay for all that shall be furnished to the German troops; the latter shall only remain in occupation of the strategic positions they now hold. The belligerents agree to keep the military positions which they now respectively hold both on land and at sea, and bind themselves not to reinforce them during the suspension of hostilities.' Another article ordains that ten days' notice shall be given before the resumption of hostilities by either party.

The conclusion of this truce and the agreement to raise the blockade has brought about a Ministerial crisis at Copenhagen; the Ministers of Justice, of the Interior, and of War have tendered their resignations. The Danish press considers that the last stipulation was only forced upon Denmark by English pressure. We are decidedly at a discount with both the contending parties.

The war contributions in Jutland, as stated last week, have been of the most severe nature; besides these, however, Marshal Wrangel, who has 'certainly' built himself an everlasting name' among the Jutlanders, has imposed a land-tax of nearly 6,000,000 rigsdalers, or more than 900,000*l.* The number of natives employed in the forced labour of demolishing the defences of Kolding and Fredericia was 2,000. The Copenhagen Dagbladet complains that, notwithstanding the armistice, the Prussians continued pillaging on the 12th and 13th inst. in Aarhuus, and on the 12th inst. in Randers; it is also officially stated the confiscations were continued on the 14th inst.

THE German atmosphere just now is alive with petitions and addresses. One presented to the King of Prussia congratulates him on the victories of his troops, comments on the faithlessness and tyranny of the Danes, and concludes by declaring that hereafter Slesvig and Holstein must be united into one State, and either placed under a sovereign of their own or annexed to some neighbouring great German Power. The address was got up among the Conservative party in Prussia under the auspices of Count von Arnim-Boytzenburg. There is no concealment in the formula, 'a neighbouring great German power;' Prussia alone can be alluded to, and thus the Viennese public understand it, and also the Liberal party in Prussia itself. To both of these the suggestion is unwelcome, though probably for very different reasons; the former inclining to the maintenance of Danish integrity, the latter to the formation of an independent Duchy. An address has also been presented to the Duke of Augustenburg, informing him of the resolutions passed at a great meeting held at Rendsburg. In his reply the Duke declared that 'a king of Denmark shall never again rule in this country.' We may also mention a petition signed by 1,349 members of the various legislative assemblies of Germany. It has been forwarded to Baron von Beust, who has undertaken the duty of submitting the document to the Conference of the Seven Powers. Considering that Lord Russell only last week declined to present a petition from the Slesvig-Holsteiners, on the ground that the Conference could not deal with individuals, we may consider this conduct of Herr von Beust as savouring strongly of impertinence.

The Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia have paid a visit to Lubeck and Hamburg: the latter had at one time the intention of visiting the seat of war, but has since relinguished it. Their Royal Highnesses received a visit from the Duke of Augustenburg, and passed some time in conversation with him, a circumstance which has not failed to be remarked.

The Austrian loan of 70,000,000 florins has been issued at 77.10; 23,000,000 were taken up on issue by the Anglo-Austrian Bank, Messrs. Baring Brothers, Wodianer and Sina; the remainder is also taken by the Anglo-Austrian Bank for disposal on commission. The company will in the meantime make partial advances to the Finance Minister.

Continental journals have made some remarks on the gradual concentration of Austrian troops in Transylvania on the Moldavian frontier. It appears that matters have at length come to a crisis in the Principalities. The Chambers were assembled to discuss a new electoral law proposed by the Government; they refused to do so, and were consequently dissolved. The electoral law and an additional article to the Constitution were then proclaimed by Prince Couza, and the people invited to vote a simple 'yes' or 'no' on those two points. The people appear to overlook the strangeness of such a proceeding in a country pretending to have a constitutional government, and greet the Prince with the greatest enthusiasm wherever he appears.

The long-vexed question of the Principalities is at last likely to meet with a solution. The Conference on that subject has been opened, and its first sitting attended by the representatives of the Five Great Powers and Italy. We think that this is the first general Conference, including all the great Powers, at which Italy has been recognised as an aspirant to that dignity.

The news from Poland is uninteresting: after the recapitulation of a few tales of horror, the appetite palls with mere accounts of judicial murders, even when performed en grand. We read that General Bolaklanof has ordered the execution of fifteen Poles together, ten to be hanged and five shot. The luckless Polish General Langiewicz, who was taken prisoner by the Austrians after his defeat by the Russians, and confined in the fortress of Josephstadt, is by some means or other recognised and claimed by the Swiss Government as a citizen of their Confederation. We have not yet heard whether the Austrians will accede to the demand for his extradition made by the Swiss Federal Council.

A more cheerful subject is the chance of a direct land telegraphic communication with America over Siberia. The lines have already been run as far as Irkutsk, the capital of Eastern Siberia, and will now be carried on farther. Mr. Collins, an American, the sole manager of that line of Russian telegraphy, has obtained leave from the English Government to run his wires over British Columbia.

The Pope is again suffering from severe indisposition. He was engaged in administering confirmation to a brother of the ex-King of Naples, when he was observed to totter and support himself against a table with difficulty. Medical assistance was immediately summoned, and it was found that he was in a high state of fever, consequent on the reopening of the wound in his leg.

In the Turin Chamber of Deputies, May 4, a discussion took place on foreign politics in general, and the state of the Roman question in particular. The Ministry defended themselves from the charge of timidity levelled against them, and declared that Italy had now entered the European bond, and must take into account the general condition of Europe. With regard to the Roman question, they asserted that the principle of non-intervention formed the basis of all the negotiations. They opposed every resolution brought forward which tended in any way to interfere with their liberty of action. They considered that the measures taken by Government in concert with the French for the repression of brigandage had produced real results. Among the speakers in favour of energetic conduct against the present state of affairs in Rome was the notorious Abbé Passaglia and Signor Chiaves. The latter proposed that the Papal States should immediately be divided into electoral districts, whose deputies should be admitted into the Italian house. This was a course which France could not oppose, as it was in no way contrary to her present watchword, 'the defence of the Head of the Church.'

Considerable excitement was caused lately at Ancona when it was heard that Cardinal Morichini had been arrested for an alleged disrespect to Government. The tribunal has now, however, acquitted him, and he was instantly set at liberty.

We recorded last week, with great regret, the death of the great composer, Meyerbeer. His funeral has been of a most magnificent character. The body was removed with great pomp from Paris to Berlin, according to the wishes of the deceased. On the 9th inst. the final ceremony was celebrated. The coffin, as it lay in the house of mourning before the commencement of the procession, was covered with flowers and garlands, some of which had been sent by the Queen and the Princess Frederic-Charles. A numerous company of royalty, nobility, and talent assembled to do the last honours to the illustrious dead. The ceremony was begun by a funeral hymn, the work of Meyerbeer himself, sung by the chorus of the Opera; next the Chief Rabbi Joel, of Breslau, pronounced the funeral oration; then the procession was formed. The bier was preceded by bands of musicians, and followed by an immense mob, in the midst of which were the Royal carriages. The bier was stopped for a short time before the Opera, from which a flag of mourning floated, to hear a chorus executed by the artists of that establishment. It then wended its way to the Jewish cemetery, where the solemn ceremony terminated. A compliment was paid to the memory of Meyerbeer on the 7th inst. in the Opera at Brussels, which deeply affected the audience. The opera given that night was 'Les Huguenots,' one of the composer's most magnificent conceptions. The artists employed executed their parts with a power and a passion which the regrets of the day might well call forth. Two of them—Madame Meillet and M. Bertrand—were enthusiastically called for by the public. They appeared in front of the curtain bearing between them a white chaplet veiled with funereal crape, which they placed in silence on the music which lay extended on the conductor's desk.

Seldom probably in the ordinary history of a city, has a programme been presented of amusement and occupation so varied and of so high a character as the French capital has afforded during the past week. In the Chamber, debates on a variety of the most important subjects, conducted by men of the greatest renown for eloquence and sarcasm; in the law courts a trial of the most absorbing interest, in which a man of high education is accused of a capital crime of the most revolting description; for the sporting world, the Chantilly First Spring Meeting with its Prix de Diane: if Government, judges, and race-horses had planned it of benevolence aforethought, they could not have done more for their Whitsuntide visitors than has been already brought about by chance. In the Chamber of Deputies, the tactics of the Opposition have been developed with exactly the amount of success which might have been anticipated where a number of talented men belonging to one party can only agree to differ, and to bring their individual sentiments before the House single-handed. The Imperial Government has been attacked on every point assailable or non-assailable; the budget, the general financial system, the Danish, Polish, and Mexican questions, the proposed Congress, the criminal law, the liberty of the Press, have all been rudely handled by various members of the Opposition. MM. Thiers, Jules Favre, Garnier-Pagès, Ernest Picard, and Berryer, have all had somewhat to say; but the Government has never been at a loss for a fluent reply, and an overwhelming majority.

The trial of the soi-disant Comte de la Pommerais, which bids fair to be considered hereafter a cause célèbre, has been before the Criminal Court in Paris for the whole of the past week. The accused, a homœopathic physician, had formed a liaison with a widow named La Pauw, which had been interrupted by a marriage which he thought fit to make. The Count, being anxious to get rid of the widow, devised a plan for accomplishing the purpose, which would bring in some solid advantage to himself. He suggested to her that she should insure her life, and then simulate a severe illness; the insurance companies on seeing her state would be glad enough to compound for her policies, by an annuity of some 240*l.* a year; she might then recover and enjoy her annuity as long as she pleased. The widow caught at the notion; the plot was commenced and carried out successfully up to the very last stage. Just as the time came for her to recover, M. de la Pommerais paid her a visit of congratulation; she immediately became really ill; another visit from the Count was followed very closely by her death. The gentleman then presented her policies to the insurance offices for payment. He held them, he said, as security from the lady for a debt. Suspicions were excited, a post-mortem examination was made; the physicians found strong signs of poison, but no traces of it. Such would be the case, they said, if the poison digitalis had been administered. Search was thereupon made in La Pommerais' house, and a bottle of digitalis was found nearly emptied of its contents. He was arrested on the charge of poisoning, and brought up for trial on Monday the 9th instant. Besides the accusation of having poisoned his mistress, there is another indictment against La Pommerais for the murder of his mother-in-law under very suspicious circumstances. The evidence brought forward by the prosecution went to prove that La Pommerais was an adventurer, ready to better himself by any means, good or bad; that he had effected an assurance of the life of Madame la Pauw to the amount of 550,000 francs, the premiums of which he was utterly unable to pay for any length of time. The medical evidence proved that there was no trace of internal injury in the body of Mme. La Pauw, such as was suggested by the prisoner as the cause of her death; and that the contents of her stomach, as well as the remains of the food she had taken and afterwards rejected immediately before her death, had been fatal to dogs and other animals. The defence was, that the prisoner had lent very large sums of money to the deceased, which the assurances effected were intended to cover; some medical evidence was also given, to the purport that the deaths of the dogs and animals to which the contents of the stomach, &c., had been administered might be attributed to the decomposition which had already commenced in the substances used. Evidence in favour of his character was also given by divers of his patients. The weak point in the defence was undoubtedly the largeness of the insurance effected on the life of the deceased. We are informed by telegraph that the accused has been found Guilty, without mention of extenuating circumstances, and will consequently be condemned to death. Some of our daily contemporaries have kept up a continual fire of sarcasm upon the conduct of the judge in this trial; we must say, for our part, that, however unintelligible to us may be the process of conviction in the mind of a French judge, the sneers and contempt expressed by Englishmen with regard to it are absolute and flagrant intolerance, as bad as that of the most bloodthirsty Spanish inquisitor. Surely, if we are expected to tolerate what we believe to be vital errors in matters of religion, we are bound to apply the same measure to seeming faults in the administration of justice.

The marvellous splendour of the weather attracted immense crowds to the beautiful racecourse of Chantilly on Sunday last. Nothing could exceed the condition of the running ground, the magnificence of the foliage, or the toilettes of the ladies. The programme provided had for its chief feature the Prix de Diane (the French Oaks), and was also rendered attractive by the prospect of contests between horses of considerable reputation. The first race, Prix de la Reine-Blanche, for three-year-olds, was won by Courlis, the property of the Prince de Beauvau, after a most exciting struggle with M. Lupin's Cascarilla. For the Prix du Gros Chêne, the Duc de Morny's famous horse Partisan was made the favourite, while Count de Lagrange's Villafranca and M. Shickler's Grande Mademoiselle found also a host of supporters. In the event Partisan won with consummate ease, Grande Mademoiselle being second, and Généréux third. The Duc de Morny was also victorious in the Prix des Ecuries, a handicap for three-year-old horses, with an entrance of 100 fr. and 6,000 fr. added. In this race Démon made play at a great pace to serve his stable-companion, Ninon de l'Enclos. At the distance a struggle ensued between Jean sans Peur, Birette, Scrupule, and Ninon de l'Enclos, the latter winning very cleverly, Jean sans Peur being second. For the Prix de Diane eight fillies put in an appearance, and Fille de l'Air was made the favourite, Perle and Poudrière being also backed for money. Fille de l'Air secured the victory without an effort by six lengths; Poudrière, the property of M. Shickler, was second, and M. H. Lunel's Fantasia third. Constellation, Somo-Sierra, Gueule de Loup, Bonelle, and Civility also started. The stakes amounted to 16,300 fr. The running of Fille de l'Air in this race by no means harmonises with the wretched exhibition which she made at Newmarket a few weeks since in the race for the Two Thousand Guineas. No doubt the quality of the French fillies at Chantilly was very inferior to that of such animals as General Peel and Paris. But even with the broadest allowance on that account, it is, at first sight, difficult to understand how a filly, who at Newmarket was unable even to gallop with her competitors, could defeat her opponents in the Prix de Diane in so hollow a fashion. These are among the mysteries of the turf, and though such a variation in results rouses suspicion in the mind of a stranger, yet to those who have some experience it merely affords a fresh illustration of that uncertainty for which fillies are so remarkable. The final race was chiefly worthy of notice for the mishap that befell Partisan. In an exciting struggle with Soumise, the son of Launcelot and Partlet 'broke down' and brought his racing career to a sudden termination. Soumise, the property of Count de Lagrange, won easily, Guillaume le Taciturne being second, and Nobility third. The second meeting at Chantilly is fixed for this day.

The following official statement is made in the Moniteur with regard to the contest between the Pope and the Lyonnese clergy:—'The Government, by virtue of the right given to it in the organic articles of the Concordat (law of the 18th of Germinal, Year X, Article 1), has refused to authorise the publication in France of a brief issued at Rome on the 17th of March last past, in favour of the introduction of the Roman liturgy into the diocese of Lyons. Any publicity given to this brief will therefore constitute a violation of a law to which the Government is bound and is determined to enforce respect.'

The Princess Anna Murat is the last convert from Protestantism to the Catholic faith; this step was the consequence of a few religious conversations with M. Duguerry, the curate of the Madeleine, in whose church she chose to make her formal abjuration.

The loungers through Covent Garden Market in the winter and early spring can scarcely believe the cheapness and plenty of the spring vegetables supplied to Paris from Algiers; this year they have had the additional virtue of a remarkably fine flavour, due no doubt to the improvement of cultivation in the African gardens, and therefore expected to be permanent. The early potatoes are a very proverb for delicacy, and the green peas, the growth of which in those climates presents a difficulty scarcely less than it meets at home in the wintry season, will vie with the produce of the best European gardens. When shall we see the day that brings to us Londoners green peas from Africa in the month of January at a price not absolutely destructive of our self-respect?

Gambling for Daily Bread.—The New York Daily News, in the course of an article on the general spread of corruption in the United States, observes:—'The wealth and avarice and luxury that it took whole centuries of Roman conquest to produce, the devil's magic of the Secretary of the Treasury has brought upon us in three years. The lying promises to pay, which flow like water from the printing presses of "the Government," have answered all the purposes of wealth in the corruption of the people. They have done even more, for they have made the whole of this vast nation one great gambling hell. The commonest transactions of the counter and the counting-house are simply bets on the appreciation or depreciation of the currency. We need not go to William Street nor to the Coal Hole for our illustrations. Every man who buys, and every man who sells, lays down his stake in goods or money on the simple principle of heads or tails. In the whole catalogue of crimes, none is more utterly demoralising than the vice of gambling. Who shall tell the future of a nation thus compelled to gamble for its daily bread?'

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THE GEORGIA.

On Friday, immediately before the House of Commons adjourned until Thursday (to-day) for the Whitsuntide holidays, Mr. T. Baring called attention to the circumstances under which the Confederate ship Georgia had been allowed to enter the port of Liverpool. Mr. Baring prefaced his remarks by a short account of the history of the vessel according to the Federal version. A Liverpool firm equipped the Georgia and engaged her crew. The vessel left Greenock as the Japan, and without an armament. She was met off the coast of France by the Allar, freighted with guns and ammunition, and this cargo was transferred to her. A member of the Liverpool firm was on board the Allar, and the Georgia was registered as the property of that gentleman, and remained his registered property from April until June 23, during which time she was making war on the mercantile marine of the United States. The Liverpool firm continued to pay the wages of the crew, and in October enlisted 20 men for her in Liverpool and sent them to Brest. The Georgia has now returned to Liverpool, her crew have been paid off without any concealment, and she is laid up in dock. Moreover, the Georgia has never once entered a Confederate port. Mr. Baring did not mention these circumstances to bring a charge against the Government; on the contrary, 'he felt assured they had done all that lay in their power, and was consistent with their duty under the existing law.' What he complained of was 'the impotency and insufficiency of the Foreign Enlistment Act, which our courts of justice found it impossible to interpret.' [It will be perceived that Mr. Baring does not ask for an impartial administration of the law, but that we shall change our laws so as to meet the wishes and requirements of the belligerent whose side he takes, and in whose success he is no doubt sincerely and deeply interested. The hon. member is, however, manifestly wrong in asserting that our courts cannot interpret the Foreign Enlistment Act. It is incredible that he should have forgotten three cases of recent occurrence. The Pampero has just been tried under the Act in Scotland, and a verdict taken for the Crown by consent. The Florida was tried at Nassau and acquitted. The Alexandra has been tried at home and acquitted.] Mr. Baring contended that when a vessel had violated our laws (as he avers the Georgia has done), she ought not on any future occasion to receive our hospitality, and ought to be refused admission to our ports. He did not cite any legal authorities in support of his view, but quoted from the letters of 'Historicus.'* He warned the House that if we went to war, our commerce would suffer terribly unless we now made some change in our law, and that the present was a favourable opportunity, because we could make such a change now 'without giving rise to any idea that we had been threatened.'

The Attorney-General rebuked, we might even say abused, some persons who he suspects have violated the spirit if not the letter of our neutral obligations, and expressed a hope that the time was coming when such persons, though disregarding the Queen's proclamation, would be restrained by the voice of the mercantile community. He then defended the conduct of the Government in reference to the three vessels which are said to have been unlawfully fitted out in British ports. The Florida was tried at Nassau and released. The Georgia left this country before the Government were in possession of any evidence against her. The Government tried to stop the Alabama, but failed. The Pampero has been tried in Scotland, and a verdict taken by consent for the Crown. Action has also been taken with respect to the Alexandra and the Mersey steam-rams. The Attorney-General thinks that these proceedings have 'impeded the progress of the system of fitting out naval armaments for a belligerent State,' and he trusts that they may result in a well-defined and lucid construction of the law. The Government therefore hope that the present law is sufficient for the vindication of our neutrality, and consequently no change will be proposed. If the law should prove ineffective, then an alteration would be necessary, but in proposing it the Government must look to having the warm support of the House of Commons and of the country, without which any such proposals could not be carried into effect. The proper time for the consideration of the subject will be 'when no party feelings nor temporary sympathies may exist to induce the House to take a course which it will be difficult afterwards to retract, and which, if persevered with, might be attended with serious consequences to the welfare of the country.' The Attorney-General then noticed the principal points in Mr. Baring's speech. It was not true, as stated by Mr. Baring, that because the Georgia was registered in the name of an English merchant from April 1 to June 23, she was during that period a British ship, and consequently, as she was engaged in war against a friendly State, a British privateer. The register was only for municipal purposes in this country; and a ship which has a British register when transferred to a foreign belligerent Power, cannot be justly styled a British ship because she is still registered in England as the property of a British subject. The Attorney-General regretted that Mr. Baring should have given countenance to the assertion that these vessels are British privateers—'a proposition so extravagant and so completely without foundation.' The Georgia had returned to Liverpool as a regular commissioned ship of war, and was entitled to be received under the rules issued by Her Majesty in January 1862. It was reported that the vessel was to be sold, and if so, 'no harm could be done to the other belligerent Power by relieving her from all fear of opposition on the part of the dismantled vessel.' It had been argued that because the Georgia had not been into a Confederate port, she was not to be regarded as a regularly commissioned ship of war. 'It has been said that there is some rule or other, some settled principle of international law, which will bear out this conclusion. It should not be our practice to invent new rules of international law to suit particular cases, and such a rule as this was never heard of. To say that a country whose ports are blockaded is not at liberty to avail herself of the resources which are at her command in other parts of the world, that she may not buy ships in neutral territory and commission them as ships of war without bringing them to her own country first, is a doctrine which is quite preposterous, and all the arguments founded upon such a doctrine only tend to throw dust into men's eyes and to mislead them. We cannot, therefore, upon those grounds make this ship an exception to our ordinary rules.' No doubt the Government had a discretionary power to refuse admission to any particular ship or class of ship, but it was a power to be exercised with due regard to all the circumstances of the case. The question raised by Mr. Baring was—'Does the circumstance of a ship happening to have been fitted out in violation of the neutrality of a neutral nation entitle her to be refused recognition as a public ship of war?' The history of the jurisprudence of the United States affords an answer. In the cases of the Santissima Trinidad and the Cassius, 'the particulars of which were similar to those of the Georgia,' Mr. Justice Story held that under no circumstances could the character of a public ship of war be enquired into, observing: 'The commission, therefore, of a public ship, when duly authenticated, so far at least as foreign courts are concerned, imports absolute verity, and the title is not examinable. The property must be taken to be duly acquired, and cannot be controverted.' And Mr. Justice Story gives a reason for this rule. He says that any enquiry about such a ship 'would be to exert the right of examining into the validity of the acts of the foreign Sovereign, and to sit in judgment upon them in cases where he has not conceded the jurisdiction, and where it would be inconsistent with his own supremacy.' The Santissima Trinidad and the Cassius were both received into the ports of the United States. The Attorney-General added: 'There are also a very considerable number of cases reported in which prizes brought into the ports of the United States were either restored, or questions raised in courts of law as to their restoration; but I can find no instance of any prohibition or exclusion from any port of any prize after her conversion into a ship of war. We are not, therefore, warranted upon the authority of the United States in excluding this vessel from our ports.' The Attorney-General again quoted from Mr. Justice Story the case of the Amisted de la Ruez, to show that the Federals had no right to complain about the admission of the Georgia, and that all such demands as compensation for damage done by the Alabama are preposterous. Mr. Justice Story 'distinctly says that we are to execute our laws fairly, we are to give no asylum to prizes captured by ships fitted out in violation of our neutrality, and to property unjustly captured; but he does not say that an asylum may not be given to public ships of war, whatever their previous history; and he adds that, beyond the limits which he mentions, we are not obliged to interfere between the belligerents. The authority of Mr. Justice Story, therefore, distinctly excludes the proposition that belligerents have any rights entitling them to require interference by the neutral, to the extent of excluding absolutely from her ports ships of this description, if it does not seem to the neutral herself necessary so to do.' There were several reasons that deterred the Government from complying with the requirement to exclude such ships as the Georgia, Florida, and Alabama from our ports. It is quite consistent with neutrality to insist upon our neutral rights, though they may happen to press hard upon one of the belligerents. It is not consistent with neutrality to make a new law that would benefit one and injure the other belligerent. Then it is only suspected, not proved, that the Georgia was fitted out in violation of our neutrality. The difficulty of getting proof is much increased because we have 'no diplomatic relations with the Confederate States, and cannot communicate with them in the ordinary way. We have not recognised them, and, what is more, the Government of the United States, by its ships, bars us from the means of communication. Only the other day Her Majesty's Government were anxious to communicate and remonstrate with the Government of the Confederate States, and actually gave a commission to one of our diplomatic servants, a Consul, to do so; and then it was announced that the blockading squadron under the orders of the United States Government could not permit even a ship of war of this country to enter into a blockaded port for the purpose of this communication.' If there is any doubt at all, the Confederate States are entitled to the benefit of it, and that is a view endorsed by Mr. Justice Story. If the Government are to proceed on moral belief, then there is this difficulty, that it is impossible to acquit the agents of the United States 'of acts which are inconsistent with our neutrality.' In the case of the Kearsage 'there can be no doubt that there had been a violation of our neutrality,' yet that vessel has been afterwards admitted into English waters. The Attorney-General then referred to the enlistments of British subjects in Ireland and in Canada. He said: 'From all quarters reports reach us which we cannot doubt to be substantially true, that agents for recruiting for the Federal army, with or without the concurrence of the Government, are in Ireland, and engage men under the pretext of employing them on railways and public works, but really with the intention of enlisting them, and that many of these men are so enlisted. In Canada and New Brunswick the same practices prevail. Representations have been made to the United States' Government respecting particular cases of persons who have been kidnapped into the service, and I feel bound to say that those representations have not met with that prompt and satisfactory attention we might have expected. How are we to act in this case? Are we to exclude from our ports all the ships of the belligerent whose agents are believed to have engaged in these practices?—practices which, whatever may be the intention of the United States' Government, operate to supply their ranks with British subjects in violation of British law. If we are to act in the one case upon suspicion, or upon moral belief going beyond suspicion, it would be difficult to say that we ought not to act so in the other.' Another reason for the Government not doing anything at the request of the Federal Government which they are not compelled by law to do, is the unwarranted and extraordinary claims made upon us in reference to the Alabama. What the Government may fairly say is this: 'We will adhere to the rules laid down by your own authorities. We will execute our own law. We will allow no asylum to prizes or to property unjustly captured. If any such are brought in, any demand for their reclamation shall be investigated. But we will not undertake to recognise claims going beyond these limits. We will not undertake to interfere between belligerents in any other way than that in which by the rules of international law we can fairly be called upon to interfere.' The Attorney-General resumed his seat amidst cheering from both sides of the House.

Mr. W. E. Foster said 'that the strong sympathy which he felt with one of the parties in the American contest might have enabled him to obtain information which he could not have otherwise procured; but he should endeavour to treat this question in an impartial manner.' [What information? Another forged report? or a cipher letter forgery? or a letter from the captain of the Kearsage? or a deposition from one of Mr. Adams's witnesses—from R. C. Young, for example? We are glad that Mr. Foster is wise enough to see, and has grace enough to admit, that reliance upon exclusive Federal information is inconsistent with impartiality.] Mr. Foster repeated the warning of Mr. Baring as to what might happen to us in time of war unless we now changed our law: he said he only wanted some ships and not the whole Confederate navy excluded from our ports; he did not think that in international law the same certainty in evidence was necessary as was required in municipal law; he bemoaned the decadence of the United States carrying trade; and he contended that there was a great difference in selling munitions of war and sending out armed ships from our ports.

Mr. Cobden expatiated upon the losses sustained by the United States from the Confederate cruisers, which he estimates at nearly 3,000,000*l.* sterling. But the loss in ships destroyed and captured was the least part of the injury inflicted. The mercantile marine has been ruined. In 1860 two-thirds of the commerce of New York was carried in American bottoms, and in 1863 three-fourths was carried in foreign bottoms. Mr. Cobden fears that this constitutes a 'gigantic material grievance' that will cause enmity between the two nations; but he does not feel sure that any legistation can meet the grievance. He said: 'I candidly confess I don't think that, if you were now to pass a law to alter your Foreign Enlistment Act, you would materially change the aspect of this matter. You have already done your worst towards the American mercantile marine. What with the high rate of insurance, what with these captures, and what with the amount of damage you have done to that which is left, you have virtually made valueless that vast property. Why, if you had gone and helped the Confederates by bombarding all the accessible seaport towns of America, a few lives might have been lost which, as it is, have not been sacrificed; but you could hardly have done more injury in the way of destroying property than you have done by these few cruisers.' [It will be noticed that Mr. Cobden does not hesitate to charge on this country the responsibility for the injuries sustained by the Federals at sea from Confederate cruisers. To hear him talk, it might be supposed that he thinks the United States is the first nation that has suffered from high rates of insurance in time of war. Does he not know that lately the rates on German ships have enormously advanced, and that German ships have been transferred to English owners? Does he know that in time of war the insurance on English ships has been exceedingly high? Does he forget that when England was involved in a continental war, her merchantmen had to voyage under the protection of ships of war?] After asserting that the Alabama, the Georgia, and the Florida ought to be excluded from our ports on the ground of a 'moral conviction' that they have violated our neutrality, Mr. Cobden following in the wake of Messrs. Baring and Foster, dwelt upon the expediency of altering our law in order to protect our commerce in the event of our being engaged in hostilities. He also asserted that the Florida is a privateer, because she does not make war on armed vessels.

Lord Robert Cecil commented on the fallacy of supposing that by refusing to admit the Alabama, Georgia, and Florida to our ports, we should add to the safety of our mercantile marine in any future war. Mr. Cobden and his friends do not wish us to keep the law. They say, Break the law, and the other nations will keep it to your advantage in any future war. It is much more likely that other nations will follow our example and break the law to suit themselves and injure us. And the peculiar baseness of the proposal is that 'you are asked to take this course, not because you believe one side to be right and the other wrong, but solely that it may give you an advantage in some future war.' Much had been said about the injuries inflicted on Federal commerce, but there were also injuries on the other side. In 1862, through Messrs. Baring & Co. there were sent to the Federal States rifles and muskets of the value of 546,000*l.* and 11,947,000 percussion-caps. 'Do you suppose,' said Lord R. Cecil, 'that the Confederates have no feelings? Do you suppose that they do not feel for their rich country desolated, for the enormous injury which has been inflicted upon their industry, for their towns bombarded, for their population slaughtered, and for the fearful trials to which every class of their people have been exposed? And do you suppose that when they learn that all this havoc has been committed through the instrumentality of munitions of war conveyed by English merchants, the bitterness on one side will not be as great as that on the other? If our neutrality is honest, we must regard the bitterness of one side as much as that of the other. I am sure that, considering what in the future are likely to be the opportunities of greatness offered to the two divisions into which the American republic is fast dividing, we shall have as much cause for regret if we permanently alienate from England the inhabitants of that country which lies to the south of the Potomac as we shall have if we alienate those who inhabit the smaller country which lies to the north of that river.' It was to be hoped that the moderate and learned speech of the Attorney-General would be accepted as an official reply to many fallacies which have been current in this country. It will be time enough to talk about the Georgia violating our neutrality when those who made the charge could get a verdict. There is not 'a ghost of a justification for saying that the Georgia has violated our Foreign Enlistment Act.' Probably Mr. Cobden knew that it is quite as much within international law to sell ships of war to another nation as it is to sell any munitions of war.

Mr. Shaw-Lefevre spoke in favour of Mr. Baring's proposal. Lord R. Montagu remarked that we were not responsible for the Confederate States making a navy and beating the Federal ships. Mr. Alderman Rose said it seemed that the period was not far distant when England would have to recognise the Confederate States.

The debate then concluded.

KIDNAPPING BRITISH SUBJECTS.

On Thursday, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Ellenborough read the following letter written by the Federal General Wistar to General Dix:—

Yorktown, April 15, 1864.

General,—An extended spirit of desertion prevailing among the recruits recently received from the North in some of the regiments of my command has led me to make some enquiries, resulting in apparently well-authenticated information, which I beg respectfully to communicate to you in this unofficial manner, deeming it required by humanity no less than by our common desire to benefit the service. There seems to be little doubt that many—in fact, I think I am justified in saying that most of these unfortunate men were either deceived or kidnapped, or both, in the most scandalous and inhuman manner in New York City, where they were drugged and carried off to New Hampshire and Connecticut, mustered in and uniformed before their consciousness was fully restored. Even their bounty was obtained by the parties who were instrumental in these nefarious transactions, and the poor wretches find themselves, on returning to their senses, mustered soldiers, without any pecuniary benefit. Nearly all are foreigners, mostly sailors, both ignorant of and indifferent to the objects of the war in which they thus suddenly find themselves involved. Two men were shot here this morning for desertion, and over thirty more are now awaiting trial or execution. These examples are essential, as we all understand, but it occurred to me, General, that you would pardon me for thus calling your attention to the greater crime committed in New York of kidnapping these men into positions where, to their ignorance, desertion must seem like a vindication of their own rights and liberty. Believe me to be, General, with the highest esteem, your obedient servant,

J. J. Wistar.

To Major-General John A. Dix, New York City.

The noble Earl said that many of the men thus infamously kidnapped [and, we may add, foully murdered] were British subjects, and that it was scarcely possible the United States Government was not aware of these facts. He wanted to know if Earl Russell had any information as to these transactions, and if he had done anything to remedy the grievance.

Earl Russell said he knew nothing of General Wistar's letter, except that a copy had been sent to him. It appeared that in some instances persons landing in the United States were drugged, kept without food, tempted to enlist, and marched off to some depôt and deprived of all chance of obtaining their liberty. [When a man is drugged, it is easy enough to tempt him to enlist.] Lord Lyons had made frequent complaints; but he (Earl Russell) was sorry to say 'he had not obtained that satisfaction he had a right to expect.' [The Earl of Ellenborough had cited a case in which a Frenchman had been kidnapped, and was immediately released on the demand of the French Admiral. It is only British subjects who are kidnapped and murdered with impunity.] These proceedings would render it necessary for Her Majesty's Government to make the strongest remonstrance. If the facts referred to by Lord Ellenborough were authentic, , 'they formed a very great hardship, and disclosed conduct on the part of the agents of the United States Government which was highly reprehensible.' [Well, that is a comfort! It is a comfort that a British Minister is not afraid to say that kidnapping British subjects, drugging and enlisting them whilst in a state of unconsciousness, and shooting them for trying to regain their liberty, is reprehensible conduct!]

EXTENSION OF THE FRANCHISE.

On Wednesday, May 12, Mr. Baines moved the second reading of the Borough Franchise Bill, the object of which is to give votes to what may be called the upper working classes. The debate was remarkable for a speech delivered by Mr. Gladstone. The right hon. gentleman avowed himself in favour of an extension of the franchise, and opposed to the present arrangement by which forty-nine fiftieths of the working classes are excluded. He did not wish for a sweeping but for a gradual measure of reform, and he contended that the working classes are fit for the exercise of the privilege of the franchise. It was the duty of those who opposed the measure to prove their unfitness, and in the absence of such proof the working classes were entitled to have votes. Mr. Gladstone was followed by Mr. Whiteside, who spoke against the Bill with his usual eloquence and power. The House divided, and there was a majority of 56 in favour of the 'previous question.'

THE MURDER OF THE MATE OF THE SAXON.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Sir J. Elphinstone asked Mr. Layard whether he had received the report of the court of enquiry held on Acting-master Danenhowen, or Donovan, of the United States ship Vanderbilt, for the murder of Mr. James Gray, mate of the ship Saxon, at Angra Peguina, held at the Philadelphia Navy Yard, with the finding thereof; also the proceedings of the court-martial subsequently held upon him, with the remarks of the Secretary to the Navy of the United States, and the correspondence of Lord Lyons on the subject; and, if so, whether he would lay the papers upon the table of the House.

Mr. Layard said that an enquiry had taken place, and this was followed by a court-martial. The enquiry was a private one, and the proceedings had not been published, nor had the result been communicated to the Government. With regard to the court-martial, the Foreign Office had received from time to time a report of the proceedings, but they had not yet received any official account of the verdict. Of course the Consul at New York would have to communicate with Lord Lyons, but he presumed that the Government would shortly receive official records of the whole trial. He should then be able to inform the hon. gentleman whether the papers were such as could be laid upon the table.

MR. LOWE'S RESIGNATION.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Sir George Grey moved a resolution that a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into the practice of the Committee of Council on Education with respect to the reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools. The object of this was to see if there is any ground for the charge preferred against a department of the Government in the resolution adopted on April 12, which asserted that the reports of the inspectors were garbled. An amendment to extend the scope of the enquiry was rejected, and the resolution was adopted.

WAR CONTRIBUTIONS IN JUTLAND.

On Friday, in the House of Lords, Earl Russell, in reply to the Earl of Ellenborough, said that the Conference did not lay down any rule with regard to contributions imposed before the armistice, but in his view the spirit of the article is that the allied troops should cease to levy contributions of war. [This is not the German view. On the evening of the 11th (the armistice was agreed to on the 9th) Marshal Wrangel made a heavy requisition on some inhabitants of Jutland, and seized goods for it on the 13th and 14th.]

AMERICAN LIFE BY AN AMERICAN.*

[SECOND NOTICE.]

There has been a long and lively discussion in Europe as to the cause of the disruption of the American Union. Some assert it to be slavery, and some the tariff; but the true reason, we apprehend, is not to be found in any single difference, but in a multitude, which, if we are determined to sum up in a phrase, we may designate—Dissimilarity of character. In the North was one kind of people, in the South another; and every year of existence served to render the distinction more pronounced and irreconcileable. Commerce, railways, telegraphs, in nowise conduced to union; they brought South Carolina and Massachusetts face to face to prove, as it were, to demonstrate, that union was impossible. As Dr. Nichols observes:—

'To understand the causes of the civil war, it is necessary to have a very thorough knowledge of the character of the American people, North and South. This knowledge no traveller in America, no mere visitor, ever seems to get. They do not appear to comprehend the broad and strongly-marked differences that exist between the Northern and Southern people. If you could give the landed aristocracy of England the traditions and feelings of the Cavaliers, and the manufacturers, merchants, and shopkeepers those of the Puritans and Roundheads, you would form some idea of the feelings of the Southerners for the Yankees.'

The aversion in the case was most strongly betrayed by the South, for the influence of the North was aggressive. The South did not care to control the North; the South was quite willing to let the Yankee have his own way in his own household; but the Yankee, not content with his own business, must likewise meddle and dictate in the domestic concerns of the South. Such interference was naturally resented; and, persisted in, at last provoked such bitter feelings, that the South felt that self-respect and happiness were only possible in isolation—in the dissolution of a partnership which was growing into an intolerable tyranny. How ancient was the annoyance of the South from Yankee aggression, how long the irritation has been borne, and how clearly the upshot was foreseen, are manifest from a speech made in 1826, in the Senate of the United States, by Mr. Hayne, of South Carolina, and cited by Dr. Nichols:—

'On the slave question my opinion is this: I consider our rights in that species of property as not even open to discussion, either here or elsewhere; and in respect to our duties (imposed by our situation), we are not to be taught them by fanatics, religious or political. To call in question our rights is grossly to violate them; to attempt to instruct us on this subject is to insult us; to dare to assail our institutions is wantonly to invade our peace. Let me solemnly declare once for all, that the Southern States never will permit any interference whatever in their domestic concerns; and that on the very day on which the unhallowed attempt shall be made by the authorities of the Federal Government, we will consider ourselves as driven from the Union. Let the consequences be what they may, they never can be worse than such as must inevitably result from suffering a rash and ignorant interference with our domestic peace and tranquillity.'

Oddly enough, whilst the North pestered the South with impertinent suggestions and threats, the Yankees personally stood in awe of the Southerner, not alone for the cash in his pocket, but for that air of nobility and munificence which contrasted so strongly with his own 'cuteness and greed; and only as the present war has passed into the bitterness of defeat and despair, has its feeling of reverence changed into hate—that hate which meanness always feels for greatness, when greatness ceases to be placable and conformable to its selfish ends. In the early days of the war, the North was willing to pay any price for the reconciliation of the South. 'Only come back,' was the inarticulate cry, 'and Greeley, Beecher, and Garrison, we shall never hearken to more.'

In the course of the present war the English people have had a fair education in American politics, and it is now possible to have a discussion in a company of gentlemen without any of those amazing displays of ignorance not uncommon before 1861. If any one yet feels his notions hazy as to the conditions of the Federal compact, let us commend his attention to the closing chapters of Dr. Nichols's work, where, as the saying is, 'he who runs may read.' The story of the original coalition of the States, and under what conditions and limitations they united for mutual defence and the general welfare, is told with a clearness and conciseness which leave no room for misapprehension.

We were at one time asked by Northern advocates, what should we do if Yorkshire or Kent seceded from England? and not a few have been misled by the vicious analogy. Kent or Yorkshire in reference to England bear no manner of correspondence with Pennsylvania and Georgia in reference to the United States. Pennsylvania and Georgia are themselves composed of counties which might with a greater degree of fairness be compared to Yorkshire and Kent. Analogies in which lurk essential differences are always dangerous to truth, but if we are determined to make a comparison, Pennsylvania and Georgia might be likened to Hanover and Bavaria in the German Bund and Zollverein, or as they appear in the Diet of Frankfort. Every State in the American Union under the Constitution was a complete commonwealth in itself, having its own governor, its own legislature, and its own peculiar laws; so that had every State been struck out of existence except Rhode Island, in Rhode Island we should have seen a perfect and self-existent republic. For the sake of internal commercial intercourse, for the sake of common defence and protection, and for the sake of a uniform tariff over imports from abroad, these Sovereign States combined in a partnership strictly limited and defined, and for the transaction of the business of the Union selected Washington as a capital.

The Abolitionists were for a long time without influence in New England, and their efforts to upset the Constitution were regarded with indifference or abhorrence. Of any real knowledge of the South they were as destitute as of Japan, and from their tirades any listener would have inferred that slaveholders habitually relieved the tedium of their existence by scourging, torturing and murdering their negroes. If any one tried to expose it as mischievous nonsense he was boldly denounced as a false witness, and the slanders repeated with a bolder and bitterer emphasis. The most acrid vials of Abolition wrath were, however, reserved for the temperate and rational politicians who argued that as there were no slaves in New England there was no occasion for New Englanders to afflict themselves about a sin in which they had no share, that slavery in Maryland and Louisiana was the exclusive concern of the inhabitants thereof, and that over it Massachusetts had no more control than over slavery in Brazil, or serfdom in Russia. In spite of their fanaticism the Abolitionists had intellect enough left to discern that such a reply was justified by the Constitution, and hence the heat of their fury against that document and all who stood true to it. Beyond the custom of cursing and scolding, wrought to rare perfection by incessant practice, the Abolitionists showed no well defined political purpose; indeed, many refused to vote or take any share in civil affairs. For negroes in themselves they had no affection; the joy of their life was 'pitching into' slaveholders and their abettors: and if by any means slavery had ceased to exist, dismal indeed would have been the Abolitionists' outlook. He makes a great mistake who fancies that the people who rage against real and imaginary sins would experience any real satisfaction in the cessation of what they denounce. Their pleasure is in the exercise of their combativeness, and in the gratification of their Pharisaic vanity. Accomplish what they demand, and they would be as fish out of water, or shopkeepers in a deserted street. Even so with the Abolitionists; they never expected for a moment to be taken at their word; utterly insincere, they never attempted to reduce their demands to practical shape. Indeed, their two loudest cries, 'No union with slaveholders,' and 'Immediate and unconditional emancipation,' were mutually destructive. The first cry involved secession, and secession Garrison and his crew screamed for; but as soon as secession presented itself actually they refused to accept it. The second cry was manifestly inconsistent with the first; for if union with slaveholders were dissolved, how were the slaves to be instantly emancipated? In fine, Boston Abolitionism was a noisy hypocrisy. Its leaders made no honest attempts to face the questions they raised, but sought notoriety in extravagance, and satiated every malignant passion under the cloak of black philanthropy.

Abolitionism, as represented by Garrison and his company of Ismaelites, was too wild to meet with favour from the reasonable American people; but there were many in the North who, stimulated by their own prejudices, and by political antagonism, professed anti-slavery opinions, and railed at the South. They admitted their inability to interfere with slavery in the Southern States under the Constitution; but their helplessness in deed they tried to repair with volubility in sentiment. At last a notable scheme was devised whereby sentiment, it was thought, might be reduced to practice. We cannot, said the moderate Abolitionists, touch slavery as it exists in the South, but let us circumscribe its area—let us determine that it shall not be allowed to plant itself in any new territory. Thus arose the Free-Soil or Republican party, represented in the Presidential election of 1856 by Freemont, and defeated by Buchanan.

The Republican programme, plausible as it appeared to Europe, with only a dilettante interest in America, was pregnant with menace to the South. The interests and feelings of the South were, in a host of particulars, divergent from those of the North; but the South had met, and was willing to meet, the North in fair fight on the floors of Congress, and abide the issue. The triumph, however, of the Republicans involved the doom of the South. Increase of strength was for ever forbidden to her; and supremacy for ever guaranteed to the North. All the conditions of honest rivalry were taken away.

The Free Soil policy was on its very face tyrannical and unconstitutional. It was a formal insult and outrage to the South, it usurped the possession of territory in which the South had equal interest with the North, and it abolished the liberty accorded by the Constitution to every State to control its own internal affairs. The South did not desire to establish negro servitude in any new State, but simply claimed that the inhabitants of every State, new or old, should be left free to manage their domestic affairs as they should see fit. The reader, however, must not run off with the notion that the North held one opinion on this matter and the South another. The South was indeed unanimous; but in the North the great Democratic party united in the repudiation of the Republican 'platform' as a violation of the sacred State Rights secured by the Constitution. A long run of success had made the Democrats reckless, and in the year 1860 they divided, and were conquered.

Mr. Lincoln was elected in November, 1860. The Southern States had declared that they would secede from the Union in such an event; not that they cared personally for Mr. Lincoln, but because he would be elected upon a platform, or system of policy, which, if carried out, as they had a right to believe it would be, would destroy their rights and security in the Union. The war which had been waged against the South in pulpit and press, in State legislatures and in Congress, in underground railways and John Brown raids, in a thousand forms of insult, injury, and outrage, culminated in the election of Abraham Lincoln and the triumph of the Black Republican party in the Northern States. The South could remain in the Union with all its disabilities as long as the Democratic party in the North was strong enough and united enough to stand by the rights of the State sovereignties. When that party became demoralised and divided, and it had no hope of justice in the Union, no honourable course was left but to retire from the Federation.

Commencing with South Carolina, State after State seceded from the Union. In the early months of 1861, in the last days of Buchanan's presidency, one opinion seemed to pervade the North, namely, that if a State resolved to quit the Union there was no power in the Constitution to compel such a State to remain. The right of secession was universally confessed, and confessed emphatically by the blackest Republicans, who now, with the customary vehemence of apostates, assert a contrary doctrine. Not to quote the Boston Abolitionists, who for thirty years had been screaming for separation from the South, nor the long line of historic and contemporary testimony in favour of secession adduced by Dr. Nichols, let us be content with the evidence of the editor of the New York Tribune, the author of the cry, 'On to Richmond,' ending in Bull Run, and one of the fiercest and bloodiest of stay-at-home warriors. Writing in November, 1860, Mr. Greeley said:

'If the cotton states unitedly and earnestly with to withdraw peacefully from the Union, we think they should and would be allowed to do so. Any attempt to compel them by force to remain would be contrary to the principles enunciated in the immortal declaration of independence—contrary to the fundamental ideas on which human liberty is based.'

In this expression Greeley did no more than give voice to the natural meaning of the Constitution, and the words of the earlier declaration, which denied the lawfulness of any Government unfounded on the just 'consent of the governed.' Greeley's reading, moreover, as we have remarked, was sustained for some months by the common sentiment of the North.

The secession of the South was, however, a sore trial to the North. For years the popular imagination had been inflamed with the splendid vision of United States stretching from the Pole to Panama, and then on to Patagonia, and the dissolution of this dream in the light of ordinary day was intolerable. Law, good faith, common-sense, all counselled the quiet acceptance of the painful reality:—the South has gone, submit with grace to the inevitable, learn wisdom for the future—so Principle advised; but Feeling was hurt, and the lust of empire was mortified. At the fall of Sumter Principle was cast to the winds, and Passion had its fierce unholy will. There were not wanting warning voices in the North to testify for Principle against Passion; but, as of old, the prophets were persecuted, imprisoned, silenced. Amongst these voices, clear and decided, was Dr. Nichols's. In his newspaper, The New York Age, only one number of which, dated April 2, 1861, was suffered to appear, he described the situation and predicted the course of events with great foresight.

Whilst we cannot but bemoan the bloodshed and the devastation of the past terrible years, yet even in the midst of sorrow we may speak of hope. No doubt the South is undergoing that cruel discipline which Carlyle considers essential to the highest national life. Writing of Prussia under Frederick the Great, he says:—'Deeply unconscious of it, they were passing their "trials," his nation and he, in the great Civil-Service Examination Hall of this Universe: "Are you able to defend yourselves, then; and to hang together coherent, against the whole world and its incoherencies and rages?" A question which has to be asked of nations, before they can be recognised as such, and be baptised into the general commonwealth; they are mere hordes or accidental aggregates, till that question come. Question which this nation had long been getting ready for; which now, under this king it answered to the satisfaction of gods and men: "Yes, Heaven assisting, we can stand on our defence; and in the long run (as with air when you try to annihilate it, or crush it to nothing), there is even an infinite force in us; and the whole world does not succeed in annihilating us!" Upon which has followed what we term national baptism; or rather, this was the national baptism, this furious one in torrent whirlwinds of fire; done three times over, till in gods or men there was no doubt left.' —Vol. iv. p. 237–8.

Firm is our assurance that out of her fiery baptism the South will emerge radiant with the purest heroism, and take her place in peerage with the noblest Nations.

The pleasantness of Dr. Nichols as a painter of American life and scenery has caused many of his readers and reviewers to overlook his graver merits as a politician, which in this article we have endeavoured to set forth; and so much so, that even the Daily News, the Morning Star, and the Spectator, have praised and been gracious to him. Indeed, we can scarcely recal a case since Washington Irving, in which an American author has received a warmer or more unanimous welcome in England. The Quarterly Review says of his work: 'We have rarely read a book of its class which will better repay perusal. There have been English caricatures of America more racy and humorous, but none which disclose so deep an insight into the Americans.' The Examiner repeats this verdict in confessing, 'A better or more entertaining account of social life in America has not come before us for many a day;' and the Saturday Review is equally complimentary in asserting, 'No book we have every read gave us anything like so clear and vivid an idea of America and American life. As a description of American homes, and of Americans at home, it is the best we have seen.' When an author has thus satisfied the Quarterly, the Examiner, and the Saturday Review, he may well be content. The other critics have all sung in chorus, with the exception of the Athenæum, which grunted a churlish half and half approval. In winning this English welcome, Dr. Nichols has yielded nothing to English prejudice. He is an American to the backbone, and, though an exile, has contracted nothing of an exile's bitterness. He blames, but blames with pride and tenderness; and through all we discern that mournful patriotism which in Atterbury's phrase might be summed up, 'America, with all thy faults, I love thee still.'

SIXTH CENTENARY OF THE BATTLE OF LEWES.—The 600th anniversary of the battle of Lewes was celebrated on Monday by the residents in that neighbourhood. This battle was fought on May 14, 1264, on that portion of the Southdowns in the vicinity of Lewes now known as the Race-hill, between Henry III. and the barons.

THE SPIRIT OF THE WAR.

THE New York Daily News continues its vigorous protests against the war upon the Confederate States and the spirit in which it is conducted, a spirit of rapine and revenge, of spoliation and plunder, which has been advocated and defended by the Northern press. It writes:—'Have not these men called for the sacking of Charleston? Have they not declared their intention to lay "the accursed nest of rebellion in ashes"? and has not the best engineering skill in the country been engaged for months to burn a city, which our troops have failed to take? Why should they then not plan the sacking of Richmond? Have not a number of Southern towns been burned with the approval of the Administration and amid the plaudits of the Radicals? Have not the capitols of Louisiana and Mississippi, at Baton Rouge and Jackson, been burned? Have not public and private libraries been destroyed? Have not elegant statuary and paintings, silver plate, costly furniture, &c., &c., been stolen and sent North? Have not all these things been done, and not one word of condemnation has been heard from the fanatical press of the North? Have not army chaplains chronicled with approval the burning of dwellings over the heads of helpless women and children, while their feather beds were ripped open and the contents scattered to the winds? We might go on and add almost indefinitely to this list. Look at Butler's proceedings in New Orleans. Look at his recent acts in Norfolk, in sentencing ministers to sweep the streets, and sending non-combatants to Hatteras to work on the fortifications in chains, feeding them on bread and water because they refused to divulge the affairs of a private savings bank. Look how democratic newspapers at the North have been destroyed and the private residences of citizens have been sacked under the teachings of the insane fanatics, and then ask, why should it be thought in the least degree improbable that such an order was issued?

'Have the public forgotten the letters published in the New York Times during 1863, detailing the acts of vandalism perpetrated in Virginia? Acts so abhorrent to the sense of a civilised and Christian people, that even the Times felt called upon to condemn them? The people have still in their memory the declaration of a distinguished United States Senator, that the people of the North were determined to drive the ploughshare of war so deep into the heart of the South that its desolating effects should be felt for a hundred years, and he would rejoice to see lamentation and woe carried to every Southern home.

'It is a notorious fact that a large class at the North have been earnestly endeavouring to excite a servile insurrection among the Southern negroes; thus giving up old men, women, and children to the base passions of the negro, and devoting the whole South to destruction. It was only last week that a correspondent of one of the war journals declared that one object of Sherman's raid.

'The truth is, that the animus of this whole war, as it is now waged by the fanatics who control the Administration, is one of bitter, relentless revenge! The cry of a war for the Union and Constitution is an unmitigated humbug! It is a war to crush out the State governments of the South, and to destroy the Democratic party at the North. And the "powers that be" will scruple at no acts which will gratify the vindictive passions of the fanatics, and perpetuate the power of those who are now exercising such despotic sway over the people of the North.

'The war is making us a very unchristian people. It is blunting all the finer sensibilities of our nature, and turning us into a nation of semi-savages. We see no hope for the country but in an immediate cessation of hostilities. If the war progresses, it must bring financial ruin and the destruction of every principle of constitutional liberty.'

THE DAHLGREN PAPERS.—The Autographic Mirror (No. 7) publishes facsimiles of the papers found on the body of Colonel Dahlgren, and which appeared in our issue of April 7. We do not wonder, despite their callous inhumanity, that the Federal authorities made an effort to discredit these documents, which are evidence of the most wicked and ferocious designs ever conceived; but the attempt has failed, and the authenticity of the Dahlgren papers is unquestionable and unquestioned. We advise our readers to procure a copy of the current number of the Autographic Mirror.

SCENES IN WALL STREET.—The financial farce of the Secretary of the Treasury is over; or, in the expressive parlance of the day, 'played out.' The sale of the gold certificates is closed, and the experiment of Mr. Chase to bear the gold market has proved one grand 'fizzle.' Gold last week touched 185, while gold certificates, for which there was a huge demand, reaching six or eight millions in fifteen days, were kept at 165. Immense throngs of men and boys filed into line at sunrise daily in Wall Street, heading towards the door of the Sub Treasury, and for eight weary hours per day this line was seen increasing in length, surging, and heaving, and sweating, and breaking up at three o'clock P.M. to form again the next morning at daybreak—all for the purpose of procuring something at $1 65, which would be received at the Custom House for duties in the place of gold. Merchants were insane. The difference between the price of gold and the paper which could be made to take the place of gold in the payment of duties was so great that clerks, on the closing days of last week, were ordered to go into Wall Street at midnight and take their position near the entrance of the Sub Treasury, that they might be sure of reaching the interior and procuring their certificates at the earliest moment after the opening of business in the morning. The excitement was intense. Speculators took their places in the line, having no business at the Sub Treasury, but solely for the purpose of selling out when that portion of the column which embraced them neared the door of the office. Huge prices were paid for places. Men and even boys joined the long line toward the temple of Midas, only to pocket their five, ten, or twenty dollars offered by some anxious importer for a place who could not afford to wait his turn, and to whom the price was no object.—New York Day Book.

OUTRAGE UPON AN EMBASSADOR.—On Christmas-eve Dr. Henry Segur, Minister Plenipotentiary of San Salvador to the United States, was arrested by order of the Administration and confined in Fort Lafayette, whence he was released after an examination which proved his entire innocence of the charge preferred. He was accused of shipping arms for the Confederacy. It was amply proved that the arms were intended for the use of his own Government, but the arbitrary action of the Administration subjected him to the inconvenience and suffering of three months' incarceration. San Salvador is a weak Power, but every Government in the world should all the more resent this insult to her representative.

'The Situation' to which the Federal Government has arrived under the domination of 'Honest Abe' is thus pourtrayed by the New York World, of April 8:—'England is at peace to-day. Yet we hear of her ministry in almost daily consultation. The ordinary concerns of the nation are sufficiently important to assemble the Queen's advisers in frequent and protracted sessions. We Americans are waging war over the surface of a continent, and our armed ships are in every sea. The nation is rocking in the throes of its mortal struggle; its commerce is slaughtered on the seas; its homes are emptied of the young men who go away by the hundreds of thousands to fight our battles; we count by thousands of millions the heaped-up debt which is to burden the industry of this and future generations; fresh millions are daily added to this mountain of debt which it has taken us fewer months to create than it took groaning debt-ridden England years to accumulate; the very trade and industries upon which we must rely to carry the load are being steadily paralysed by the headlong financiering of the head of the treasury, and the watered currency with which he is gorging all the distended arteries and veins of trade; a new monarchy is rising into power on our southern border, born out of our weakness, hostile to us in its inception, our foreordained antagonist in the future; our enemies abroad are only biding their time; yet at this very crisis, when every hour is big with the fate of thirty millions of people, the Congress elected and charged to care for these supreme interests can hardly get together a quorum to do its daily dawdling, and the chief magistrate thinks it wise to discontinue the assembling of his selected advisers, to stroll from the Navy Department across to the War Office, and from the War Office to the Treasury Department, and "run the machine myself," as he terms it, lubricating its huge wheels with stories picked up in "Sangamon county, Illinois;" and for the remainder of the day, to spin plots and contrive schemes, as the secretaries, too, are spinning and contriving to secure the spoils and plunder of the next presidency.'

LETTER FROM GENERAL BEAUREGARD.—The Richmond Examiner of the 15th ult. contains the following letter, dated Charleston, March 28, 1864:—'Gentlemen: Accept for yourselves, and for the other officers and soldiers from Louisiana, who met with you at Mobile on the 19th instant, my heartfelt thanks for the lofty and touching sentiments expressed in the resolutions you were pleased to pass on the occasion of the sad event which has torn from me a most dear and beloved wife, and from the State to which she belonged, one of its brightest jewels and ornaments. Mrs. Beauregard died a martyr to our cause. Her continued and long separation from the chosen one of her heart, under the trying circumstances she had to pass through, was more than her careworn and enfeebled condition could endure. Yet she departed not from life without giving utterance to her undiminished devotion to that noble cause, and to her unshaken faith in its ultimate triumph. She was a true and fervent patriot. The foul breath of even the most vile among the vilest of our enemies never could taint the pure atmosphere that surrounded her. How bright, how glorious I would deem the day on which it were given to me, at the head of my brave and so hard-tried compatriots, to rescue, with her hallowed grave, the noble State that bestowed such honours upon her remains, from the footsteps of the foe who pollutes them by his presence! With sincere esteem and sincere acknowledgments, I remain, yours very truly, G. T. BEAUREGARD.—Major Hy. St. Paul, Capt. J. T. Purves, Lieut. Charles Arroyo, Committee, Mobile, Ala.'

HARD SWEARING.—A Northern paper gives the following classification of the various oaths imposed upon the people of various conquered provinces by their military rulers. These were:—In Louisiana, under the Butler satrapy, the Butler oath of allegiance—the Butler wagon oath—the Butler permit oath—the sugar oath—the medicine oath—the contraband oath—the whisky oath, and the cotton and molasses oath. In the same State followed, soon after, the Banks oaths of like variety, but less searching and stringent. In Missouri the variety, from the Halleck oath to the Schofield and Rosecrans oath, were equally extensive, in sorts, kinds, and degrees of intensity. In Indiana and Ohio the Hascall and Burnside oaths prevailed. In Kentucky all varieties were fashionable, and are still so; there they had the Jeremiah Boyle oath, the General Buell oath, and several varieties in the upper or blue-grass regions, the coffee oath, the mule oath, and the cattle oath. In Tennessee the variety of oaths exceeded that of any other State in intensity of loyal obligations, and Andrew Johnson has capped the climax in the oath line. The belief has obtained that he preached State rights and the resolutions of '98 so long, while pretending to be a Democrat, that he himself had to prescribe a special oath to make them disbelieve his former doctrines, and that he himself swears over and over again, every day or so, lest he may be suspected of any adherence to his old faith. Of the Butler Norfolk oaths, the South Carolina, the Florida, the Illinois, the Camp Chase, the Fort Lafayette, the Fort Warren, the Jim Lane oaths, we need not speak.

INDEPENDENCE.—We still talk of this as something yet to be won. Have we not already measurably grasped the prize? Some few years ago, almost everything we saw—everything we wore, and much we consumed, was manufactured and imported from the North. Now, home-spun fabrics clothe our people, and almost everything we require for use is made at home. Let the blockade continue, and we ask no help from the outside barbarians. Our country is rich in resources, and blest beyond almost every other land. All we have ever required as a people to make us independent, has been the stern and inexorable pressure of necessity—and that pressure is now upon us. We feel its growing influence and recognise its beneficial results every day. And ere long, over all the vast extent of this sunny land, the songs of the husbandman will commingle on every hand with the music of the wheel, the loom, and the anvil. We never expected to become a manufacturing people; but the same law which made Robinson Crusoe, on the lonely isle, combine all trades in himself, will work wonders with us. It is doing this every day.—Sumter (South Carolina) Watchman.

MR. LINCOLN'S ELOQUENCE.—'Honest old Abe' came to be President partly by splitting rails, partly by making stump speeches. Of his talent in the latter function we have a specimen in an address made last month at the Sanitary Fair at Baltimore, from the report of which we give a brief extract:—'When this war began, scarcely one individual supposed it would have lasted till now. All thought it would have ended in some way in a much shorter time. Very few at that time thought the institution of slavery would be very much affected by it; but these expectations were not realised, and here we are (laughter), and slavery has been somewhat affected. (Great laughter.)'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

The Index was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, The Index has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. The Index does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, The Index is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of The Index, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. Hopkins, Index Office.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MAY 19, 1864.

The Federal Disaster in Louisiana.

The Confederate victory in Louisiana has scarcely received the attention that it deserves in this country. If there was any State in which the Federals boasted of the complete subordination of Secession, it was Louisiana. The scene of their earliest triumph, the theatre of Butler's tyranny and Banks's 'nigger' enlistments, after three years of war, Louisiana might have been fairly expected to be thoroughly Yankeeised, and, in fact, the Federal press has for months treated the State as belonging to the Union Hitherto the efforts of a helpless population have failed to refute the Northern claim. The crescent city made no sign; and New Orleans was quoted as a model of civil administration for the benefit of Lincoln's lieutenants. Now the tide has turned, and the results of a long and grievous tyranny are showing themselves; the men of Louisiana have turned upon their ruthless oppressors; and the result is a victory which, if it had fallen to Northern arms, would have been celebrated with Te Deums and thanksgiving-days in every State in the Union. In point of fact, it may be doubted whether the South has won such a victory since the first fight at Bull Run. Banks's army marched as if to assured victory. The Northern press predicted, with a certainty that surpassed belief, the precipitate flight of the 'rebels' into Texas, and the sweeping of some hundreds of thousands of bales of cotton into the Federal net. The trans-Mississippi States of the Confederacy were to be Yankeeised, and a simultaneous advance by Banks's and Steele's forces from Louisiana and Arkansas, was to effect in Texas what had been accomplished in the Red River. The earlier operations favour the dream of the Federals. Fort de Russy is captured; there are strange surprises of Confederate horsemen; the Federal gunboats steam up the Red River and find no obstacles. At once the news is telegraphed to Washington that the fighting in Louisiana is over, and great consignments of cotton are promised. Banks, desirous of glory and of cotton, places himself at the head of his conquering army. A tremendous flotilla of iron-clad gunboats and transports accompanies him. It never occurs to him to enquire whether the Confederates have an army in the State. He is led away by his unopposed progress to Alexandria. In an evil hour he leaves the kindly shelter of his gunboats and strikes boldly by a short inland cut for Shreveport. A slight skirmish ensues, in which, of course, he 'drives' the Confederates. Then pushing on his cavalry, he finds himself in front of a considerable Confederate army. His cavalry is driven back with loss; a regiment or two of infantry is ordered up; they equally fail to make an impression; ultimately the Confederates assume the offensive; Banks's advance is overthrown, cut to pieces, and routed; it falls back upon the main body, only to involve it in its own confusion; and the pêle-mêle, cavalry, infantry, and artillerymen without their guns, seek safety behind the bayonets of the reserve. After three days' panic, the flight is stayed, but when the Confederates move up their forces for another general action, Banks adopts the more prudent course and retreats some five and thirty miles. There never was such a victory gained in any previous action of the war. It is said that the Confederates captured two millions of dollars in gold and one million of greenbacks, all the guns, and nearly the whole train of Banks's army, and 4,000 prisoners. Then they destroyed the best ironclad of the flotilla, and effectively disposed of several transports, and not only drove back Banks to his entrenchments at Alexandria, but actually fought the gunboats down the river with the light artillery, and fought a successful duel from the banks with the Federal ironclads. There has been no more overwhelming or unexpected disaster during the war. The readers of The Index will have been somewhat prepared for the superiority of soldiers like Kirby Smith and Taylor over the lawyer Banks, but it could hardly have been anticipated even by the most disparaging critic of Banks's strategy that he would have shown himself so utterly unfit to command an army; still less could it have been hoped that the Confederacy, with all its successes in Florida, in Mississippi, in Tennessee, Kentucky, and North Carolina, should have mustered men enough to defeat the joint expedition of Banks and Porter. We regret to see that for a time the army of the South is deprived of the services of a chivalrous Frenchman, the Prince de Polignac, whose name has figured already in so many battle-fields of the Confederacy. But it must be some consolation to him to have seen the Yankees flying a second time in hopeless panic from Kirby Smith, and to have repeated the lesson of Bull Run on the plains of Louisiana. On the effect of this victory we forbear to expatiate. It may not improbably throw the whole State of Louisiana into the hands of the Confederates, and rescue Arkansas from the Federal clutches. It must give an immense impulse to the Confederacy all through the more Southern States, and add a hundredfold to Mr. Lincoln's difficulties. Banks cannot be reinforced. All that General Steele can hope is to be allowed to retire. The probability is that he will be overwhelmed and beaten. Vicksburg and Port Hudson cannot afford men. The utmost Banks can effect is the safe retreat of his army, under the fire of his gunboats, to the mouth of the Red River, and thence to New Orleans. It will be well for him if his retreat is not attended with disasters as serious as those which marked his blundering and calamitous advance.

In Virginia the two armies are still expectant. The commanders on both sides are aware of the tremendous stake at issue, and careful to avoid a risk. We need hardly say that every day improves Lee's position, and increases the confidence of the South in the issue of the looked-for engagement. Without pretending to a knowledge of the exact numbers of the Confederate army in Virginia, we may unhesitatingly assert that the numerical difference between the two armies is less than it has ever been before; that everything which could be devised to strengthen the Confederate position has ever been done; and that to Grant's unwieldy and comparatively raw force Lee opposes an army of veterans. The delay of Grant's advance shows that he does not underrate the powers of his opponent; and he may well be distrustful. He has nothing like the force M'Clellan thought indispensable for an advance upon Richmond when Lee had a much smaller force, and when Richmond was unfortified. His best friends allow that he is no strategist, though they rely much upon his bulldog tenacity. He is bewildered with the sudden display of vigour exhibited by the Confederacy in Kentucky, in Tennessee, and in North Carolina. It is no wonder that on the eve of this tremendous conflict he shrinks from striking the blow which may very possibly crush out the last hopes of the North, on the success of which the stability of the Union depends, and which, at whatever peril, and at whatever cost, must be struck at once. A few days—a few hours—may bring us the news that the battle has been fought. On the other hand, there are many well-informed persons who say that no great movement will take place until the end of May or the beginning of June. Come when it will, it promises to be the crowning struggle of the war; and it is not easy to recal a conflict on the issue of which the destinies of so many millions of civilised men have depended.

Mr. Seward and the French Government.

If, as the Latin poet tells us, it is delightful to stand on the safe shore, and watch the labour of another amid winds and waves, it is also a certain consolation, when ourselves in misery, to see others suffering in like manner. And if our fellow-sufferer be the man who has brought us into trouble, we shall lose much of our own pain in the gratification of seeing our persecutor in difficulties. Such is the best consolation which we can offer to the English Government after the long course of humiliation which they have endured at the hands of the Federal officials. Mr. Seward may have snubbed us, abused us, hectored over us, crammed the washings of New York printing-offices down our throats in the guise of Confederate correspondence; he may have arrogated the right of changing our laws to suit his convenience; he may have insulted our Sovereign in the person of her Ministers, her officers, and her subjects; but he cannot deprive us of the small gratification of seeing him prostrate in his turn before a Power whose menace would be speedily followed by action, and licking the dust before his feet, in behalf of the President and the people whom he represents. In another column will be found a translation of M. Drouyn de Lhuys' despatch to the French agents abroad, explaining to them how abjectly the American Secretary of State had hastened 'to anticipate and obviate any unfavourable impressions which may have arisen in consequence of the Congressional vote asserting the Monroe doctrine in respect of Mexico.' It appears that the Imperial Government would have passed in contemptuous silence over a vote which might either be an expression of impotent spite, or a cunning electioneering intrigue; but the servility of Mr. Seward was rightly judged to be worthy of record, and his readiness to grovel at the feet of a European Power is therefore preserved imperishably in the diplomatic history of the year.

'The Cabinet of Washington repudiates all responsibility in the matter.' Does it indeed? Then, as the same Cabinet did not repudiate all responsibility in the vote of thanks passed by Congress to Admiral Wilkes after the Trent affair, we in England are delighted to learn that we have received one more insult than we had yet counted. All responsibility, forsooth! Why, the terms themselves convey their own refutation; for the responsibility must once have existed, if it can now be so energetically disclaimed. And even where there is no legal responsibility, the Government cannot repudiate the moral responsibility of having cherished the doctrine, and fostered the spirit which brought about the obnoxious vote. However, as Mr. Seward has proved that he can, when occasion requires it, offer apologies such as no liberal-minded Government would think of exacting from another, we may fairly ask the cause of so exceptional a civility. We may demand how it comes about that while we in England were not suffered by the American Minister to receive Mr. Mason with common civility, Mr. Slidell was allowed to present himself unofficially to the French Government, and state his case without interruption or annoyance. Or again, while the strictest blockade has been enforced over the Carolinian coast—while an attempt to pass out of a Southern State the interest of money borrowed before the war was made the pretext for a furious assault on our probity—how was it that permission was given to ship the stores of tobacco, of which the French Government stood in need, through the blockade in French bottoms? If the English Government might not send an envoy to Richmond to remonstrate on a supposed offence imputed to the Confederates by Northern forgeries, why was M. Mercier to make a tour in the Southern States, with the full permission of Mr. Seward, on a merely general mission of inspection? We can find no answer to such questions as these, save in the oft-repeated remark that it is not safe to refuse the common courtesies of society to a man who can and will enforce the observance of them. It is a principle that we encounter everywhere; we meet it round every corner in this city: a bully will be coarsely insolent to a woman, who will be civil and compliant to a resolute man. The conduct of the present Government with respect to the two belligerents of North America has been a subject of such repeated and acrimonious discussion, that it is as useless as painful to harp upon it; but if argument and evidence will not carry conviction into the minds of pro-Northerners in England, we trust that the sight of M. Drouyn de Lhuys' despatch may have more effect. Has our devotion to the cause of neutrality been less than that of France? Has our patience in listening to complaints been less constant? Nay, more, has not our substantial assistance to the North, in defiance of real neutrality, and with a greater regard for the letter than for the spirit of its laws, been far greater? Can we accuse ourselves of having adopted a line of conduct so different from that of the French Government that we may naturally expect a difference in the courtesy we receive? We feel that we can answer all these questions satisfactorily; and yet, in spite of our strict neutrality, and even of our undue favour towards the Federals, we must put up with angry insolence in every epistle addressed to us by the Federal SECRETARY OF STATE. We repeat, if nothing else will convince our Northern sympathisers, the contents of M. DROUYN DE LHUYS' despatch at least should teach them that they are mistaken in the object of their sympathies.

We must congratulate the Federal Congress upon the dignified position which Mr. SEWARD has made them assume in the sight of Europe. That their faults and petty malices should be pilloried before us is fair enough, though even then they might grumble that their own Secretary of State assumes the office of common hangman; but that they should be represented as a debating society whose views on foreign affairs are deserving of no attention, that they should be degraded to the position of any trumpery vestry meeting which chooses to pass impotent resolutions upon the conduct of the Foreign Secretary, is a depth of ignominy which they owe entirely to Mr. SEWARD'S officious servility. Il faut laver son linge sale en famille, said NAPOLEON I.; you must first hang it up on high for Europe to laugh at and blush over, says the Federal Cabinet.

The principle which Mr. SEWARD asserts has existed for centuries in Europe; in many countries it is still in full force. The law of England acknowledges it, inasmuch as the Sovereign is sole arbiter of peace or war. But we can recollect no instance in which a European statesman has thus gone out of his way to pass an insult upon an assembly supposed to be constituted of the united wisdom of his country. The people of the United States have stomached so many affronts and passed over so many arbitrary and high-handed acts affecting their own personal liberty, that they will probably not be much disturbed at this verdict of imbecility passed upon their representatives. Yet it must be, we think, somewhat galling to the dignity of any community that it should be sacrificed on the shrine of Mr. SEWARD'S foreign policy.

The 'Georgia' in Parliament.

ON Friday, on the formal motion that the House at its rising do adjourn till Thursday—i. e. over the Whitsuntide holidays, the partisans of the Federal government made an angry demonstration against the purchase of ships from British builders by the Confederate government. The commencement of the attack was aptly entrusted to the gentleman who, of all English merchants, has made the largest profit by contraband trade during the continuance of this war. Mr. BARING has extensive connections in the Northern States; his firm is one of the most influential in England; and his position in both countries enabled him to become the largest dealer in arms and munitions of war between this country and New York. He has supplied to the Federal Government the means of killing some tens of thousands of Confederate soldiers; and it was therefore properly left to him to complain that some other merchants had supplied to the Confederates the means of destroying a few score of Federal merchantmen. He asked whether the Ministry were aware that the Georgia—a vessel equipped and manned in British waters, had lately entered the port of Liverpool; and if so, whether her admission there were thought consistent with the honour and the neutrality of England. And he did his best to prove that the Georgia ought to have been excluded from our ports, avowedly in the interest and as the representative of a considerable number of British shipowners, who are afraid that when next Great Britain shall be engaged in war, her enemy will be furnished with cruisers from American ports, by the very same means which have enabled the Confederates to obtain cruisers in England, and who imagine that, by putting a stop to such practices now, they may establish a precedent to which, in future times, the Americans will perforce adhere. The debate which followed was remarkable for the clearness and ability with which the various arguments bearing on the case of the Alabama and her consorts were set forth; it may be considered the most complete and most interesting discussion of the questions involved in that case that has yet taken place.

The reasonings of Mr. BARING, and of Mr. FORSTER, and of Mr. COBDEN, by whom he was supported, were, perhaps purposelessly, somewhat confused. They mixed up together questions of interest, of law, and of international justice, in a manner which no doubt gave additional weight to their oratory, but which deprived it of logical coherence and conclusive force. Nor did the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in his very lucid and forcible reply, sufficiently disentangle the various threads of argument which were mixed up and confused in Mr. BARING'S speech. With the question of British interests he did not deal at all; and he did not separate as distinctly as he might have done the question of legal right from that of international justice. In our analysis of the discussion we shall endeavour to separate these questions so as to make apparent to our readers the arguments addressed to each point, and their bearing on the general issue.

It is affirmed, in the first place, that it is the interest of Great Britain, as the chief of the maritime Powers, to exclude the interference of neutrals in maritime warfare. We are, it is said, the strongest of all naval Powers: it is, therefore, our peculiar interest to take care that other and weaker Powers shall not be able, in time of war, to supplement their weakness at sea by obtaining from neutral nations the means of maritime hostility. We have, moreover, the largest mercantile marine in the world; we are, therefore, interested above all other Powers in lessening the ability of maritime belligerents, and especially of the weaker maritime belligerent, to harass the enemy's commerce on the high seas. In case of war, we shall be in the position now occupied by the United States; if we allow the doctrine to prevail that neutrals may supply belligerent Powers with cruisers armed and manned, that doctrine will, when we in our turn become belligerents, be eminently disastrous to our commerce. In all this, no doubt, there is a spice of truth. But it may well be doubted whether our interest in this matter be not exceedingly exaggerated. For if we be at war with any Power of the first rank, it is probable, and indeed certain, that we should in any case be exposed to a risk of attacks on our commerce sufficient to raise the rate of insurance to a point which will make it impossible for our shipowners to keep the sea. Do what we may, war will cripple our mercantile marine; and it is not worth while to make any sacrifice of our advantage as neutrals in order to make this disastrous result of war a little less complete and speedy in its operation. Again, as the Economist justly observed, we have another interest to consider. At present we are the great shipbuilding nation of the world. We can supply war ships much faster and more cheaply than any other country. This superiority will be of immense value to us in time of war. But if, in time of peace, we persecute and punish the building of ships of war for those who want them, we shall drive the trade into other hands; and when we come ourselves to be belligerents, we shall sorely feel the loss. The case of the shipowners, therefore, on the point of national interest, is by no means so clear and overwhelming as they seem to suppose. And whatever our interest may be, this much is certain, that we ought neither to break the law for the sake of our interest, nor to introduce a new rule of international law, pendente lite, adverse to one belligerent and favourable to the other, unless such rule be clearly demanded by neutral duty and public morality.

It behoves us, therefore, to consider in the next place, what is the legal position of the Alabama, Florida, and Georgia; and whether it be such as would justify us in excluding them from our ports, It is admitted on the one hand that a regular ship of war has a right to such admission; and on the other hand, that a privateer which has been illegally fitted up within the jurisdiction of the neutral may fairly be excluded. Now, in the first place, the Georgia and her consorts are in no sense privateers. A privateer is a vessel of war belonging to a private owner, and fitted out by him to make war merely for the sake of gain. These vessels belong to the Confederate Government; they are regularly commissioned by that Government; and their officers all bear regularly signed commissions in the Confederate service. To endeavour to confound them with privateers, as Mr. COBDEN did, is the very extravagance of prejudice and unscrupulousness. Secondly, not one of these vessels was fitted out as a vessel of war within British jurisdiction. They quitted our ports as merchantmen, and received their equipment as cruisers elsewhere. They fall, therefore, under the denomination of regular ships of war. And the fact that they have never entered a Confederate port—which, as regards the Florida, is not the case—does not affect the legal status. On this point the ATTORNEY-GENERAL was exceedingly distinct and emphatic. Now there is no precedent for forbidding public ships of war from entering neutral ports, unless this prohibition be extended to all the ships of both belligerents. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL indeed affirms that Her MAJESTY has the right to refuse hospitality to particular ships on special grounds. But it is quite clear that this refusal cannot be claimed as of right by the opposite party; and that on merely legal grounds neither the North nor its partisans have any right to complain of the admission of the Georgia. If we excluded her on the ground that her original purchase in our ports was wrongful, if not illegal, we should be establishing a new rule of international law, to the advantage of the North, and to the injury of the South.

Worsted on the ground of law, Mr. BARING and his supporters laid great stress upon what they affirmed to be the obligations of international morality. Their doctrine is, that we have no right to furnish ships of war to the South; that those who have done so have set at nought the law of the land and Her MAJESTY'S proclamation of neutrality; and that it is our duty to punish the violation of our laws by the Confederates, and to render redress to the Federals by refusing hospitality to ships fitted out in evasion of our law. Now, in the first place, it is false, as a matter of international obligation, that we have no right to sell ships to the South. At international law, ships and arms stand on the same footing; the subjects of a neutral power may sell either, subject only to the ordinary penalties of a contraband trade. The difference, such as it is, depends entirely on a municipal statute; and the violation of that statute by the Confederates is an exceedingly doubtful one. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, who declares that it has been violated, admits that the Confederates may well have supposed that they were keeping within it; and we may add that they certainly did believe this, and took the utmost pains to avoid anything like illegality. If it be asked, as Sir R. PALMER asks, why so much care was taken to conceal a purpose believed to be lawful, we must remind the questioner that there were two dangers to be avoided—a violation of the law by Her MAJESTY'S Government, such as occurred in the case of the El Toussoun, and the vigilance of the enemy's spies and the enemy's cruisers. It appears, then, that as a matter of fact the Confederates have not intended to violate our laws, and that, if Mr. LAIRD have disobeyed the QUEEN'S proclamation, Mr. BARING has been equally disobedient. It does not seem that, under such circumstances, it behoves the partisans of the North to talk very loudly about the disloyalty of Mr. LAIRD, or that we should be justified in taking hostile measures against the Georgia, the Florida, or the Alabama.

Again, when we depart from questions of law, and come to questions of international morality, when we depart from the rules of legal evidence, and talk of acting on moral certainties, it behoves us to consider what we know of the conduct of the North. If we are to enforce moral claims against one party, we must enforce them against the other; if we are to act on moral certainty against Southern cruisers, why not against Federal recruiting agents? If we are to exclude Confederate ships because the Confederate Government perhaps violated an uncertain law, how can we admit the ships of the Federal Government, which systematically violates our positive laws against the enlistment of British subjects? If we are to send away the Georgia because she was manned by Englishmen, how can we admit Federal men-of-war, knowing, as we do, that one-half of their crews are English? These points were strongly and justly put by the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, and neither Mr. FORSTER nor Mr. COBDEN ventured to grapple with them.

We might turn Sir ROUNDELL PALMER'S argument against himself. We might use his language in the case of the Georgia the more emphatically to contradict his defence of the seizure of the Tuscaloosa. But we forbear to do so. We are content to call attention to the debate of Friday evening as containing a full statement of all that is to be said about the treatment of Confederate ships in British waters, the argument of the North being completely set forth by Messrs. BARING, FORSTER, and COBDEN, and thoroughly refuted by the ATTORNEY-GENERAL and Lord R. CECIL.

FEDERAL PHILANTHROPY AND JUSTICE.—Such is the picture of Louisiana under the degenerating influence of the Government which would have us believe that it is carrying on a bloody and destructive war mainly for the sake of the negro race and the doctrines of a sensitive philanthropy. The Southern planters may be excused if they feel rather indignant when they find themselves expelled from their estates, and turned adrift upon the world, avowedly in the interest of those slaves for whom the sympathies of the North are so tenderly interested. It must be with singular feelings that they behold the re-establishment on the ruins of their former prosperity, not only of a system of slavery retaining all the harsher features of that odious institution, but unredeemed by maintenance in sickness and old age, on which alone the mind of any man of benevolence could rest with the slightest satisfaction. Singularly, too, must they be affected on beholding the revival of the slave trade in the shape of a traffic carried on by the Government in their own fugitive negroes. We also cannot feel wholly unmoved when we turn from the description which we have given above of the manner in which the Confederates are supplied with the necessaries of life in exchange for cotton, which is furnished to the exigencies of the Northern Government, and compare this relaxation of their own rules in their own favour, and the circumstances of pecuniary corruption with which it is attended, with the rigid exclusion of this same article from the markets of Western Europe. While the American Government is denouncing us as little better than pirates and outlaws for the attempts of individual merchants to run the blockade, we have the satisfaction of seeing that they have no objection to run the blockade on their own account, and to turn an honest penny by selling to their own citizens exemption from the prohibition which they have created. They have brought to perfection the art of tempering justice with mercy. Justice requires that the Confederates should be absolutely excluded from intercourse with the rest of the world; but mercy steps in and qualifies the Draconian severity of the rule by an exemption in favour of those who are willing to pay handsomely for it. Virtue is said to be the mainstay of republics. If this be so, we may easily calculate the probable duration of Republican institutions in the State of Louisiana.—Times, May 17.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York: May 4, 1864.

THE IMPENDING CONFLICT IN VIRGINIA—THE PREPARATIONS ON EITHER SIDE—MR. LINCOLN'S DILEMMA—WHAT RESULTS WILL FOLLOW FROM A NORTHERN OR A SOUTHERN VICTORY—THE WANTON DESTRUCTION OF A TOWN—BANKS'S DEFEAT—A CORRESPONDENT OF A NEW YORK PAPER SENT AWAY FROM NEW ORLEANS—WHY THE LINCOLNITES ADMIT THE RED RIVER DISASTER—BANKS EXTINGUISHED AS A PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE—THE INCREASED DUTY LEVIED ON GOODS IN BOND CONSIDERED UNJUST AND UNCONSTITUTIONAL—THE INTERNAL TAX BILL—WHAT IT IS LIKELY TO PRODUCE—RESULTS OF THE TAX ON CARRIAGES—THE 'NO TAX' PARTY—REPUDIATION BY THE STATE OF NEW YORK—THE EFFORT TO MAINTAIN CREDIT ABROAD—THE CHARGES AGAINST MR. CHASE—WHY THEY ARE PREFERRED—THE BARGAIN BETWEEN MR. LINCOLN AND MR. CHASE'S ACCUSER—AN EXAMPLE OF THE SENSE OF HONOUR OF THE LINCOLN GOVERNMENT.

The impending conflict in Virginia is to be a mighty one. It is the evident plan of the Federals, under the inspiration of the new Lieutenant-General, to make an overwhelming and crushing effort to destroy Lee's army and capture Richmond. It has entered into their imaginations that this will be the end of the war, and their Financial Minister has advised them that without military success the Government credit will perish. All available troops are drawn to that point. Distant places, won at great cost of life, have been evacuated in order to strengthen this army; and for the numerous disasters which have recently overtaken the Federal arms, the ready excuse has been made, that it is the policy to risk losses elsewhere in order to make the forces in Virginia irresistible. In addition to the enlisted armies, eighty-five thousand militia have been called out in the Western border States to do home and garrison duty, that all regular troops may be hurried to the front. The time of service is for a hundred days, which shows the limit of time within which a decisive result is expected. It is difficult to form any estimate of the amount of the force which will be thus accumulated against the defenders of the Southern capital. Reports carry it up to three hundred and fifty thousand and four hundred thousand fighting men, but they are conjectures and probable exaggerations. The numbers are, however, very large, and the force formidable. The veteran troops are said to be very good, but there is an element of weakness in the quality of the new levies, from whom not very good or hearty fighting is expected. On the Southern side there is a corresponding activity and concentration. There is a systematic suppression by this Government of all Southern newspapers and news, but we hear through various sources, more to be credited than the reports sent forth from Washington, that General Lee has been strongly reinforced, that the defences of Richmond have been enlarged and made very strong, and that the troops under General Lee are, though inferior in numbers, perfect in discipline, and believed to be able to meet successfully the coming shock. There is unlimited faith in the genius of Lee and the heroic qualities and discipline of his veteran army. There is no such faith on this side in General Grant, partly because he has no antecedents which give any assurance of his competency to cope with such a master in the art of war as General Lee has proved himself to be, and partly because his name has been mixed up, by parties hostile to the Administration, in schemes for overthrowing its ascendency at the next election; and by a large class the President and his advisers are actually thought to be base enough to fear that General Grant might become too great by victory, and to be willing to protract the struggle, so that at least it may be indecisive, until the nominations in June have secured the President the control of the party. Mr. Lincoln's dilemma is indeed an unhappy one for his political prospects. If Grant should be victorious, signally, it might make him President by acclamation; if he should be defeated, the reaction of the disaster might overthrow Mr. Lincoln in favour of some opposition candidate. So completely has Mr. Lincoln exposed himself of late as having administered his office and directed the war policy with the view of securing his own re-election, that men of his own party do not hesitate to say that he will not, if he can help it, let Grant fight a decisive battle until the June nomination is made. I say if Mr. Lincoln can help it, for General Grant has acquired such a hold on the public mind, from the hope that he will do something to bring this weary war to a close, that he can afford to quarrel with the President more than the President can afford to thwart him. And I ought to add, if General Lee will let him; for there is a very current belief that the battle which is looked for with so much intense expectation may be brought on by Lee.

Agitating rumours get abroad almost every day which give out that the actual collision of arms has begun somewhere along the line. I do not believe it can long be deferred, even if Lee should, for reasons of strategy, alter the plan of defence which is attributed to him, and choose to meet the invader nearer to Richmond; but the present indications are that the shock of arms will commence on the Rapidan. Of the issue I shall make no vainglorious prophecy. If the Confederate general gains a victory, it will be the forerunner of peace. This country cannot carry on war through another campaign under the financial strain to which the Government is subjected, and with the distresses and convulsions following the collapse of the huge paper system which a severe reverse in Virginia would precipitate, and which, let me add, a victory there would only defer. There is visible everywhere a growing restiveness under the burdens of the war, and of hostility to the authors of the war, which would break out irrepressibly under the exasperations of a great defeat; and a success, which will not lighten these burdens, nor give assurance of peace, nor bring back a sound currency and low prices, nor give contentment to the lower classes—as assuredly the result of the campaign in Virginia will not—will be only the postponement of the evil day. This battle in Virginia may therefore be reckoned as the sure beginning of the end of the war should Lee triumph; otherwise, the conflict will be more protracted, and the bloodshed, the horrors, and the cost, be frightfully increased.

One of the first incidents of the campaign shows the temper in which it is to be waged on that line. It is a repetition, under higher auspices, of Kilpatrick's raid towards Richmond, in the spirit of Dahlgren's famous instructions. An expedition was sent on a reconnaissance to Madison Court House, the county town of Madison county. It was a place of no military importance; but some Confederates, who were met on the way of the Union troops, took refuge there, and the attempt was made to dislodge them. They made good their defences, and although the Federals had no use for the town, and did not want to occupy it, they decided to 'smoke out' the party by firing the town. They did so, and reduced it to ashes; after which they rode off in triumph, and the feat is chronicled as a legitimate operation of war. The town was a pleasant one, containing about 800 inhabitants, some churches, and other public buildings, and some fine mansions belonging to planters in the vicinity. It had shops, and warehouses, and mills, all of which were wantonly destroyed; although the Federal report of the transaction says it was of 'little value in a strategical point of view.' It was burned in the mere lust for devastation.

It seems almost impossible to gather the full results of the Red River battles, in which the Federal army under General Banks is admitted to have sustained a great defeat. The New Orleans journals are all silent, or, under military pressure, are employed in disguising the losses and dressing up prospective victories. The best source of information we had here was in the correspondent of the New York World from New Orleans, who wrote very independently of the state of things in that department, and described events exactly as they appeared to his own judgment, without official dictation. But this writer has been sent away by the military authorities, as too free-spoken; not because he was dangerous within the department—for he could only utter his thoughts a thousand miles off, and they could not be reprinted there—but because he disclosed transactions which dangerous and corrupt men desire that nobody should know beyond the circles where they occurred. But for a partisan interest among his own political associates, it would not be conceded that there was anything serious in the losses of Banks on the Red River, or anything which is discouraging to the Union cause. The friends of General Banks have engaged for some time in a scheme for making him a candidate for the Presidential nomination at the June Convention. A contingency is anticipated, in which, from the dissensions in that body among the partisans of Lincoln, Fremont, and Chase, it might be agreed upon to abandon all of them and unite on a new man. General Banks has had a good reputation for administrative ability, and though leagued, by the necessities of his position at New Orleans, with a throng of corrupt officials, is free from the taint of personal corruption. He is very ambitious, and is not unwilling to use the vices of others to strengthen his political prospects, but does not soil his own fingers with touching the plunder. Hence he has been privately urged as a very proper man to be brought forward in the Convention as a compromise candidate on whom the whole party could unite. It has become the policy of the President's friends to check this movement, and they have done so effectually by admitting the Red River defeat as a damaging reverse to the Union cause, and charging it to the military incompetency and gross mismanagement of General Banks. His removal is talked of, and there are reports from Washington that it is already decided on, and his successor is designated in General A. J. Smith, who commanded the corps which saved the remnants of the army after the rout under Banks. Whether this be so or not, Banks is effectually extinguished as a possible competitor for the Presidency. This party intrigue has, however, led to explicit avowals that the Federal defeat on the Red River was a very disastrous one, and the loss in men and munitions of war immense. They confess to a loss of five thousand men, but the figures are kept back. The Confederate accounts are that the loss was double that amount at the least.

The capture of Plymouth by the Confederates, and their re-occupation of Washington, give a very favourable aspect to the condition of affairs there, and release a considerable body of troops for the aid of General Lee's operations in Virginia.

The warning of Secretary Chase—that, without immediate taxation to the amount of fully one-half of the current expenditures of the Government, the finances of the Government must break down—has moved Congress into a spasmodic effort to lay taxes. Mr. Chase's idea, translated into figures, is that with $500,000,000 of secured revenues, the Government can continue its annual expenditure of $1,000,000,000 a year, or such amount as it may be reduced to by the conclusion of the war, or added to in prosecuting it. The surplus of expenditure over income he supposes he can add safely to the debt annually. The two measures Congress proposes to give him for these objects are an increased revenue from the Customs and an increase of internal taxes.

The new Tariff Bill has not been brought forward, but a short provisional Bill has been passed, by which the rates of the existing tariff are raised fifty per cent. for the period of sixty days, to take effect immediately. Within that period it is thought that a new tariff, to take the place of the present, can be agreed upon and passed. These new rates are construed to apply to goods in bond as well as goods to be brought in, and there is loud complaint by the merchants that it is a breach of good faith. They maintain that only such duties can be levied as were legally chargeable at the date of importation, and that the warehousing is only an arrangement for the mutual convenience of the parties, to secure their duties. There is a precedent in the action of Congress in a similar case for this construction, and there seems to be no doubt that the Judiciary will pronounce this new exaction unconstitutional. On the general propriety of levying new taxes suddenly, of its fairness to individuals, and its effect upon importations and revenue, Congress does not appear to have bestowed a thought.

An internal Tax Bill has been introduced, and has passed the House of Representatives, after so much controversy over the details, and so much alteration from what it was when reported, that the chairman of the committee which framed it told the House, with a groan, that he wished he was a loco foco that he might vote against it. He placed his assent to it, on the simple ground that his party obligations constrained him, against his judgment. It has gone to the Senate, to pass through the same torturing process there; and no one can form a conjecture in what shape it will reappear, or what will be its final character. Remonstrances are going up in great numbers against its partial character in many respects, and the oppressions which particular interests complain of in its bearings upon them. No reliable estimate has been published to show the amount of revenue it is expected to produce in the shape in which it passed—some calculators place it as high as $300,000,000, others rate it below $200,000,000, and not a few question whether any considerable portion can be collected at all. The taxes are so minute and so numerous, and the processes for reaching them so inquisitorial, and so much scope is left to the conscience of the tax-payer, and for favouritism and corruption in officials who will be the tools of party, that the opportunities for evasion will be infinite. The chances of a faithful execution of a tax law may be estimated from the facts developed in the official returns of the proceeds of the existing tax on carriages. The internal tax law of 1861–2 placed a tax of $10 each on pleasure-carriages valued at over $600. The amount returned as collected in the United States for the year ending June 30, 1863, was only $2,460, representing 246 carriages, when in this city of New York alone, there are many more than a thousand men who would be affronted at the intimation that they ride in anything of smaller value. Besides, there is the shadow projected of a coming party which will go before the people with the issue that no taxes ought to be paid at all, to meet principal or interest of a debt contracted, as they will say, wickedly and unlawfully, to make the poor man and his posterity slaves of the fundholder. There is no public virtue in this country which will stand up against such an appeal to interest and passion. It may be predicted with certainty that no system of taxes adequate to sustain this mountain of debt will stand long enough to give confidence to the public creditor; and that if the debt be not extinguished de facto by the dissolution of the Government, it will be repudiated by direct vote, or by the refusal of the Legislature to vote means, acting under the compulsion of the omnipotent majority of numbers.

No more ominous sign need be cited of the rapidity with which the public mind gets to be demoralised on this topic, than the course of the New York Legislature in the matter of paying the interest on the State debt. The first year after the suspension of specie payments, the State Comptroller assumed it to be his duty, without instructions, to pay the public creditor in coin, and the next Legislature sanctioned the responsibility he took, and refunded the money he had borrowed for that purpose. But they took one step downward, and provided, for the ensuing year, only for the payment of the foreign creditor in coin. They broke faith with their own citizens. This year they have passed concurrent resolutions declaring that no discrimination shall be made between foreign and domestic holders of State stocks, and made these directory, by appropriating for the payment of interest only the amount in legal tender notes. The repudiation is therefore general, as against all their stock creditors, of the difference in value between the currency in which the contract was made and that in which it is paid. For every $100 she agreed to pay, the State pays only at present rates, about $55. It is only a question of degree, but not of principle or morals, between this confiscation of a part and a repudiation of the whole.

If the Legislature of the most populous, wealthy, and powerful of the American States can thus violate contracts, and rob creditors in an amount so absolutely insignificant compared with the resources of the State, what may not be looked for from an excited people, complaining of intolerable burdens, and chafing under what they will be taught to think grievous oppressions and cruel wrongs?

Governor Seymour saw the fatal tendency of this action, and sent in a message of remonstrance against it as unjust, impolitic, and mischievous. It was not in his power to interpose a veto, for the resolutions were concurrent, and his signature was not needed. Besides, they were merely declaratory of the duty of making no discrimination. The evil application was in the omission to make provision in the Appropriation Bill for the purchase of coin. The Governor could not send back the whole Bill for the lack of an appropriation which he thought ought to be in it. They treated his expostulations with contempt, and adhered to their purpose. The legislative decision, for repudiation in that degree, was therefore complete.

The Governor and leading bankers are now labouring together to weaken the effect abroad of this shameful proceeding, by raising the means by voluntary advance for making good the deficiency to the foreign holder, and risking the chance of being repaid by a future Legislature. They may succeed in getting the money, and perhaps it may be refunded to them; but how far will this half-faced honesty, this keeping of faith with foreigners only—by capitalists from motives of policy, that they may borrow again when they need it—go among discreet money-lenders abroad to give confidence that this immorality will not be repeated when the greater pressure comes on; that this high example of repudiation will not be seized and improved upon by the voting masses, who will have no personal credit to make sacrifices for, but will seek to find in it relief from suffering and oppression, 'taxation and tyranny'?

I have scarcely left myself room to speak of the disgraceful disclosures in Congress, involving the character of Secretary Chase in his administration of the Treasury. The charges against him are of the most serious kind, including corruption, and conniving at corruption, in the most scandalous degree, for the enriching of favourites, and the strengthening of his own position, as a candidate for the Presidency, to the prejudice of Mr. Lincoln. Herein lies the secret of the outbreak and cause of the disclosures. The assault is made upon Mr. Chase by a member of the House of Representatives, who is in the interest of Mr. Lincoln, under circumstances which leave no doubt that he is specially patronised in the assault by Mr. Lincoln himself. If it had not been for a competition between Mr. Lincoln and his Secretary about the Presidential succession, such utterances as have been made against the Secretary would have been suppressed as 'disloyal,' perhaps punished as giving aid and comfort to the rebels.

You will see in the public journals the details of the scene in the House—the fierce attack, the attempt to stifle investigation, the charges, criminations, and recriminations, and the proofs extorted from the President of his intimate relations and associations with the Secretary's enemy. But it may interest your readers to know something of the personal history of the affair, and the chief actors in it.

Frank P. Blair, who leads the onslaught, was elected to the present House of Representatives from the St. Louis district of the State of Missouri, after a bitter contest in which he was violently opposed by the German Radicals because of his active hostility to their favourite, General Fremont. Fremont had had command of that department—and Blair, whose influence with the Administration was strong through his brother, the Postmaster-General, had aided materially in getting the General removed. Blair is a man of character and talents, and of very resolute temper. When elected the vote was so close between him and the next candidate that his seat was contested, and that question is not yet decided. He had, at the time of the meeting of Congress, a commission as Major-General of Volunteers, which it was necessary for him to resign if he accepted the seat. His vote there was thought to be important in organising the house so as to suit the friends of Mr. Lincoln, and a correspondence ensued between these two, which has since been made public. It was arranged that Mr. Lincoln should accept the resignation of General Blair, so that the latter might act for his party and friends in the House so long as his services were useful to them and agreeable to himself; but that the Commission should be returned to him whenever he might ask for it. The published letters establish this convenient arrangement, which was in effect that the President should hold the commission in reserve as long as Mr. Blair might desire, in order that he might enjoy the repute of acting in Congress as an independent member, and should give it back without the troublesome necessity of submitting the nomination again to the Senate which might be in a humour to reject it. It was clearly a private traffic with the office for the benefit of a party and the personal interest of Mr. Lincoln. The bargain was fulfilled, the resignation was formally tendered and formally accepted, but to have its full effect it must be officially recorded in the War Office, which was done. Mr. Blair appeared in Congress, as an independent civilian, but really the retained supporter of Mr. Lincoln, with a bond in his pocket for the price. As soon as Mr. Chase showed signs of opposition to Mr. Lincoln's presidential aspirations, Mr. Blair put himself forward in the House as his assailant, and made again and again positive and grave charges of official delinquency, personal corruption, and political treachery. A fierce war of crimination and recrimination ensued, in which Blair was assailed with counter-charges by the friends of Mr. Chase, but he courted investigation, and cleared himself successfully. The House has been at last driven or shamed into an enquiry into the charges against the Secretary, and the various imputed mismanagements, abuses and frauds in his department. When the controversy reached that point, Mr. Blair claims of President Lincoln the fulfilment of his compact, and the President promptly complies. He permits Mr. Blair to withdraw the resignation of his commission; the member, no longer a member, reappears as a major-general; and the President makes some extensive changes in the commands of the army, in order to bestow on the public accuser of his Secretary of the Treasury a conspicuous position at the head of a favourite army corps.

It is hardly conceivable how the President and Secretary can remain together after these exposures, or that they did not separate at once by mutual repulsion—how the President can retain in high office a person against whom such charges of corruption and maladministration are pending, after giving countenance to the charge by sustaining and rewarding the accuser—or how any man of honourable sensibilities can cling to an office, after receiving such indignities from the President, by whose toleration he holds it. You may take these facts as examples of the sense of official and personal honour prevailing among the highest personages of Government in this model republic, which every now and then votes itself to be the most enlightened on the face of the earth.

COMPLETE DEFEAT OF BANKS.

New Orleans, Louisiana: April 25, 1864.

THE COMPLETE DEFEAT OF BANKS—A SUBSTANTIAL VICTORY FOR THE CONFEDERATES—THE FEDERAL LOSSES—LETTER FROM A CONFEDERATE OFFICER — BROWNSVILLE, TEXAS, THE BASE OF OPERATIONS AGAINST MEXICO—THE FEDERAL ENMITY TO THE FRENCH.

The battles in West Louisiana, on the 7th, 8th, and 9th instant, are still the theme of comment with the public of this city. And well they may be: such decisive victories and such terrible, irreparable disasters had not hitherto been experienced in this war. The enemy was not merely defeated, but utterly routed, pursued, harassed, and pressed up to the latest hour of our advices. The campaign is at an end, and the army of Banks, which expected to go through Texas from the mouth of the Red River to the Rio Grande, is now a demoralised and dispirited herd, cowering under protection of their inevitable gunboats. No Federal army has ever started on an expedition with finer equipments, with more abundant supplies, or with more confident hopes. According to the advices received a few hours ago, and they are entirely trustworthy, it is now endeavouring to make its way back along the river to Alexandria, with the design of getting to the transports below the falls, whence they expect to be brought to this city. This is not merely a brilliant victory for the Confederate arms, but a triumph fraught with solid and enduring results. In fact, we may justly call it the first decisive victory of the war. General Taylor did not rest content with the defeat of Banks on the field of battle, but followed him up and forced him to an engagement of more or less consequence every day, till Banks must have cursed the hour of his birth as he looked upon his beaten and decimated army, sans supplies, sans trains, sans artillery, sans hope or spirit, or any thought or feeling but how to escape the vengeance of the men they had come to enslave, whose homes and broad abounding fields they had made the abomination of desolation. No doubt it was the thought of these desolated homes that nerved the arms of the Confederates to their desperate gallantry. In this brief campaign, Banks has had from twelve to fifteen thousand men put hors de combat, nearly eight thousand of whom are said to have been captured. He has but a moiety of his trains left, and they were on the most extensive scale, as is usual in the Federal armies. He lost thirty pieces of artillery, including the famous Nim's battery and a couple of batteries manned by regulars, and the horses and caissons of the other batteries were more or less injured. He had 6,000 cavalry, but it is a thing of the past. On the 7th inst., the Texan horse swept down upon it, and it became an undistinguishable wrack. What remained of it was charged upon by Mouton's Louisianians and Polignac's Texans, in the battle of the 8th, and was literally cut to pieces, as I am informed by members of the 1st Louisiana Cavalry (Federal), who were in the fight, and were fearfully hacked by the long knives of the Texans. Generals Lee and Dudley, who commanded the cavalry, are now here, having been sent to the city under charges of incompetency. They return their superior's compliments with interest, charging upon his incompetency all the disasters that have befallen the army from the opening to the close of the campaign. I think myself that Banks would better have confined himself to the promenade concerts and bals masqués. As it is, he has ruined his prospects for the Presidency as well as the army of the 'Department of the Gulf.' He is now bringing the troops from Texas to assist him in fighting his way down Red River to the Mississippi. I could fill a dozen of the broad columns of The Index with incidents of the battles in West Louisiana, but must content myself with the following extracts from a letter written by a Confederate officer, who was in a position to be well informed. These extracts are copied from the original, which was kindly lent me. The names I withhold for obvious reasons:—

'United States transport Polar Star,
'near Baton Rouge, La., April 16, 1864.

'Dear Cousin,—As we feared, we are again on our way to New Orleans to await exchange, as at this time General Taylor is too much engaged in running about after Banks to enter into negotiations for us. As we passed Baton Rouge this morning, we picked up several New Orleans papers, in which some one has given a very one-sided account of the battles of the 8th and 9th at Pleasant Hill, which account winds up, as usual, with great victory to the Union forces. Not only for your benefit, but for the benefit of our friends and sympathisers generally, who seldom have an opportunity of hearing more than one side of the story, I will state what has come within our knowledge of the affair. Although we are prisoners paroled to the extent of this transport, we nevertheless have had many facilities for being informed on the subject, as we have either been with the fleet or in close proximity to Banks's army for the past ten days. A few more such victories as this they speak of, and there will not be such a thing as an organised body of Union forces in West Louisiana, which God grant may soon come to pass. On the 11th inst. Captain Airy, General Liddell's Adjutant-General, boarded this steamer with a flag of truce, while we were falling back from the fleet towards Grand Ecore. He said General Liddell had received two despatches from General Taylor to this effect. On the 8th inst. he had attacked the enemy, four miles south-east of Mansfield (De Soto parish), with his own army proper, viz. Walker's and Mouton's divisions of infantry and Green's division of cavalry. The infantry numbered 8,000 and the cavalry 4,000 men, in all 12,000. The result of that day's fight was a complete victory to our arms, the enemy being driven back to Pleasant Hill, a distance of sixteen miles. On the morning of the 9th inst. Taylor was reinforced by a division of Price's army. He pursued and attacked the enemy vigorously, and completely routed him. The enemy was cut off from direct communication with his gunboats at Grand Bayou, on Red River, a distance of 15 miles, and was compelled to fall back in confusion and panic on Grand Ecore, a distance of 50 miles from Mansfield, closely pursued by Taylor. The fruits of the victory were 21 pieces of artillery, 1,500 prisoners—many more being continually brought in—200 wagons, 3,000 horses and mules, an immense quantity of commissary and ordnance stores, and a large number of the enemy killed and wounded the latter left in Taylor's hands. Taylor's loss in killed and wounded heavy, but had not been fully ascertained. Among the killed are General Mouton, Colonel Beard, Major Canfield, and some other officers of note. Banks's entire force engaged on the 8th and 9th were about 30,000 infantry and 10,000 cavalry. From the most reliable information received, Banks's loss in killed, wounded, and missing is about 14,000 men. This transport was with the enemy's fleet when information was received of Banks's disaster. The fleet was then at Loggy Bayou, 60 miles from Shreveport by water and 40 by land. The order was immediately to return, and keep a sharp lookout for sharpshooters. This boat, with its flag of truce, took the lead in descending the river, and was allowed by General Liddell to pass on; but the gunboats and balance of the transports were fired on by musketry and field artillery, and, at the time of our leaving Grand Ecore for New Orleans—the 14th—it was believed from the signs that but a small portion of the fleet had returned. The enemy acknowledge that three transports are still up the river in danger, and that many men had been killed and wounded on board. Just previous to our leaving Grand Ecore, information had been received that, on the 12th and 13th, Green's cavalry had engaged Banks's troops a short distance from that place. Considerable uneasiness prevailed. The enemy at Grand Ecore were drawn up in line of battle, and the gunboats prepared for action. Some 800 wounded from the cavalry fight and the fleet above had been brought in up to the date of our departure.

'The enemy regard the condition of their gunboats as precarious, there being but five feet water on the falls at Alexandria, and the river falling slowly. Thus Banks's hope of getting to Shreveport in the year '64 is at an end, it being impossible for him to reach that point without the aid of his gunboats. The fighting is considered to have been desperate; Federal officers and men, who have fought against Lee, Jackson, Bragg, and Pemberton, freely saying they never encountered such fighting men as fought them on April 8 and 9. For instance, a Federal officer states that Polignac's brigade charged the 19th Army Corps eight times, and was repulsed every time; but forming his battle line for the 9th onset, they attacked the enemy so furiously that they were beaten back in disorder. History records no parallel; and well may Polignac be proud of his wild Texans, and they of the general whom they say they have made. At first they were disgusted that a French foreigner should command them, and called him Polecat. Now they believe him to be akin to the great Buonaparte, and call him Napoleonac. With the same desperation that Polignac fought, so did Walker's and Green's Texans, Mouton's Louisianians, and Price's Missourians. They all deserve equal praise. It is enough to say that the Confederate cause in the Trans-Mississippi department is in the hands of brave men and able leaders. I heard it spoken of by our Federal guard that the 13th Army Corps did not bring more than 1,000 muskets out of the fight. I give it for what it is worth. As we stopped at Alexandria yesterday morning, we learned that the force left to garrison the place, together with all the citizens, were greatly alarmed for fear of an attack from Magruder. Some of the boys gave three cheers for General Banks as we backed out, as he was the best commissary and ordnance officer the Confederate army ever had. The cheers were loud and long, by all rebs in sight.

'Capt. Co. —, 19th Tex. Vol. Inf., Scurry's Brigade.'

It is given out that Texas is to be wholly abandoned, but this I do not credit. Brownsville, at least, will be held as a base of operations against the new Empire, which is sooner or later to be invaded by a Yankee army. Of this you may feel assured, as I am in a position to know that which I assert. The officials on both sides of the river at Brownsville are constantly interchanging the most extravagant courtesies, banqueting, fandangoing, &c., and drinking destruction to the rebellion and the French army.

I have come into possession of official information regarding the leased plantations and the labour system thereon, which is of an exceedingly interesting character, but must be deferred to another occasion. If it be spread before the English public, it cannot fail to confirm their doubts of Yankee philanthropy. I think it will go far towards showing that it lacks common honesty and common humanity.

Mob Law in Ohio.—We learn from the Columbus (Ohio) Statesman, that a perfect reigning terror has ruled for several days past in Greenville, Darke County, carried on by members of the Loyal League, aided by a squad of some forty returned soldiers, belonging to the 40th, 69th, and one other Ohio regiment. The Loyal Leaguers first got the soldiers drunk, and then instigated them to 'clean out' the Democrats of the town. They commenced an indiscriminate assault upon all citizens who were designated as 'copperheads,' committing numerous outrages with stones, clubs, knives, and all other sorts of weapons and missiles. The terrified citizens closed their shops and houses, and gave the town up to the furious and frenzied mob, in whose possession it still was when the Statesman's informant left. Greenville is the same place where a Democratic newspaper was sacked by the 'Union Leaguers' a few weeks ago.

PARIS TOPICS.

Paris: May 17.

The session of the Corps Législatif, three times prolonged, is going out in such a blaze of eloquence that the Emperor may well thank his stars that he had the prudence to put some check upon the inquisitive discursiveness of the representatives of his people. The mania for asking questions is at least as strong here as in our English House of Commons—that for meddling in everybody's affairs fully stronger. It may therefore be thought fortunate that its indulgence is restricted to two occasions, the vote on the Address, and that of the Budget. I have already had occasion to show you that the general discussion on the gross expenditure of the country was not a triumph for the Opposition; and it has not been much more fortunate on the particular chapters. There have been, however, some fine displays of eloquence on both sides, and three or four grand field-days. The Budget of Foreign Affairs gave the opportunity for a review of the entire foreign policy of the Empire. M. Jules Favre led the attack, and spared his strictures neither on the conduct of the Government in Poland, Italy, nor Denmark. After insinuating his doubts of the success of the 'Lieutenant of France,' the Emperor Maximilian, and reading despatches from Mr. Seward condemnatory of French conquests on American soil, he passed to the subject of war between the United and Confederate States. The answer of M. Rouher, the Minister of State, is amply sufficient to satisfy the Opposition. With regard to Mexico the Minister proves from Mr. Seward's despatches that there is a perfect understanding with the United States Government, and he then goes on to show the cordiality of this understanding, and its effect on the declaration of neutrality. This, at least, is gained from his speech that he lays down authoritatively the policy of the Government. The Minister states that on May 4 orders were given that some vessels now being built or lying at Bordeaux and Nantes, supposed to belong to the Confederate Government, should not be allowed to sail till satisfactory evidence of their destination was furnished; and this declaration was accompanied by the statement that in coming to this decision the Minister of Foreign Affairs had abstained from enquiring into the authenticity of the documents propounded by Mr. Dayton, the United States Minister, on which he nevertheless acted. It is like a banker who pays a cheque which he well knows to be either forged or stolen. Fortunately, the Confederate States ask for no favour at any hands.

Besides this important exposition of French foreign policy, there have been long discussions on other questions—one on the game laws, a subject more adapted to the atmosphere of our House of Lords than to our common idea of the French Chambers, but which proves how necessary laws for the preservation of game are felt to be. The exceptional law passed after the Orsini plot was attacked by M. Pelletan, who on this occasion might have flattered himself that he had the country and a very large minority of the deputies with him. Exceptional laws are always odious, nowhere more so than in France, which has had such sad experience of them. But this law expires in the course of things next year, and it does not seem to have occurred to the orator to express the wish that it may then be suffered to die out, as is understood to be the intention of the Government. This was probably too self-evident a point to be thought worthy of his ingenuity. The Minister, in answer, showed how seldom the law has been applied, but also what grounds there were for passing it; and M. de Morny, with that à propos which distinguishes him, remarked that the best laws are those which deter, as this seems to have done, not those which punish. A little incident occurred in the course of this debate. M. Pelletan reproached the Government of shamming fear, and there arose a little cross-fire of repartee on this word 'fear.' M. Thiers entered the Chamber at this moment, and, catching at the word exclaimed: 'When the interests of the country are at stake, no one, not even the Government, shall frighten us.'

The last press grievance, the creation of the Evening Moniteur at one sou, came next, and M. Guéroult, one of the sufferers, endeavoured to interest the Chamber in his wrongs. This gentleman dresses so admirably the character which he affects, that when he drew out a dirty coloured pocket-handkerchief preparatory to beginning his speech, one who knew him neither by sight nor by name exclaimed, that this must be the representative of unwashed equality. The right of the Government to publish official newspapers free of stamp-duty was so clearly established that the objector took nothing by his strictures, which had not even the advantage of being urged with the easy elocution which is so seldom wanting in French public speakers. Never was the distinction between fist and tongue so strongly marked. The glib pen is not necessarily the instrument of a fluent tongue. Yesterday almost the entire sitting was devoted to the claims of the family of Lesurque, who, the victim of a judicial mistake, was executed some seventy years ago for the murder of the Lyons courier, in which he had no hand, and his family was made to pay the sum which was taken from the murdered man. His innocence has been long established, but it was only yesterday that a majority of one took into consideration the proposal to repay the money without interest.

The Constitutionnal of this morning has a long article, in leaded type, by M. Limayrac, on the United States and Mexico, a supplementary answer to M. Jules Favre's speech. It is written with that consummate art for which its author is famous. In four columns he contrives to puzzle his reader as to the conclusions he means him to arrive at. There is no fear of the United States interfering in Mexico, because there is a perfect understanding between Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet and that of the Tuileries, and even if they wished it they could not. Either the South will be recognised as an independent State, and then the North will be too far off to be feared; or the North will subjugate the South, and will have for many years to hold military possession of it; or, finally, the Union will be reconstructed with an enormous preponderance of the North, whose interest it will then be to prevent the Southern element extending itself.

There are again rumours of a general congress to take up the business of the Conference and all other pending questions, but this is probably rather the expression of the general wish of France than grounded on any certain information. It is said that there will be, soon after the closing of the session, a change in the Ministry. M. de Persigny is understood to be one of the Ministers Designate, but not at the Home Office. Your readers probably know that M. de Beust has not been here, and has not, therefore, had any recent interview with the Emperor. I find in one of this evening's papers, the France, a statement that the Confederate Government has accredited Bishop Lynach of Charleston as its Minister to the Pope, and that he is now at Cork.

THE FRENCH POLICY IN AMERICA.

Extract from the Speech of M. Rouher, Minister of State, in the Corps Législatif, Thursday, May 12, on the United States and Mexico.

'Taking the objections made by the Hon. M. Jules Favre in the inverse order to that in which he presented them, I shall begin with the alleged violation of the rules of neutrality committed by France against the States of the North in America.

'These questions of neutrality and the duties of neutrals have at all times given rise to difficulties and to conflicts of opinion. I shall not go into the history of the modifications which the rights of neutrals have undergone in the law of nations; but I can say to the honour of French policy, that all the ideas of a liberal and generous nature introduced into the public law have been due to the initiative of the French Government. On the declaration of war between the States of the North and of the South, we were not indifferent to these precedents, and from the very first we established the principles of neutrality which were to guide our conduct. The declaration published in the Moniteur of June 10, 1861, says:—"It is forbidden to any Frenchman to receive a commission from either of the two parties to fit out vessels of war, or to receive letters of marque, or to aid in any manner in the equipment or armament of a ship of war or privateer for either of the belligerents." In the month of June, 1863, two French shipbuilders applied for authorisation to construct two steamers, intended, as was stated, for the Chinese seas. In the month of December, 1863, the Minister of the United States produced letters and documents, into the character of which we did not closely examine. Mr. Dayton maintained that these vessels were intended for the Confederates. An enquiry was at once ordered. The builders were examined, their explanations were considered, and Government withdrew the authorisation it had at one time given. Later, some doubts were raised. These steamers, which are not yet ready, were said to be intended for Sweden. A further examination took place, but it was not more satisfactory than the former one, and on May 1, 1864, ten days ago, the Minister of the Marine wrote to the Foreign Office:—"The ships of war to which you called my attention shall not leave the French ports until it is clearly demonstrated that their destination does not affect the principles of neutrality which the French Government desires to observe strictly in regard to the belligerents."

'This is the line of conduct which has been followed by the Emperor's Government, without equivocation and in the clearest and most precise manner.

'And now let me call upon M. Jules Favre to use his talent and eloquence in introducing into the United States equally precise and clear principles in questions of neutrality. At the very time that he is reproaching us with disregard of the principles laid down in the declaration of June 11, 1861, the French Government is in correspondence with that of the United States to have it declared that coal is not contraband of war, and can be delivered to those of our ships which are going to Mexico. I hope that the brilliant considerations presented by M. Jules Favre in the interest of the Government of the United States will determine that Government to take into its most serious consideration the claims I refer to. (Laughter.)

'Let us dismiss this unfounded accusation. It is utterly without grounds. The French Government has never departed in the least from the fairest neutrality.

'I have next to notice M. Favre's remarks on the Secession, on the impossibility of providing European industry with the quantities of cotton which America used to furnish, and of the effect these difficulties have on the stock of bullion in the Bank of France.

'Truly, gentlemen, it requires a determination to find fault, to make these things a subject of attack on the Government; and I ask why we are reproached with the cruel fratricidal war carried on in the United States, and in which we endeavoured to intervene, not as arbitrators, but for purposes of conciliation.

'It is now my duty to return once more to the question of Mexico, and to weigh the arguments we have just heard brought forward.

'Is it true that the treaty which has been concluded is a violation of the words, the declarations, and promises which the Government had offered you? Is it true that like the sword of Damocles the menace of American intervention is suspended over the future of Mexico?'

The Minister then entered into explanations regarding the increased tranquillity of the country and the renewal of commercial activity.

'Let us now take the two fundamental objections urged against us—the Treaty, and America.

'It is said that we have contracted an indefinite engagement to keep our troops in Mexico, that we have guaranteed the loan issued by the Emperor of Mexico, and that we have thus violated the assurances given to the committee.'

'I really ask myself by what strange abuse of language it can be said that the loan has been guaranteed by France, because France has accepted sixty-six millions of francs' worth of bonds as a payment, and is obliged to negotiate them, not on the faith of the country, but on that of the Emperor of Mexico, who alone guarantees the payment of the interest. It is he who issues the Mexican Loan: it has been voluntarily taken by those who consider that Mexico presents sufficient guarantees. And, in truth, what you would do is not of a nature to reassure the French capital which has been invested in it. This is an act of opposition, not of patriotism; and the example of Fox, which he cites from English history, does not bear out what he says. . . .

'You say that the treaty contains engagements different from those we made to you? What, then, does it contain? In the latter months of this year, the French troops will be reduced to 25,000 men: the expedition is at an end, as the letter I have just read from Count Montholon proves. The work of pacification goes on everywhere, and 10,000 of our soldiers will be again in France in January 1865. As for the 25,000 men whose stay is stipulated in the treaty, what is the agreement regarding them? We declare that we shall remain a certain time longer in Mexico for the protection of our interests—of those very interests which occasioned our intervention.

'We must examine the American question at some length. It is not well to place thus between two great countries like France and America a fanciful germ of discord—a sort of deferred menace against France or against Mexico, when in fact there is only a passing excitement which has taken possession of the Congress, not unlike that which was produced by the arrest of Messrs. Slidell and Mason on board the Trent, and which did not prevent the Government from giving up the two prisoners agreeably to the law of nations.

'What can be the arrière pensée of America? Would she seize Mexico? incorporate it in her States? But if she had wished to do so she could have done it. The American army was in Mexico in 1847 and 1848. The Government of that date was at its mercy. I think it was the Government of Santa Anna. Being able to remain masters of the country, they did not even attempt it. America came to a settlement; fixed the indemnities she was entitled to; obtained, if I mistake not, a better frontier in Texas, the cession of New California or New Mexico; and, after making these territorial arrangements, withdrew quietly without pretending to any annexation.

'Yet the opportunity was tempting. America was victorious, and mistress not only of the capital, but of the whole territory. Her army had been divided into two bodies. The one, starting from Matamoros, had seized the provinces up to Mexico; the other, starting from Vera Cruz, had taken possession of Puebla before reaching the capital.

'Do you suppose that America meditates a declaration of war against Mexico with the sole object of upsetting a throne? But at this moment that great country is torn by civil war. Who can tell when this struggle will end? Who can foresee the time when the two parties so violently separated can again unite? (A Member: It is probable that it will be never!) During all the time that must elapse before peace can be re-established in the United States, are there not good grounds to hope that the new Mexican Empire will be consolidated? When at length the present agitations are appeased in America, commercial interests will resume their sway, and will paralyse the inclination for war with Mexico, and give rise to friendly international relations between the two countries. Believe me, I refer to these temporary causes of weakness in America only with regret. What I desire for the honour of civilisation, what I desire for the sympathies with which I am animated towards that nation to which France stood sponsor in the cradle, is that this war which has too long wasted the American continent, may end as speedily as possible. But it will be on the day when it shall have ended, that my security will become greater, and that I shall be more profoundly convinced that a war between Mexico and America is impossible.

'Yes! the war is impossible, impossible by reason of the sympathies of France for America, of America for France, of the declaration of the United States Government, and of the principles and interests which will prevent it.

'To begin with, I set aside M. Favre's proposition, that so soon as the war ends it will be not the armies of the United States, but bands of adventurers who will invade Mexico. At the beginning of the war when enthusiasm ran high, before the population had been decimated, if a happy reconciliation had been effected between North and South and the war had suddenly stopped, it is possible that the adventurers whose occupation was gone, might have imprudently betaken themselves to Mexico, and carried war with them. This might have been. But of that sort, those are no more. The war has mowed their ranks. Those who are now fighting the battles of both countries are unhappy workmen, wretched hinds torn by the conscription from their homes, and forced to daily fights under the conduct of chiefs inflamed with ardent passions.

'Those unfortunate soldiers the day that peace is proclaimed between North and South, will return to their deserted workshops, to their abandoned ploughs; they will run after no Mexican adventures. Believe me, the day that peace is restored their only thought will be to seek in honest labour ample and remunerative wages; for America, exhausted with long wars, must henceforward seek in industry and commerce the elements of regeneration—and it is with my whole heart that I wish it—which may restore her to the rank of a great nation (prolonged applause).

'And now, gentlemen, let us see on what principles the American Government acts. M. Favre has quoted certain despatches in which he fancies he finds proof of the agreement of the Government with the declarations made by the Congress of the United States. I have those despatches in my hand, and here is what I read in that of October 23, 1863:—

'"The United States, according to their principles, can only leave the destinies of Mexico in the care of its inhabitants, and recognise their sovereignty and their independence under whatever form it pleases them to recognise this sovereignty and independence."

'This is the language held by Mr. Seward to Mr. Dayton, and communicated to the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Since this a spontaneous declaration has been made to us on the resolutions of Congress. The Minister of Foreign Affairs has addressed to all his agents a despatch dated May 4, 1864, in which these explanations are set forth. It is enough that I read it.

[From the Minister of Foreign Affairs to the French Agents in Foreign Parts, May 4, 1864.]

'"Gentlemen,—The recent vote of the House of Representatives at Washington on the subject of Mexico has given rise to certain interpretations which it will be as well to rectify. The idea has arisen that this vote might induce the United States to adopt towards us a new attitude, of such a nature as to affect the cordial feelings existing between the two countries, or at any rate to complicate the Mexican question by embarrassments arising from without. We need only, however, observe the circumstances under which the manifestation alluded to took place, to understand that the vote is very far from possessing the importance imputed to it. It is doubtless the reflection of the feeling so carefully fostered by the American press in the United States, which leads that people to consider as an indirect attack upon their rights the most legitimate intervention of a European Power on any point of the American continent. But we must consider that in the United States, above all others, the legislative assembly may indulge in demonstrations of this character without pledging the Government in any way or forcing it to regulate its conduct accordingly. The Imperial Government had, therefore, no reason to conceive any apprehension on this subject, even if the incident had elicited no explanation from the Federal Government; but the Cabinet at Washington has made it a duty spontaneously to anticipate and obviate any unfavourable impressions that we might have formed from it. Mr. Dayton called upon me to read a despatch addressed to him by the Secretary of State for the Union, repudiating all responsibility on the part of the Cabinet of Washington in this matter, and establishing the principle that a vote of the House of Representatives or of the Senate, or even of both Houses, while it would naturally be a subject for the serious attention of the Cabinet, could not possibly oblige it to modify its policy or deprive it of its liberty of action. Mr. Seward sees no reason for adopting in the Mexican question any line of conduct other than that which he has followed up to the present time.

'"I answered Mr. Dayton that nothing, according to our ideas, could justify a change—that our confidence in the wisdom and prudence of the American Cabinet was too great for us to suspect it of any thoughts of compromising by hasty acts the true interests of the United States. In expressing to Mr. Dayton how much satisfaction the assurances he was commissioned to give me caused to the Government of the Emperor, I added, that I thought in fact that, even seen from the point of view of the United States themselves, the choice could not be doubtful between the establishment of a stable and regular Government in Mexico and the perpetuation of an anarchy and its attendant evils, which they themselves had first felt the effects of and called attention to. The reorganisation of a great country, which the return of order and security will enable to play an important economical part in the world, should be, for the United States especially, a real source of advantages, because it opens for them a new market, and one which they more than any one will profit by on account of their proximity. The prosperity of Mexico corresponds with their truest interests, and I could not but believe that the Cabinet of Washington would recognise this truth. This answer to Mr. Dayton's communication, and the fact of this communication itself, must show you sufficiently in what light the incident on which I now write to you must be regarded."

'You have here, gentlemen, the declaration made by the American Government on the morrow of that of the House of Representatives. And what has become of that declaration itself? The Senate has adjourned its examination indefinitely. Whoever has studied American affairs understands the home reasons which produced this move. A Presidential election agitates America at this moment, and all, democratic and republican alike, are running after popularity. Some think to find it in opposing the newly-established Government of Mexico. But, in fact, the danger of a struggle directed against Mexico is impossible, and irreconcileable with the principles on which the United States repose. What! Here is a country choosing by universal suffrage a form of government monarchical or republican, and it is in the name of national sovereignty that the American army would interfere in the States of Mexico to impose what? A form different to that which they had adopted and proclaimed

'Truly, America would thus violate the very essence of her government—liberty and national sovereignty. She could not even support herself on the Monroe doctrine, which has been so wrongly invoked: for those who have read the theories of President Monroe know that they have evidently but one meaning, and it is this: that the United States would not voluntarily agree to colonisation by Europe in America—Europe holding colonial possessions, possessing by right of conquest such or such territories, and for instance converting Mexico into an Algeria under the sceptre of the Emperor. The Monroe doctrine pronounces itself very strongly against such pretensions; it establishes the principle, every one for himself, every one in his own home ("chacun chez soi, chacun pour soi").

'Are the Mexicans not in their own home? Does not Mexico exercise a legitimate right of sovereignty when she chooses a prince for her Emperor? Are there any conditions which render the Emperor of Mexico the lieutenant of the Emperor of the French?

'Away then with these insulting and irritating expressions. The Emperor of Mexico is sovereign by the will of the Mexican people, and America will respect this will. Why should she not respect it? America will profit more than any other nation by the order, regularity, and commercial prosperity of Mexico. It is she who will with greatest profit cultivate those industrial and commercial relations; it is she who will be able to send to the rich plains of Sonora and Sinaloa her exuberant population, carrying with them labour and wealth. What might preoccupy us if such preoccupations could arise in serious and elevated minds are the conditions which a cordial intimacy between Mexico and the United States may make necessary in the future. America does not then menace the Emperor of Mexico, and this sovereign may pursue his way, may continue his efforts to prepare the prosperity, and to mark the not distant day of that property by separating himself from the French flag to let it return with glory into our midst.'

New York and the Manchester Trade.—An influencial member of the Manchester Exchange, who is also a representative of one of the chief mercantile houses in New York, has favoured us with a few political extracts from the most recent advices received by him from the Empire City. The same gentleman adds as a significant fact, that, prior to present date, any allusion to political feeling with regard to the war had never formed part of the correspondence between himself and the house he represents in Manchester. 'Last week Congress passed a resolution advancing the tariff upon all dutiable imports fifty per cent. for sixty days, not excepting any such goods as are now in bond, or on shipboard on the way hither; and this has been put in effect without any notice to importers—a course which I need not say is considered as involving an unjust enaction. All such goods have necessarily advanced to meet the extra cost of importation, and for a time business will be much restricted. In short it amounts almost to a total prohibition of some goods.—Gold still keeps up, fluctuating between 77 and 80 per cent. premium: and until there is a considerable decline to reduce the duties, the trade will be merely nominal; and we can only expect that decline after some decisive victories shall have been gained by the North.—North and South are putting forth all their strength for the coming struggle in Virginia, and everybody is waiting to see the result, which will no doubt be very decisive.—We note well your remarks about cotton orders. The bulk of the cotton received is very irregular, and the classification is no doubt below what it was before the war, and considerably below that of Liverpool. The market here has been strong and advancing the last fortnight, and the future of prices will depend in a great measure upon the receipts from the West. Prices in New Orleans are above ours, and our Mr. — — writes that none of the 30,000 bales which were expected to be obtained from the Red River expedition will arrive in New Orleans. It is all burnt as the army advances, on account of the action of our Government in seizing all they could get without giving a receipt.'

Northern Debt and Taxation.—Ten years ago, $60,000 paid the yearly tax of New Hampshire. In 1863 it reached $270,000. This year it will reach $500,000, and supposing the great national debt to be but $3,000,000,000, and it bids fair to be double that, New Hampshire will have to foot up $2,990,000 per year taxes. Does Mr. S. P. Chase suppose that New Hampshire will carry this load many years? If he does, he is demented. Even at a national debt of $3,000,000,000, New Hampshire will come in for $57,000,000, a debt nearly equal to the whole value of the personal property of the State, and even one-third of the whole property, real and personal, as given by the Census of 1860. This is the condition of one of the Northern States, and a fair illustration of the condition of one-half of the States called 'loyal.'—New York Day-Book.

TRICKSY PATRIOTISM.

[From the Times, May 18.]

A great movement, designed by its promoters to produce nothing less than 'a social revolution,' has just been inaugurated in the Federal States. The financial condition of the country has at last begun to cause alarm among all classes. Gold stands at least at 80 premium, and even Mr. Chase is at his wits' end for any promising means of reducing its price. But a sudden resources has opportunely come to light. The panic has at length reached the ladies, and they have extemporised a plan for at once putting a stop to the evil. Our readers have been made familiar with the profuse and extravagant expenditure which the war has encouraged among all the prosperous classes of the New England States. There never had been such a demand for jewelry, diamonds, silks, laces, pictures, and every article of luxury. American expenditure was always reckless, and American ladies had a reputation even before the war for indulging and pampering every passion of taste, touch, sight, smell, or hearing, but since the war they have spent at a pace which has taken away the breath of even native-born Americans, and Broadway has stood in amazement at itself. But it has suddenly, as it seems, been brought home to the mind and conscience of American ladies that this extravagant luxury is not only highly unbecoming, but that it is an obvious source of the extraordinary and ruinous demand for gold. These laces, silks, pictures, and jewels are for the most part foreign and imported articles, which must be paid for in specie. This being once realised, can American ladies hesitate as to the course they ought to pursue? Can they shrink for a moment from 'the self-sacrifice' of restricting the exercise of their vanity, and 'yielding up' their unbecoming luxuries? Of course, their resolution has at once been taken, and it has even surpassed the abnegation which could have been expected of them. They have not only determined to diminish their imported luxuries, but to abandon them altogether. Their patriotism has shot up into one irresistible blaze, which consumes every shred of foreign luxury and self-indulgence. We must leave the New York World itself to describe this rush of feminine patriotism in the following sensation headings, which do no more than justice to the enthusiastic language of the ladies:—'No more Foreign Goods. Formation of a Ladies' Covenant. Flora M'Flimsey to be put in Coventry. Hon. Mrs. Shoddy in a new Dress. No Imported Jewelry, Diamonds, Silks, Opera Cloaks, Laces, or Loves of Bonnets. What is asked of the Men? The Ladies demand that they shall give up Imported Wines, Liquors, and Cigars. The Social Revolution. Ladies to drink Catnip Tea and the Men Jersey Lightning. French Boots and Paris Lapdogs to be kicked out together.'

Our readers, however, must beware of falling into one mistake. 'It does not seem to be the intention of the ladies to prohibit at all the wearing of elegant dress goods.' On the contrary, it is urged in support of the movement that all these things can be obtained at home. In fact, half the goods sold as imported are already, it is said, home-made, and with the success of the movement it is even 'expected that the humbug will change, and imported goods be hereafter sold as domestic manufacture.' In short, 'the result will doubtless be to give a great impetus to manufactures in the Eastern and Middle States, and thereby help to enrich the country at the expense of the great manufactures of Europe.' So that the repentance, after all, is not in sackcloth and ashes, but in purple and fine linen; only a different sort of purple and fine linen from what was indulged in before, and such a sort as will enable the fair customers to kill two birds—nay, three birds—with one stone—to satisfy their own requirements, to enrich instead of impoverishing their country, and to starve the foreigner. Our readers must by no means imagine that New York and Washington will immediately wear a gloomy and sombre aspect, or that the New England States will relapse into Puritan sobriety of apparel. The taste and the quality will alone be diminished; not even will the expense and extravagance be the less, for it is obvious that the prices of foreign articles will not diminish when it becomes a risk to import them, and the home manufacturers, under the increased demand, will be able to keep up the prices of their home goods almost to the highest prices of the foreign articles. In point of fact, any absolute abandonment of articles of luxury, taste, and finery would itself be treason to the welfare of the Union; for the very wealth of these ladies' husbands and fathers depends upon the demand for articles of luxury, either imported or home-manufactured, and to annihilate the custom in these productions would be to create a panic in trade, to ruin themselves, and to raise the price of gold still further. The whole life of society now exists by one magnificent race of neck or nothing. Let only one interest stand still for a moment, and all must come down with a crash. Indeed, it may be doubted whether the step already taken may not, if it be carried out, produce some of the very disasters it seeks to avoid. Congress has just raised the duty on all imported articles 50 per cent. for three months, not only with the same object of protecting native manufactures as seems to be primarily pursued by this ladies' association, but also with a view of raising a larger revenue. The immediate effect of the ladies' resolution would be to annihilate this revenue completely, and, as last year the receipt from Customs was two-thirds of the United States income, the result would probably be somewhat disastrous to Mr. Chase's Budget.

Addison gives a humorous account of a Tory squire whom he met by chance in a country ride, and who maintained, over a bowl of punch, to which he was evidently addicted, that England would do very well if it would content itself with its own productions and not depend upon foreigners. Addison reminded him, to his great discomfiture, that of the favourite drink he was enjoying the water was the only constituent part of English production, and that the brandy, the lemon, the spice, and the sugar were all foreigners. The American ladies, and still more the American gentlemen, will, we imagine, be in very much the same predicament as the squire. We shall wait with some anxiety to see the sequel of this heroic resolution, or whether it has any at all. As far as the men are concerned, we are quite certain that merchants may continue to import cigars, liquors, and wines without the slightest alteration. An American without his cigar is about as possible a metamorphosis as an Ethiopian with a white skin; and the probability of an abandonment of imported wines may be judged of from the fact that in his late defeat General Banks 'lost his baggage and champagne.' When Generals in a difficult march over a hostile country find champagne a necessary addition to their baggage, the chance of a New York merchant abandoning imported wines must be infinitesimal. It is to be feared the habits of the ladies will in the same way prove too strong for them. American taste will be to that of Paris as 'Jersey lightning' to Cognac, and will stand the same chance against it. If it were possible, though, one would be glad to see the experiment well tried for the sake of its very absurdity. There is something like a burlesque in the notion of the principal ladies of the smartest nation under the sun carrying out in broad daylight the muddle-headed fancy of a country squire of George I.'s time. What can be said of a people where the wives of ex-Presidents, Vice-Presidents, Senators, and Representatives can seriously hold a large meeting in the capital city, in the very crisis of the war, and set out the extravagant piece of half-mad, half-smart banal set? What can we expect from the men whose wives, daughters, and sisters can lend no other public exercise of feminine qualities than [illegible] and tricksy patriotism? If it were possible to forget the terrible sacrifice of human life that is involved in the struggle and the great issues to history which hang upon its result, one would be disposed to treat the whole scene as one grand pandemonium where the only object is to outrage absurdity with disorderly, and we should await with the easy excitement of spectators the anticipated and intended crash.

THE CONFEDERATE CAPITAL AND ITS DEFENCES.

(Correspondent of the New York Daily News, April 30.)

The defences of Richmond were never so strong and extensive as at present, both on the land (on both sides of the James River) and on that stream itself. No work of any consequence, however, has been done on the fortifications since last December. They were then considered complete, and have only since been strengthened by a few additional outworks and covered way. During the year 1863 the number of forts around Richmond and Manchester (for the latter place is now included in the defences) has been increased from thirty-two to forty-eight, and this includes only the larger and principal forts, and not the smaller batteries. It is not generally known that General Beauregard was in Richmond for several weeks during the spring of 1863, during which time his views in regard to the defences of the city were adopted; and they have since been carried out. The key to this system of fortification, which has proved so successful at Charleston, is briefly this: that, if properly built and mounted with the proper armament, none of these forts can be taken without a terrible sacrifice of life on the part of the assailants; because an attacking column, in attacking one fort, is exposed to the fire, not only of that fort alone, but also to the concentrated, crossing, and enfilading fire of several other forts. Shelling has very little effect on works constructed in this manner, as the gunners—and the whole garrison, indeed—are sheltered by wooden bomb-proofs, covered with earth. To an observer who could ascend over Richmond and look down from an altitude of about a thousand feet, the city would appear to be surrounded by three distinct lines of forts, constructed in this manner. The work of taking the rebel capital by siege, therefore, will certainly not be an easy task, or one that can soon be accomplished.

If gunboats and iron-clad vessels could take part in the siege (if there is to be a siege), there might be some hope of reducing the city. But Richmond is inaccessible by water. If Fort Darling and the other forts which line both sides of the stream between that work and the rebel capital did not exist at all, still no hostile vessel could pass Drury's Bluff. The obstructions that begin at that point, and continue up to the city itself, are far more complicated and difficult of removal than those of Charleston harbour, and the channel, besides, is planted thick with torpedoes. The latter are not mere experiments. They are the results of actual experiments, and a vessel, no matter how strong she is, in passing over one of them would be blown in atoms through the air.

It is true that, except the artillerists in the forts, there are very few troops at Richmond, not over 10,000 men; but troops are continually passing through, en route for the armies where active operations are expected. A siege of Richmond is not looked for just now by the Confederate authorities. They depend upon the combinations that are being made by General Lee to prevent that. They really expect that the Federal hosts that are now advancing towards their capital will soon be compelled to fall back for the defence of their own. But should it be otherwise—should the legions of General Grant push their victorious advance across both the North and South Anna, while a co-operative column marches up the Peninsula, still no alarm will be felt at Richmond for the ultimate safety of that city.

To be taken by siege the rebel capital must, first of all, be completely invested on all sides. The measures taken by General Lee are believed to be such as will prevent this from being done, and will insure the defeat of each separate column of Union forces before it can effect a junction with the others. Even if invested, the main body of General Lee's army will not fall back for the defence of Richmond. That task is assigned to another body of troops not now in that city, but who will be there in time. To General Lee's army is assigned a far different rôle, one which, if successful, will wither all the laurels which we won at Gettysburgh and Antietam, and place us instead of the South on the defensive.

How the South is Plundered.—The infamous examples of Butler and Turchin appear to have been followed by officers of every grade, as well as privates, of the Northern invading armies. The New Orleans correspondent of the New York World says:—'It is perfectly notorious, both here and at Hilton Head, at Pensacola, and elsewhere, that whole cargoes of "confiscated property" have been boxed up and sent away by men connected with the army to their Northern homes: that houses have been completely stripped, and their contents shipped to Boston and New York. Did not a chaplain from Hilton Head tell coolly how he had been presented by some captain or colonel with a piano taken from a planter's house? Is not General Neal Dow held for exchange for the thirteen pianos he captured at Pensacola?' The editor of the World remarks that—'It will be seen from this statement that the United States rule in Louisiana is little better than an organised system of plundering, which is demoralising our officers and soldiers, and alienating and disgusting the masses of the people of that State.'

'Southern Independence' at Oldham.—On Tuesday evening a large and influential gathering of friends of the South took place at Oldham, under the auspices of the local branch of the Southern Independence Association, our report of which, however, we are compelled to hold over until next week. The chair was taken by E. Harrop, Esq., of the Oldham Town Council, and the vice-chair, by J. Whittaker, Esq., cotton spinner. The toast of the evening, 'The Independence of the South,' was received with the greatest enthusiasm. The more prominent speakers were Messrs. T. B. Kershaw, Dr. Leech, W. Steeple, Halliwell, and Harrop. The various speeches, which were continued to a late hour, betokened the most cordial sympathy with the Confederacy, and the fullest confidence in the speedy triumph of its cause.

Federal Prisoners in Virginia.—The Right Rev. Bishop Johns, Episcopal Bishop of Virginia, some time since procured the release of a Federal surgeon, who was a prisoner of war in Richmond, and who repaid his kindness by making the grossest misrepresentations respecting the treatment of prisoners by the Confederates. The Bishop wrote to the Federal Secretary of War an exposure of this base ingratitude, in which he says:—'During my visit to Libby Prison to minister to its inmates as need might require, I have often appealed to them, individually and in groups, to know if they had any cause to complain of the treatment which they experienced, assuring them of my readiness to secure the redress of any real grievance. The uniform reply has been that they had no inhumanity to complain of, and that, except the want of out-door exercise, they want nothing but to go home. The spacious rooms of the building, which was originally an extensive tobacco warehouse, I always found sufficiently warmed and ventilated, and the appearance of the inmates that of persons in good health. In penning this statement I do but comply with the demands of conscience and humanity, and shall be most happy if it serves to prevent all unnecessary suffering on the part of those whom the fortune of war has subjected to imprisonment. With due consideration, yours, J. Johns, Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Virginia.'

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL & COMMERCIAL.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

THE money and discount markets remain in a quiet position, and the transactions are all in favour of a reduction of rates. The increase of bullion at the Bank has, of course, had a favourable effect upon the terms out of doors; and to augment the supply of available capital, deposits have been received by the London agents of the country bankers. The encouraging state of the weather, with the satisfactory adjustment of outstanding differences at the Stock Exchange, has tided over the difficulty so far as that is concerned; but the drawback continues to be the uncertainty of political affairs in connection with the Conference. If that question could be well adjusted, and the condition of peace in continental Europe be assured, there would be little to fear in the future. Till, however, Denmark is relieved from Austrian and Prussian oppression, little chance will exist of the state of business either commercially or financially attaining its proper position. Everybody seems convinced that the Bank directors must reduce the rate of discount to-morrow to 8 per cent., and it is further said by sanguine parties that a retrogression to 7 per cent. will shortly be accomplished. The expectation of a reduction of terms has been foreshadowed by the desire of Bankers and bill brokers to take six months' acceptances at $7\frac{1}{4}$ and $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and a few parcels of very fine three months' paper have been negotiated at $8\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. The arrivals of gold from America and Australia indicate that the resources of the money market will be gradually swelled; but if this should be the case, we shall at the same time be glad to see the public adopt the warning afforded by the late shock, and stand aloof from any fresh speculative movement.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The specie and bullion movements continued very favourable, there having been no less than 537,000*l.* in gold sent into the Bank during the week, whilst there have been no withdrawals whatever on foreign account. The arrivals of specie have not been large, the chief item being 224,000*l.* by the West India Mail, with some trifling amounts from New York and Melbourne. The silver market has not shown much activity: but that just arrived by La Plata from the West Indies has been sold to-day, the bar at $60\frac{7}{8}$d. per oz., which is a fractional decline on previous rates, and the Mexican dollars at $61\frac{3}{4}$d. per oz., which shows no alteration. The advices from Port Phillip announced the following gold vessels to have sailed since the previous mail, viz., the Glendower, with 2,641 oz.; the Wave of Life, with 5,222 oz.; the Kent, with 3,622 oz.; the Royal Standard, with 19,521 oz.; the Lady Ann, with 4,062 oz.; and the Anglesea, with 12,094 oz.; making a total of 47.162 oz., valued at 188,648*l.*

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The better feeling which has pervaded the tone of the Money Market has had a corresponding influence upon nearly all English and Foreign Securities. The exceedingly fine weather has likewise had a beneficial effect, and the dealers have been operating with far greater freedom. Still the dealings have been somewhat restricted, in consequence of the uncertainty which prevails relative to the proceedings of the Bank directors to-morrow. Should the rate be lowered, as is generally anticipated, a fresh stimulus will be given to business generally. Consols closed this evening at $91\frac{5}{8}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ for money, and $90\frac{1}{4}$ to $90\frac{5}{8}$ ex div. for the account, which, as compared with this day week, is an improvement of about $\frac{5}{8}$ per cent. Exchequer bills are rather better, the June issue being up to 8*s.* to 3*s.* dis. A rather more extensive business has been transacted in Foreign Securities, and for most descriptions an advance has taken place. The rise in Greek has been $\frac{7}{8}$ per cent., the closing quotation being $23\frac{1}{4}$ to $23\frac{3}{4}$. Mexicans are now marked $44\frac{1}{4}$ to $44\frac{3}{4}$, being an advance of 1 per cent. Spanish are comparatively steady, the Passives being $31\frac{1}{2}$ to $31\frac{3}{4}$, and the Certificates $11\frac{5}{8}$ to $11\frac{7}{8}$. Turkish Six per Cents. (1854) are unaltered at 88 to 89; but those of 1862 have improved 1 per cent., being at 71 to 72.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The stock of the Confederate Cotton Loan is steadily rising into estimation. Purchases have taken place to some extent, but the principal operators are the Liverpool people. Although there continue to be buyers in London, it is quite certain that the principal movement comes from Liverpool: and whenever purchases are made in behalf of houses, then a response always occurs in quotations. The tendency has latterly been good, and prices would have been established at a greater advance but for the pressure existing in the general money market. The highest price recently attained has been 67 to 68, but to-night the closing quotation was $66\frac{1}{4}$ to $67\frac{1}{2}$. The operators are waiting for intelligence from America before they attempt to carry out more extended transactions.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The business in American Government and Railway Securities still continues on a very limited scale, and there does not appear much probability of any material improvement so long as the accounts from the other side continue so favourable to the Confederate cause. The dealers appear to have entirely neglected this department, and operate only on positive commissions. The dealings comprise: Virginia State Six per Cents, at $32\frac{1}{4}$ and 34; Atlantic and Great Western Railway (New York section), 78; Erie, $100, all paid at 55, 56 and 55; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid 28, 30 and 29 dis.; Ditto ditto, all paid 65, $64\frac{3}{4}$, $65\frac{1}{4}$ $64\frac{1}{2}$ and 65.

BANK MEETINGS.

At the Annual General Meeting of the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London, and China, the report which was unanimously adopted stated that, after providing for all bad and doubtful debts and defraying expenses of management, the net profit amounted to 196,562*l.*, to which was to be added a sum of 4,269*l.*, undivided profit brought forward from the preceding year, making a total of 200,831*l.* Out of this sum 50,000*l.* had been paid in two half-yearly dividends, and 25,000*l.* as a bonus, making together fifteen per cent. on the paid-up capital of the bank. A further sum of 50,000*l.* had been added to the reserve fund. The unappropriated balance of 75,831*l.* was carried forward to the profit and loss account of the current year.—At the meeting of the Bank of Wales, a report was read showing that the gross profits of the bank had been 5,330*l.*, and after deducting salaries, rent and current expenses, there remained a balance of 1,115*l.*, which amount the directors recommended should be carried forward to profit and loss new account. It was stated that arrangements had been concluded with the old-established bank of Messrs. Lock, Hulm & Co. of Pembroke and Tenby, for the transfer of their business, which will materially increase the connection of the bank in that part of the principality. The report was adopted.—At a meeting of the proprietors of the Standard Bank of British South Africa, resolutions were passed confirming the previous resolutions for increasing the capital by the issue of 10,000 more shares of 100*l.* each.—At the thirty-first annual meeting of the National Provincial Bank of England, Mr. J. M. Laurie in the chair, a report was read which stated that the rest or undivided profit, on December 31, 1862, was 181,764*l.* and the balance of premium account 68,296*l.*, making a total of 250,060*l.* The bonus declared and paid in 1863 amounted to 46,748*l.*, leaving a balance of 203,311*l.* The net profits of 1863, after paying a bonus of 10 per cent. to officers, were 192,397*l.*, and these sums, added to the undivided profits carried forward from 1862, made a total of 400,680*l.* Deducting from this amount the dividend and bonus paid in 1863 and the undivided profits carried to the next half-year 129,931*l.*, a sum of 270,748*l.* was left. Out of this the directors recommended a further bonus of 7 per cent. making a division of profits in 1863 in all 21 per cent. free of income tax, amounting to 63,000*l.*, leaving as reserve 207,748*l.*, which, with the addition of 1.704*l.* premium realised from 426 new shares voted last year, increased the reserve fund to 209,452*l.* The report was unanimously adopted.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

A fair business has been transacted in the British Railway Share Market, and prices in almost all cases have advanced, though the entire rise of the week has not been fully maintained. There is no doubt that a much larger business would have been transacted, but that for two or three days the brokers have been chiefly engaged with the half-monthly settlement, which, however, has passed over most satisfactorily. There has been more animation exhibited to-day, and the market closed with a tendency to increased firmness. As compared with this day week, there has been a rise of 2 per cent. each in London and Blackwall, London and Brighton, Metropolitan, and Vale of Neath; of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Great Northern and North Eastern (Leeds); of 1 per cent. each in Caledonian, Lancashire and Yorkshire, London and North-Western, Midland, and South-Eastern; of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. in North-Eastern (Berwick); and of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. each in Great Eastern, London and South-Western, and North-Eastern (York). On the other hand, there has been a decline of 1 per cent. each in North London and South Yorkshire. The dealings in foreign railway securities have not been quite so extensive, but prices remain firm. In shares connected with undertakings in the British Possessions a good business has been transacted at, in most instances, an improvement in values.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 30,00,000 rupees in bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were, to Calcutta, 15,30,000 rupees; to Bombay, 12,00,000 rupees; and to Madras, 2,70,000 rupees. The minimum price was as before, 1*s.* $11\frac{1}{2}$d. on Calcutta and Madras, and 1*s.* $11\frac{3}{4}$d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 124 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta and Madras at 1*s.* $11\frac{5}{8}$d. will receive about 5 per cent., on Bombay at 2*s.* about 12 per cent., and all above these prices in full.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

Amongst the new companies brought forward during the week is that of the Clyde Steam Ship Company, the object being to run a line of steamers from the Clyde to foreign ports; but trade will only be conducted with those places when it is ascertained that it will be remunerative. It is asserted that steamers can work far more economically out of the Clyde than from London or Liverpool, and it is thought that with prudent management large profits must be realised. The proposed capital is 200,000*l.* in 8,000 shares of 25*l.* each.—Another undertaking is the Freehold and General Investment Company (limited). The objects of the Company are to purchase from time to time such freehold or leasehold property in London and its neighbourhood, as may offer facilities for adaptation to first-class houses, offices and chambers, or which may otherwise present special capabilities for improvement. The proposed capital is 250,000*l.* in 10,000 shares of 25*l.* each, with power to increase to 1,000,000*l.* The first issue is 5,000 shares, but it is not intended to call up more than 10*l.* per share; but as more capital can be advantageously employed, further issues of shares will be made.—The prospectus has also been issued of the Hydraulic Tube Drawing and Steel Ordnance Company (limited). The object is the purchase and development of certain new and valuable patents for improvements in the drawing and shaping of metals and for the machinery employed therein. By this process metal tubes can be produced from the fineness of a needle to the size required for the largest ordnance. The capital proposed to be raised is 150,000*l.*, in 15,000 shares of 10*l.* each, with a first issue of 7,500 shares. Deposit 1*l.* per share on application and 1*l.* on allotment.—The Scottish Fire Insurance Company is another undertaking just started, with a proposed capital of 1,000,000*l.*, to be raised in 50,000 shares of 20*l.* each. The first issue is to be 25,000 shares, with a deposit of 10*s.* per share on application and 1*l.* 10*s.* on allotment. It is intended that the principal business shall be transacted in Scotland; and boards will be established in London, Edinburgh and Glasgow, and in other towns of the United Kingdom, as the progress of the institution may require.—The prospectus has been issued this afternoon of the Floating Telegraph Station and Light Ship Company (limited), with a capital of 250,000*l.*, in 25,000 shares of 10*l.* each, with power to increase. 10*s.* to be paid on application and 1*l.* on allotment. The objects of the Company are to provide and anchor ships near the ordinary track of vessels, such ships to serve as Electric Telegraph and Signal Stations, in connection with existing systems in Europe and America, and also as safety beacons for navigation. The Company's ships will be fitted up complete as telegraph stations. It is also intended to provide them with steam power and lanterns for displaying a powerful light. Day and night signals, steam whistles, guns, lifeboats, &c., will also form part of their equipments. Stores, water, and provisions will be kept on board for the immediate requirement of vessels in distress.—The National Financial Company have this evening issued a notice inviting subscriptions for shares in the Tyne Iron Ship Building Company (limited). The capital is to be 400,000*l.* in 8,000 shares of 50*l.* each. Deposit on application 1*l.* per share, and on allotment 4*l.* The Company has acquired the ship-building establishment and dockyard of Messrs. T. and W. Smith, at St. Peter's, Newcastle-on-Tyne; and to these extensive premises will be added those of Messrs. Rogerson and Co., thus giving an unbroken frontage on the Tyne of more than a third of a mile. The premises, machinery, and contracts have been transferred to the Company, on terms which are deemed equitable and moderate, and good dividends are anticipated.—The Torbay Hotel and Winter Garden Company, is another undertaking brought out this evening. The capital asked for is only 50,000*l.*, in shares of 10*l.* each and 1*l.* per share to be paid on allotment. The Company is established for the purpose of conducting at Torquay an hotel in accordance with the requirements of the present day.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The produce markets have been generally firm since our previous report, with a fair amount of business passing. The deliveries from warehouses are for the most part satisfactory, but do not come up to the average of last year in all cases; and as imports have somewhat increased, no further diminution of stocks has taken place. With the continuance of extremely fine weather for the crops, and the promise of both an abundant and early harvest, the grain trade is extremely dull, and to make sales of any extent, much lower prices would have to be taken. Oilcake is steady in value although inactive, as seed is firm in price. The provision markets have not varied materially. American butters meet only a slow demand. Bacon commands a moderate sale at about last week's rates. Cheese brings 50*s.* to 60*s.* per cwt., according to quality. But little is passing in any kind of lard, and rates are nominal. Petroleum has been purchased to some extent, and the price has risen to 2*s.* 4*d.* per gallon for refined, the market being influenced by diminishing stocks and advices of short shipments from New York. Crude is worth 19*l.* per tun. Linseed oil maintains the advanced price of 39*s.* 9*d.*, although there is not so much doing at the moment. Other seed oils are steady. Cocoa-nut meets an increased demand, and has risen to 42*s.* 6*d.* for Cochin. For Ceylon the price is 39*s.* 9*d.* per cwt. Sperm oil remains stationary at 73*l.* to 75*l.* Rosin sells steadily at 31*s.* to 42*s.* for American. The Tallow Market is dull and prices rather lower, owing partly to political matters and partly to the heat of the weather, which prevents chandlers from working. The Hemp and Jute Markets are inactive, but Manilla hemp is firm, with some inquiry for good roping qualities. A very important movement has been made in the sugar market, considerable purchases of both raw and refined sugars having taken place, at prices fully 6*d.* to 1*s.* above late rates. A greater rise would, it is thought, accrue, were it not that the 50 per cent. import duty adopted by the United States Government has materially checked the American demand. Coffee is dull, the sales of Java and Holland having gone at half a cent. under the valuations. The tea market has been firmer since the overland advices reporting a further falling off in shipments from the ports of China. The metal trade has not varied except as regards the article spelter, for which there is an increased demand, and prices have risen 10*s.* per ton, closing at 22*l.* 5*s.* on the spot, and 22*l.* 10*s.* for July and August delivery. In turpentine, considerable fluctuations are reported to-day, and rates are uncertain. French being quoted 70*s.* buyers and 78*s.* sellers.

LIVERPOOL, WEDNESDAY, MAY 18.—Although there has been rather more animation in our Cotton Market during the past week, business has not been so active as might have been anticipated, after the dulness caused by the advance in the value of money had passed away. The temporary armistice agreed to with reference to the Germano-Danish war, for a time created increased confidence, and large transactions were entered into, particularly for American descriptions, at enhanced rates; but the full advance has not since been maintained. The sales this week have been only to a moderate extent, comprising 45,000 bales, of which 15,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year, so far, have been 993,800 bales, whilst to the corresponding period last year they were only 803,570 bales. The imports this year have been 819,436 bales, whilst in 1863 they were 508,271 bales. There have been exported this year 149,117 bales; last year to the same time the exports were 148,788 bales. The quantity taken for consumption this year has been 629,300 bales, and to the same period in 1863 416,000 bales. There have been taken on speculation during the present year 181,600 bales, at the same period in last year 207,620 bales. The computed stocks at the present time are 322,260 bales, whilst at the corresponding time in 1863 they were 335,900 bales. The closing quotations this evening were, American descriptions, 28*d.* to 29*d.*; Pernambuco, 29*d.* to $29\frac{1}{4}$d.; Maranham, 29*d.* to $29\frac{1}{4}$d.; Egyptian, $28\frac{1}{2}$d. to $29\frac{1}{2}$d.; Surat, $13\frac{1}{4}$d. to $23\frac{1}{4}$d.; Madras, 18*d.*; Bengal, Scinde, &c. 12*d.*; China, $19\frac{1}{4}$d.; and Peruvian, 29*d.*

The Whitsun holidays have, during the week, materially interfered with business in the Manchester markets; but although the transactions have been comparatively limited, the market for yarns remains exceedingly firm, and home-trade descriptions are generally dearer. In shipping yarns the market also remains very firm; most of the spinners are deeply engaged with contracts, and they show but little disposition, under the present aspect of affairs to enter into further engagements. The cloth market remains comparatively quiet. The recent telegrams from Bombay and Calcutta, although regarded as favourable, have had but little effect on prices here. Although there is a fair sprinkling of buyers in the market, they are quite indisposed to do business except at a reduction on previous rates; but with the present firmness in yarns, ship prices, it is difficult to get manufacturers to listen to lower rates. Some large offers have been made for cloths, and with any moderate amount of reduction a large business could have been effected. The dealings that have taken place have been entirely of a limited character.

DAHLGREN'S TORPEDOES. — The Richmond correspondent of the Knoxville Register says:—'I have seen one of the torpedoes Dahlgren brought with him on his tour of assassination and arson. It is an iron cylinder, six inches long, two inches in diameter, with a fuse attached. A paper of printed instructions is pasted on the outside, like the label of a phial of physic. On this paper is a diagram of the "Howe Truss Bridge," the common railroad bridge of the South, with places marked where the torpedo is to be inserted in auger holes bored for the purpose.'

ACTS OF THE FOURTH SESSION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA, 1863–1864.

AN ACT TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE.

WHEREAS, the Confederate States are engaged in a war, upon the successful issue of which depend the integrity of their social system, the form of their civilisation, the security of life and property within their limits, as well as their existence as sovereign and independent States; And whereas, the condition of the contest demands that they should call into requisition whatever resources of men and money they have for the support of their cause, to faithfully administer the same: Therefore, as a part of the system of the public defence:—

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the exportation of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses, and rice, from the Confederate States, and from all places in the occupation of their troops, is prohibited, except under such uniform regulations as shall be made by the President of the Confederate States.

SEC. 2. That if any person, or persons, shall put, place, or load on board any ship, steamboat, or vessel, or any other water craft, or into any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for conveyance or transportation beyond the Confederate States, or into any portion of said States occupied by the enemy, any of the articles mentioned in the first section of this act, or shall collect the same for the purpose of being conveyed or transported, contrary to the prohibition aforesaid, within the Confederate States, or beyond them, the said articles, and the ship, boat, or other water craft, wagon, carriage, or other vehicle, with the slaves and animals that may be employed or collected for the purpose of aiding therein, shall be forfeited, and all persons, their aiders and abettors, on conviction of being interested or concerned in the enterprise, shall be deemed to be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and punishable by such fine or imprisonment, or both, as the court may impose.

SEC. 3. That it shall not be lawful to put on board any ship, boat, vessel, or other water craft, or upon any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for transportation or conveyance as aforesaid, any of the articles aforesaid, unless a permit be previously obtained from some officer of the Confederate States specially authorised to grant the same, particularly describing the articles thus to be laden, and the ship, boat, vessel, water craft, wagon, carriage, cart, or other vehicle, on which the same is to be transported, and until bond shall be given that the same shall be conveyed and transported to the place of destination under such conditions and regulations, and for such objects, as shall be prescribed by the President under the first section of this act.

SEC. 4. That the collectors of all the districts of the Confederate States, and such other officers as may be designated by the President of the Confederate States, shall have power and authority to take into their custody any of the articles before mentioned found on any ship boat, or other water craft, when there is reason to believe that they are intended for exportation, or when in vessels, carts, or wagons, or any other carriage or vehicle whatsoever, or in any manner, apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or towards the territory of the Confederate States in the occupation of the United States, or the vicinity thereof, or towards a place whence such articles are intended to be exported, and not to permit the same to be removed until bond shall be given, with satisfactory sureties, that no violation of this act, and the regulations under the same, is intended.

SEC. 5. That the powers granted by this act to the revenue and other officers of the Confederate States under this act to allow or refuse exportation of the articles before mentioned, or for the seizure or detention of any of the said articles, shall be exercised in conformity with such instructions as the President may give through the Departments of War and of the Treasury, which instructions may impose conditions as to the destination and sale of the same, and the investment of the proceeds of the same, or a portion thereof, in military or other supplies for the public service, which instructions such officers shall be bound to obey; and if any action or suit shall be brought against any such officer or officers, or their agents, he or they may plead the general issue, and upon proof of a compliance with the provisions of this act, or with the regulations and instructions of the President, he or they shall be absolved from all responsibility therefor; and any person aggrieved by any of the acts of any of the officers or agents aforesaid, may file his petition before the district court of the district in which such officer or agent resides, and after due notice to him, and to the district attorney, the said court may proceed summarily to hear and determine thereupon as law and justice may require, and the judgment of the said court and the reasons therefor shall be filed among the records of the court, and in case any release shall be granted, the judge may impose such conditions as to giving bond and security as may, in his opinion, be necessary to secure this act from violation, and, in case of refusal, may impose double or treble costs upon the petitioner if circumstances warrant: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account.

SEC. 6 That exclusive jurisdiction is conferred upon the district courts of the Confederate States of all suits or actions that may arise under this act in behalf of the Confederate States, its officers and agents, for the recovery of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures imposed in the same, by indictment, information, or action, according to the practice of the court, and the distribution of the penalties and fines shall be made under and according to the laws now in force for violation of the revenue acts, and all laws for the mitigation and remittance of penalties and forfeitures shall be applied in similar cases.

SEC. 7. That it shall be lawful for the President, or such officers as he may designate, to employ any portion of the military or naval force of the Confederacy or of the militia, to prevent the illegal departure of any ship, vessel, or other water craft, for detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody the same, or any wagon, cart, or other vehicle heretofore mentioned, their teams and drivers, and their products aforesaid, and to suppress and disperse any assembly of persons who may resist the execution of this act, or oppose the fulfilment, by the officers, of the duties imposed by the same.

SEC. 8. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

APPROVED, February 6, 1864.

REGULATIONS TO CARRY INTO EFFECT THE ACT 'TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE,' APPROVED, FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

I. AS TO THE SEA.

1. The owners of any vessel intending to sail from a Confederate port with a cargo consisting in whole or part of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses or rice, shall, before the landing on board of any such articles, file with the collector of the port from which the vessel is to sail, a copy of her register, with a declaration of the names of the owners and officers thereof, the place of their birth and of their residence for the preceding year, together with the port or place to which the said vessel proposes to sail. The said declaration shall also set forth the quantity and value, in Confederate currency, of the cargo proposed to be taken out, as also the consent of the said owners, that one-half of the tonnage of the said vessel may be employed by the Confederate Government for its own use, both on the outward and homeward voyage, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned. The collector shall submit a statement as to the owners and officers to the military commandant of the port, and if he shall not object to their loyalty, or to the sailing of the vessel, for reasons of military necessity, the collector shall grant a permit for the lading of the said vessel, one-half for account of the owners and one-half for account of the Confederate States.

2. Before the said lading shall be completed, the owners of the vessel shall execute to the Confederate States a bond in double the value of the vessel, with security deemed adequate by the collector, conditioned that she will pursue the voyage designated, and that she will return with reasonable dispatch to a Confederate port, after her outward cargo shall be discharged with a cargo, consisting one half of articles not prohibited by the laws of the Confederate Government, and the other half of such articles as the Government shall offer for shipment from such port, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned.

3. Each shipper of any portion of the cargo proposed to be laden on board the said vessel, shall, before the lading thereof, make application to the collector for a permit to lade the same, which application shall declare the articles to be shipped, and the quantity and value thereof in Confederate currency, the port of destination, and the name of the consignee. A permit shall then be granted by the collector if the application is deemed satisfactory. The lading shall be had under the inspection of a revenue officer, who shall be charged with the duty of seeing that the goods laden conform to the permit.

4. Before the completion of the lading on board or the granting a clearance, each shipper of any portion of the cargo shall execute and deliver to the collector a bond to the Confederate States, in double the value of his shipment in Confederate money, with security deemed adequate by the collector, with condition that at least one half the net proceeds of said shipment shall be invested in goods or articles not prohibited by law, and said goods or articles shall be shipped by the same or some other vessel to the Confederate States within sixty days from the unlading of said cargo; or that the said half of the net proceeds shall be paid in coin or sterling exchange to the proper agent of the Confederate States, to be reimbursed to the shipper by the delivery to him of cotton at the port of departure in the Confederate States, at the rate of ten pence sterling per pound for middling uplands.

5. The freight to be paid by the Confederate States on all cotton and tobacco shipped from a Confederate port shall be five pence sterling per pound, payable on delivery at the port of destination, in coin or sterling exchange. Return freight shall be at the rate of 25*l.* per ton, payable on its delivery in a Confederate port, in cotton at ten pence sterling per pound for middling uplands, and at a proportionate price for cotton of other qualities. In calculating the ton of freight by weight, 2,240 pounds shall be allowed; by measure, forty cubic feet shall be allowed.

6. If the outward bound vessel shall consent, at the request of the Government, to take two-thirds of her cargo for account of the Confederate States, the outward freight shall be six pence sterling per pound, and whenever the Government is not prepared to fill up any portion of the tonnage reserved for its use at the time at which any vessel may be made ready to sail, her owners may fill up the same on their own account: but no vessel shall, without consent of the Government, sail on her outward voyage until one-third of her cargo shall be laden for the use of the Government.

7. The rates of freight for articles other than cotton and tobacco shall be adjusted at the same relative rate and payable in the same way.

8. The Government reserves the right to limit or prohibit the shipment of rosin, turpentine, or any manufacture thereof, whenever deemed dangerous to its own shipment.

9. Upon the completion of the lading of the vessel, and before receiving her clearance, there shall be delivered to the collector, in addition to the usual manifest, another setting forth the names, ages, and description of her officers and crew, and of every passenger intending to sail in her. The said last-mentioned manifest shall be delivered to the commandant of the port, who shall thereupon cause the entire vessel to be searched, and if satisfied that the parties on board are persons who may safely be permitted to leave the Confederacy, and that the passengers have the proper passports, he shall certify the same on the manifest and return the same to the collector, whereupon, and not before, a clearance shall be granted to the vessel, and he shall be permitted to sail.

10. The owners of each vessel, and of each portion of a cargo sailing from a Confederate port, shall be allowed to take up their respective bonds, by producing to the collector the certificate of the proper agent of the Confederate Government at the port of delivery, setting forth the particulars, showing that the said party has complied with the obligations of the said bond so far as the same was practicable, and the collector, upon being duly satisfied, shall be authorised to surrender the said bonds.

11. Nothing in these regulations shall be so construed as to conflict with the proviso of the law, which declares 'that nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account;' nor shall a bond be required of a State in any case.

12. The penalties of all bonds executed in conformity with these regulations, shall be recoverable in full on proof of breach of the conditions of the bond, and without proof of any damage suffered by the Confederate States in consequence of such breach, and all bonds shall be executed in such form as to give effect to this regulation.

13. Vessels sent into the Confederacy for the purpose of exporting cotton received in payment of any Confederate bond or obligation shall be subject to these regulations only so far as relates to such portion of the tonnage, if any, as may remain vacant after the lading of the cotton received in payment as aforesaid.

14. The regulations for overland commerce with neutral countries will be issued separately, within a few days.

Treasury Department, C. S. A.
RICHMOND, March 16, 1864.

THE following additional regulations are established to carry out the act to impose regulations upon the foreign commerce of the Confederate States, and to provide for the public defence, approved February 6, 1864:

The bond required by the second article of the regulations shall be in one half the value of the vessel; and that required by the fourth article shall be in the single value of the shipment; and the security which the Collector may accept may be either personal security, or a mortgage of the vessel, or a transfer of the Bills of Lading, or of cotton, tobacco, or Confederate securities.

2. Whenever any vessel shall bring into the Confederate States an entire cargo for account of the Confederate States, the owners of the said vessel, and the shippers of her cargo, shall be relieved from the bonds previously given to invest and bring in one-half the net proceeds of her outward cargo, and the certificate of the agent of the Treasury Department at the port of lading, that such cargo was duly shipped in pursuance of the regulations, shall authorise the collector to cancel and surrender the said bonds.

Approved, March 16, 1864.

AN ACT TO PROHIBIT THE IMPORTATION OF LUXURIES, OR OF ARTICLES NOT NECESSARIES OR OF COMMON USE.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That from and after the first day of March next it shall not be lawful to import into the Confederate States any brandy, wines, or other spirits; or any other article specified in schedule A of an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue from commodities imported from foreign countries,' approved May 21, 1861, or any goods, wares, or merchandise, enumerated in schedule B of said act, except the following articles:—All things for medical purposes, camphor refined, pickles, molasses, pepper, pimento, cloves, nutmegs, cinnamon, and all other spices; soap, Castille, Windsor, and all other toilet soaps; sugar of all kinds; syrup of sugar; galloons, laces, knots, stars, tassels, tresses and wings of gold and silver, or imitations thereof, intended for uniforms of officers in the military and naval service.

SEC. 2. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles enumerated in schedule C of said act: Beer, ale, and porter; muffs and tippets, and all other manufactures of fur, of which fur shall be a component part, except caps and hats; carpets, carpetings, hearth rugs, bedsides, and other portions of carpeting, of any kind or description; carriages and parts of carriages; cider and other beverages not containing alcohol; clocks and parts of clocks; cotton laces, cotton insertings, cotton trimmings, or laces of thread and other material; coral, manufactured; dolls and toys of all kinds; fire crackers, sky rockets, Roman candles and all other similar articles used in pyrotechnics; furniture, cabinet and household; glass, coloured, stained, or painted; India matting of all sorts; jet and manufactures of jet, and imitations thereof; jewellery, or imitations thereof; manufactures and articles of marble, marble paving tiles, slabs, or blocks, and all other marble; matting, China or other floor matting and mats made of flags, jute, or grass; paper hangings, paper for walls, and paper for screens or fire boards; paving and roofing tiles and bricks, and roofing slates and fire bricks; thread lacings and insertings; velvets of all kinds.

SEC. 3. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles, enumerated in schedule D of said act: Angola, Thibet, and other goats' hair, or mohair, unmanufactured; bananas, cocoa nuts, plantains, and oranges; cabinets of coins, medals, gems, and collections of antiquities; diamonds, mosaics, gems, pearls, rubies, and other precious stones and imitations thereof, set in gold or silver or other metals; engravings, bound or unbound; rattans and reeds; paintings and stationery; leaf and unmanufactured tobacco and cigars; or the following articles enumerated in schedule E. Diamonds, cameos, mosaics, pearls, gems, rubies, and other precious stones and imitations thereof, when not set.

SEC. 4. None of the manufactures of metal, designed as either household or personal ornaments, shall be admitted; and in order to confine importations to articles of necessity and of common use, the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the maximum foreign prices at which and within which importations of goods manufactured wholly or partly of cotton, flax, wool, or of silk, and designed for wearing apparel, and not herein prohibited, may be made, and beyond which importations thereof shall not be made: Provided, That articles herein allowed to be imported shall not be impressed by the Government or its agents after they have reached the Confederate States: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any importation for the use or account of the Confederate States, or either of them: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to any articles which have been or shall be shipped, without knowledge of the passage of this act, before the first day of March next, but which shall arrive in a Confederate port after that day.

SEC. 5. That whenever any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, after the first day of March next, be imported into the Confederate States, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or shall, after said first day of March next, be put on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, with the intention of importing the same into the Confederate States, all such articles, as well as all other articles on board the same ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, belonging to the owner of such prohibited articles, shall be forfeited, and the owner thereof shall, moreover, forfeit and pay double the value of such articles.

SEC. 6. If any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, nevertheless, be on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, arriving after said first day of March next in the Confederate States, and shall be omitted in the manifest, report, or entry of the master, or the person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, or shall be omitted in the entry of the goods owned by the owner, or consigned to the consignee of such articles, or shall be imported or landed, or attempted to be imported or landed, without a permit, the same penalties, fines, and forfeitures shall be incurred, and may be recovered, as in the case of similar omission or omissions, landing, importation, or attempt to land or import, in relation to articles liable to duties on their importation into the Confederate States.

SEC. 7. Every collector, naval officer, surveyor, or other officer of the customs, shall have the like power and authority to seize goods, wares, and merchandise imported contrary to the intent and meaning of this act, to keep the same in custody until it shall have been ascertained whether the same have been forfeited or not, and to enter any ship or vessel, dwelling-house, store, building, or other place, for the purpose of searching for and seizing any such goods, wares, and merchandise subject to duty; and if any person or persons shall conceal or buy any goods, wares, or merchandise, knowing them to be liable to seizure by this act, such person or persons shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a sum double the amount or value of the goods, wares, and merchandise so concealed or purchased.

SEC. 8. The following additional oath or affirmation shall be taken by masters or persons having charge or command of any ship or vessel arriving at any port of the Confederate States after said first day of March next, viz.: 'I further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board [insert the denomination and the name of the vessel] any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, or merchandise on board of the said vessel, or which shall have been imported in the same, I will immediately, and without delay, make due report thereof to the collector of the port of this district.'

SEC. 9. After said first day of March next, importers, consignors, or agents, at the time of entering goods into the Confederate States, shall take the following additional oath, viz.: 'I also swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, amongst the said goods, wares, or merchandise, imported or consigned as aforesaid, any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover any such goods, wares, or merchandise among the said goods, wares, and merchandise so imported or consigned as aforesaid, I will immediately and without delay report the same to the collector of this district.'

SEC. 10. All penalties and forfeitures arising under this act may be sued for and recovered, and shall be distributed and accounted for, in the manner prescribed by the act entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage;' and such penalties and forfeitures, mitigated or remitted, in like manner and under the like conditions, regulations, and restrictions as are prescribed, authorised, and directed by the act entitled 'An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned.'

SEC. 11. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

Approved, February 6, 1864.

ON May 4, General Grant opened the present campaign in Virginia by crossing the Rapidan with the army of the Potomac, numbering about 120,000 men, in four divisions, commanded by Generals Sedgwick, Hancock, Warren, and Burnside, the whole army under the command of General Meade, acting under the orders of Lieutenant-General Grant, who has planned and directs all military operations. General Lee did not dispute the passage of the Rapidan, as expected, but took a position in 'the Wilderness,' near the battle-ground of Chancellorsville, where he was attacked on the 5th by three divisions of the Federal army, Sedgwick on the right, Hancock on the left, and Warren in the centre, the division of Burnside forming the reserve. To these were opposed the Confederate divisions of Generals Hill, Longstreet, and Ewell. From the nature of the ground, neither side could use artillery, and a fierce fight was kept up till night, with rifle and bayonet, in which the Confederates repelled every assault, and captured nearly the whole of two Federal brigades, with their commanders, Seymour and Shaler.

The engagement was renewed on the morning of the 6th. Hancock was driven back; Sedgwick on the right was thrown into confusion, but was saved from entire rout by the reserve under Burnside. Later in the day, the Confederates pierced the Federal centre, and gained decided advantages, but General Grant was able to reform and consolidate his lines, while General Lee, satisfied with the result, withdrew to his intrenchments.

The Federal losses on these two days are estimated by themselves at 8,000 to 12,000. Among the killed was General Wadsworth of New York. Prisoners were taken by the Confederates by regiments. The Federal medical director telegraphed that he should send 6,000 to 8,000 wounded to Washington. General Lee reports: 'Our loss in killed is not large, but we have many wounded. General Longstreet is severely wounded, Pegram badly wounded, and Jenkins killed.' He thanks God that every advance of Grant had been repulsed.

A Richmond despatch states that on Friday the Federals were repulsed in every attack, forced to give way, and pushed back to Chancellorsville, by General Longstreet, who was wounded in the shoulder. It closes with—'Everything looks well.'

A correspondent of the New York Daily News sums up the three days' operations, from May 4 to 7, as follows:—'For three days past Grant has pushed a series of reconnaissances on General Lee's front. The latter met the Federal troops and repulsed them with great loss on both sides. General Lee then learning that Grant's demonstration was for the purpose of gaining time while General Butler marched to get in his rear, fell back to a point selected by his engineers, with his army in position to meet any or all of Grant's cooperating forces, from whichever point they may attack. The above statement is the gist of another made by one of the rebel officers captured in Friday's skirmish. He further stated that the rebel army, from General Lee to the humblest private, felt never so sure of victory as they do at this time. On the other side, the Federal officers say the same thing of our army. The partial result of the present movements will be that the very best General Grant can do is not more than to drive General Lee into his defences; when the digging operations of a long siege will commence. Our own officers who have been prisoners, and rebel officers now in prison in this city, state it as their emphatic conviction that Richmond cannot be turned, and that its fortifications cannot be carried by storm.'

Having given this heavy blow to the invader, General Lee, in accordance with his plans, fell back to his second position on the river Po, near Spottsylvania. There was some hard fighting on the 8th, in which the Federal General, Sedgwick, was killed, and Generals Getty, Talbot, Morris, Robinson, and Baxter wounded. On the 9th, Grant was engaged in replenishing his stores. His losses were then estimated at 27,000.

On the 10th, another sanguinary battle was fought, which commenced in the afternoon and lasted until dark. The attack was commenced by the artillery of General Grant. We have but meagre particulars of this day's fight. The Confederates advanced round the right flank of the Federals, and captured their supply trains, and the Federals claim to have taken 2,000 prisoners. General Grant appears to have recovered from the confusion caused by the flank movement. General Warren was reported to be killed. The losses of the Federals up to this time were estimated at 40,000, while General Lee, on the 11th, was said to be in a strong position, behind earthworks and woods. Fredericksburg was full, even the streets, of the wounded Federals, 12,000 having arrived there on the 10th, and a large number in Washington. The rear of the Federal army was filled with parties of guerillas, destroying bridges and endangering communications.

The contest was renewed on the 12th by a vigorous and partially successful attack on the Confederate position at Spottsylvania, in which he is reported by the New York telegrams to have taken some Confederate rifle-pits, 30 guns, 4,000 prisoners, and two Confederate generals; but other reports diminish these successes, and we are informed that during the whole day, with frequent assaults and terrible slaughter, General Grant was not able to make the least impression upon the Confederate position. On the night of the 12th, General Lee, leaving a thin line of skirmishers in front of General Grant, crossed the Po, to take up, it was supposed, a stronger position on the North or South Anna. No estimate is given of the Federal losses on the 12th; but it is said that reinforcements were being hurried forward to General Grant, who was making a reconnaissance with two divisions to ascertain General Lee's position.

It is reported that a detachment of Federal cavalry had destroyed a portion of railway in the rear of General Lee, and also that General Sigel, who was moving up the Shenandoah Valley, had cut the Charlottsville and Lynchburg Railway, and another report states that he had been defeated by General Breckenridge.

The Federal losses in General Grant's operations, from May 4 to May 12, are estimated at 50,000.

SIMULTANEOUSLY with the advance of General Grant across the Rapidan, General Butler has advanced up the James River with a flotilla of 25 ironclads, 10 gunboats, 97 steam transports, 41 schooners, and 60 canal boats and barges, carrying an army of 15,000 to 20,000 men, and landed without opposition at Bermuda Hundreds, a short distance above City Point. A detachment of cavalry from Suffolk is reported to have burned an important railway bridge below Petersburg, and a portion of the track was also destroyed between Petersburg and Richmond. General Butler boasts that he has cut General Lee off from being reinforced by General Beauregard, but at latest dates the redoubtable general had had a narrow escape from capture, and his Northern friends were not free from apprehensions for his safety.

WHILE General Grant was fighting his way towards Richmond with immense losses, inflicted by the Confederates from behind earthworks, and in chosen positions, General Sherman attempted an advance from Chattanooga towards Atlanta, but found General Johnston's position at Risaca too strong to be attacked with any hope of success. General Forrest is reported to have destroyed General Sherman's communications, and taken or sunk several Federal transports on the Tennessee and Cumberland rivers; and there is a doubtful report that the Confederates had evacuated Dalton.

THE news from Louisiana grows worse for the Federals at every arrival. Ironclads, gunboats, and a large number of transports have been blown up to prevent their falling into the hands of the Confederates. General Banks has been superseded by General Canby, but it is doubted if he can save the remnant of the Federal army, which was said to be surrounded at Alexandria by the Confederates under Kirby Smith, Magruder, and Taylor, and had been summoned to surrender. The Confederates had taken or captured four steam transports sent to his relief; all the gunboats were destroyed or taken, and an effort was to be made to retreat to Brashear City.

GENERAL STEELE, who marched from Little Rock to unite with General Banks in his attack on Shreveport, is said to have effected his escape from Generals Price and Marmaduke, with the loss of five thousand men, all his trains, and a portion of his artillery. He was obliged to burn all the bridges behind him to delay the pursuing Confederates. It is not certain that the remains of his army are safe in Little Rock, which was expecting an attack from the victorious Confederates.

MR. SEWARD, as usual, is playing a subtle game with the Mexican question and the Monroe doctrine. In Washington he permits the House of Representatives to pass resolutions, affirming that 'the whole boundless continent is ours.' In Paris, Mr. Dayton is instructed to explain that such resolutions are not binding upon the Government, and of no consequence. But what was Mr. Corwin, the Federal Minister at Mexico, to say to the new Emperor? He must recognise or not recognise. That difficulty has been disposed of by Mr. Corwin getting leave of absence, and returning home for a visit.

THE Federal gunboat Commodore Jones, sent with several small craft to clear away obstructions below Fort Darling, has been blown out of water and totally destroyed by a torpedo. The explosion literally tore her in pieces. About fifty of the crew were killed and wounded. The Shawsheen, another gunboat, had her boiler exploded by a bolt from Confederate artillery.

THE population of Richmond in 1860 was a little less than 38,000. General Grant, according to Federal accounts, in moving the first twenty miles towards the Confederate capital, and over what he will probably find the least difficult portion of his route, lost in five days 40,000, more than its entire population before the war began.

THE shelling of Charleston still continues, and the thirty-pounder Parrott gun, which exploded at the four-thousand-six-hundred-and-fifteenth round, has been replaced by one still more effective, by which shells are tossed into the city in places heretofore considered safe. The siege is abandoned; Fort Sumter is stronger than ever; but the Federals, holding a point of sandbank, in pure malice continue to shell the city, one day breaking a woman's leg, another maiming a poor negro.

SEVERAL persons have been hanged at Memphis, Tennessee, for smuggling contraband goods through the lines to the Confederates. As it is notorious that a large trade of this kind has been carried on with the connivance of the military authorities, and under permits from the Treasury Department, it may be presumed that these men are hanged, not for trading with the Confederates, but for neglecting to pay for the privilege.

WHILE news of the battles of the 6th and 7th was coming in, Mr. Stanton, Secretary of War, was engaged in sending pompous and absurd despatches to General Dix at New York, claiming victories, and ending with 'General Grant is on to Richmond.'

THE Federal Senate has passed a resolution, fixing the number which shall constitute a quorum at twenty-five instead of thirty-five, thereby recognising the fact that the seceded States are no longer a portion of the Union.

IN the midst of the terrific battles and losses attending the advance of General Grant, in which every mile of advance weakens his force, increases his difficulties, and lessens his chance of success, President Lincoln calls upon the Northern people to join in thanksgiving—for the loss of 40,000 men, including several of his best generals!

COMMANDERS Pegram, Root, and Paulding have been appointed to the Confederate ironclads in the James River.

WE are sorry to find in the New York papers a report of the sudden death, by an accident, of the second son of President Davis, aged four years.

GENERAL M'DOWELL has been appointed to the command of the military department of California, in anticipation, it was supposed, of the possibility of a rupture with France and Mexico.

GOLD, fluctuating with the news from Virginia from 69 to 74, closed on the 14th at 72¼.

ENGLAND.

The case of 'Ternan and others, prisoners in the gaol of Liverpool,' came before the Court of Queen's Bench on Tuesday and Wednesday last. It is the case of the habeas corpus obtained on behalf of the men arrested and detained at Liverpool as pirates on the warrant of the Home Secretary, in consequence of a demand made by the United States minister under the Extradition treaty. The prisoners, with others, got on board the barque Gerity at Matamoras; when about 70 miles from that port, they rose upon the master and crew by night, turned the master adrift, seized the ship, and took it to Belize, a port in British Honduras, and there abandoned it. In February last they were found in Liverpool. Requisition was then made by the master, who also happened to be in that city, to Sir George Grey, under the Extradition Act of 1843, by which the respective countries were mutually bound to deliver up to justice parties who, being charged with piracy, robbery, and murder, &c., committed within the jurisdiction of one state, escape into the country of the other. Upon the mere requisition, unsupported at the time by any sworn evidence, a warrant was issued first from the Home Secretary, and then from the Liverpool magistrates, directing that the prisoners should be confined with the view to their extradition. On the hearing of the case before the magistrates it appeared that the man had acted under the orders of Major Hogg of the Confederate service, and it was insisted therefore that their act could not be piracy. The magistrates remanded the men; a habeas corpus had been obtained from this Court, with a view to their discharge, on the ground that no evidence had appeared which brought the case within the Act. Mr. James, for the prisoners, was instructed, as he stated, on behalf of the Confederate Government, which takes upon itself the whole responsibility of the affair. The case was very fully argued. Their Lordships were divided in opinion; Lord Chief Justice Cockburn thinking that the evidence given to the magistrates was sufficient for the purposes of extradition, Justices Crompton, Blackburn, and Shee considering that the prisoners ought to be discharged. The men were therefore released.

The Gordian knot, which the law has vainly essayed to untie, has been cut by the coarser machinery of money. It is credibly affirmed that Her Majesty's Government has purchased the steam rams El Toussin and El Monassir of Messrs. Bravay the owners. The price agreed on is stated to be 225,000*l*. The British navy will, by the transaction, receive a formidable addition to its strength, inasmuch as competent judges are of opinion that there are no finer vessels afloat.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales presided last week at the banquet at St. James's Hall, commemorative of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the Royal Literary Fund. The occasion was one of great interest. The Prince had never before undertaken the duties of chairman at a public dinner; and in presiding at the festival of this Society, he was following the example of the Prince Consort. The Duke of Cambridge sat on the right and Earl Stanhope on the left of the chair. Many peers, bishops, members of the House of Commons, literary men, and publishers of distinction were present. With the simple object of explaining the nature of the Association, a short extract from the speech of His Royal Highness may be read with interest. In proposing 'Prosperity to the Royal Literary Fund,' the Prince said: 'One of its principal features is, that it is not limited to our countrymen, but is often extended to literary men of all nations. In this way many eminent men, who would otherwise be incapacitated from carrying on their labours and from making their talents known to the world, are enabled to do so. The second important feature is, the secresy with which this timely aid is given, a secresy so sacredly observed, that in the whole number of cases, which amount to 1,645, since the foundation of this corporation in 1790, there is not a single instance of any indiscretion having been committed.' Earl Stanhope, as President of the Institution, returned thanks; and afterwards, Earl Russell proposed 'Prosperity to English Literature,' to which toast Mr. Anthony Trollope responded.

An animated correspondence has taken place between Mr. Thomas Baring, M.P., and Lord Robert Cecil, M.P., in reference to the debate which took place in the House of Commons concerning the Confederate steam-ship Georgia. First, Mr. Baring writes to call the attention of the noble lord to a passage in the speech of the latter, which was as follows: 'I want you to consider the feelings with which the Confederates regard these enormous reinforcements which have been conveyed by the English people through the hands of Messrs. Baring & Co., in violation of Her Majesty's proclamation of neutrality.' Mr. Baring desires to know to what proclamation Lord Robert referred, and what were the terms of the proclamation, which he considered substantiated the charge. Lord Robert, in answer, refers Mr. Baring to the Queen's proclamation of May 13, 1861, and especially to the words therein contained prohibitory of carrying officers, soldiers, despatches, arms, military stores or materials, or any article or articles considered and deemed to be contraband of war, for the use or service of either of the contending parties. Lord Robert also refers to a speech of Mr. Laird of March 27, 1863, containing these words: 'I (Mr. Laird) have referred to the bills of entry in the custom-houses of London and Liverpool, and I find that there have been vast shipments of implements of war to the Northern States. I find, among those who have been engaged in these transactions, the celebrated house of Baring and Co.' Lord Robert then says that all he claims is, that the proclamation shall not be held to prohibit one kind of contraband of war, viz., ships to one belligerent, while it is held to permit the export of another kind, viz., arms to the other belligerent, but that it shall be interpreted impartially.

In answer to Mr. Baring's accusation that Lord Robert had given a personal character to the discussion, his Lordship remarks that Mr. Baring had twice applied the term 'fraudulently' to the proceedings of the Liverpool firm that sent out the Georgia. To this letter Mr. Baring makes reply, and after contending that persons who have been instrumental in forwarding munitions of war either to the Federal or Confederate States have not thereby violated Her Majesty's proclamation, proceeds to state that his firm has not in fact been even so engaged; that they had acted merely as bankers, representing large banking establishments in the United States, which had opened credits with his firm in favour of parties to whom orders were given, but not through his firm for the purchase and transmission of warlike stores for the use of the Federal Government. The firm took no part in giving or executing the orders; all it did was to give effect to the credit lodged in favour of the parties furnishing the supplies, and to see that they were properly forwarded to their destination. By the use of the term 'fraudulent,' Mr. Baring explains that he alluded to the concealment practised by Messrs. Laird in order to cover their real intentions. Lord Robert rejoins to Mr. Baring's replication. He contends that the transactions of Mr. Baring's firm as described by himself fall within the letter of the prohibition quoted in Lord Robert's first letter. 'You tell me,' says Lord Robert, 'that warlike supplies have been ordered for the use of the Federal Government, and that your firm has been engaged in "seeing that they were properly forwarded to their destination." In other words, you have been superintending the carrying, which is pointedly forbidden by the proclamation.' However, Lord Robert quite admits that the transactions in question are not censurable nor improper, 'a matter,' says he, 'fully proved by the fact that operations of that nature have been countenanced by such a house as that of Messrs. Baring.' All that Lord Robert contends is, that any distinction between exporters of arms and exporters of ships is groundless and unjust. Lord Robert reminds Mr. Baring that he introduced the personal element into the discussion by the mode in which he spoke of Messrs. Laird's firm. As to the concealment on the part of Messrs. Laird, it was fully justified. They had to guard against the Government which harassed their particular trade by every means legal and illegal within its reach. They had also to avoid the vigilance of the Federal spies.

On Trinity Sunday, the Pastoral by Cardinal Wiseman was read in all the Roman Catholic places of worship within the 'archdiocess of Westminster.' We are enabled to give but one extract from the document.

'We cannot shut our eyes to the aim or tendency of modern science, which is to demand, not equality, but supremacy; not a fair balance, but a loaded scale, whenever it seems to come into competition with the claims of revelation. The moment the two seem to contend, in disagreement, for the belief of man, science at once exacts that all else should give way; and, unfortunately, too many yield at once and surrender at discretion.

'The stump of a fossil tree, the bones of an extinct animal, a broken skull found in some inexplicable place, but requiring a solution equally from our assailants, nay, a potsherd, a seashell, the piles of a lake village, the rudiments of stone instruments, all things—anything is heavy enough to turn the scale in favour of what is called reason.

'And we are ridiculed as fearing or opposed to science, as narrow-minded and hoodwinked bigots, for not at once adopting this confused mass of immature conjecture, and sacrificing, in honour of our acceptance, whatsoever has been to us venerable, whatsoever holy, whatsoever lovely, whatsoever of good fame, whatsoever true and just, whatsoever has been hitherto to us the light of our eyes or the joy of our hearts, what has made us and kept us virtuous, hopeful, consoled, happy through our dark or rugged way on earth, and has sustained our heads above the billows, and our souls above the troubles, the anxieties, and the anguishes of life.

'We pause in vain. We are calmly and composedly placing in the opposite scale many and dear considerations. We have before us a prescriptive authority in records of several thousand years ago, discussed, disputed, and always victorious, running down a channel that seems scooped out for it through primeval rivers, lined with monuments, beyond which man has left no articulate memorial—cuneiform or hieroglyphic; all marvellously attesting, by consenting and concurrent testimony, the accuracy of those sacred volumes: then interwoven with what the West considered ancient and the East modern, the annals of the Ptolemies and the Seleucidæ, till the stream of primitive history, with its evidence of prophecy, still in course of verification, drops silently into that deeper, nobler, and more magnificent reservoir, where it mingles with the pure and living waters of a new dispensation, whence it issues with all the new qualities—evidences, proofs, and applications which are concentrated here.

'Here we meet with such a strange superhuman overweight of proof as seems to master every possible objection, and to leave no alternative for a second solution. For, in addition to all that miraculous works and prophetic sayings, and new moral precepts, a fresh philosophy, theology, and social code issuing from illiterate men, in the midst of a most brilliant age,—and accepted; we have to throw into the balance the vastest empire ever known, subdued when at its greatest height; the entire world reformed, transformed into a new condition by a new legislature, promulgated by ignorant men, propagated by poor men; proved and pressed on acceptance by men in prison and in the stocks, under the scourge and the knife, on the rack and the gridiron: till the whole empire and the entire globe rolled spontaneously to the feet of a Galilean crucified on the Janiculum.

'Have we not a right to put all these grave and solemn considerations against a solitary cranium, an antiquated fish-bone, or a fragment of pottery? Yet while we are doing so, comes in the sarcasm and the jeer that we are unscientific, anti-progressist, superstitious, and behind the age, and sharper than a two-edged sword, and heavy like that of Camillus, it is thrown into the opposite scale, as sufficient to make ours kick the beam. But no: eternal truth will still prevail, when temporal science shall have revised its wisdom, and brought it into harmony with the moral evidences which surround and support revelation.'

A testimonial has been presented to Mr. Stansfeld, M.P. by his constituents in the borough of Halifax. The gift is of the value of 300 guineas. It consists of a magnificent candelabrum, on the base of which are the arms of the borough of Halifax, and the arms of the Stansfeld family. The presentation took place on the Tuesday in Whitsun week, at the Town Hall of Halifax, in the presence of 10,000 inhabitants. Mr. Stansfeld addressed the assembly in an eloquent speech, dwelt minutely on the circumstances attending his retirement from the ministry, and spoke in terms of the highest eulogy of Joseph Mazzini. The honourable gentleman was applauded throughout his speech in a most enthusiastic manner.

The anniversary meeting of the Royal Geographical Society was held on Monday, at Burlington House, Sir Roderick Murchison in the chair. After the report had been read, the President proceeded to present the Founders' and Patrons' gold medals. The former medal had been awarded to Baron C. von der Decken of Hanover, in honour of the two journeys performed by him from the east coast of Africa to the great mountain of Kilimandjaro. The first journey was accomplished in company with Mr. Richard Thornton, and the second with Dr. Karsten. It was mentioned at the presentation that the Baron was fitting out an expedition with intent to ascend one of the rivers flowing from Mount Keniæ, and thence to explore unknown regions of inner Africa, and follow one of the main eastern affluents of the Nile. The Patron's or Queen's medal was presented to Captain Grant in honour of his successful expedition in company with Captain Speke. Sir Roderick Murchison was re-elected President for the ensuing year.

The steamship Delhi, which arrived last week in Southampton from Sydney, brought the beautiful gift of the ladies of New South Wales to Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales. The Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury gave an order for the admission of the gift free from duty. It consisted of a magnificent gold casket measuring 8 inches in width by 4 inches in depth, and lined with rich velvet. The casket is ornamented with wreaths of flowers, and the key represents an opossum on a tree, the whole being of solid gold. It is valued at 700*l*., and consequently the duty on it would have amounted to about 100*l*.

The Stuart portraits which formerly adorned the galleries of the palace at Hampton Court, have been removed thence, and forwarded to Edinburgh, to be placed in Holyrood Palace. A memorial signed by several Scottish gentlemen of influence has induced Her Majesty to consent to this arrangement. The portraits sent extend over the period from the middle of the 16th to the end of the 17th century. Probably the finest picture is that of Anne of Denmark, consort of James I., by Van Somer. There are pictures by the same artist of James I. and his son Henry, prince of Wales. The portrait of Margaret, countess of Lennox, the mother of Darnley, by Holbein, is a remarkable work. Portraits of the Admirable Crichton, of the Count Palatine and Princess Elizabeth (king and queen of Bohemia), by Janssen, and copies from Vandyck of the children of Charles I., of Charles II. from Kneller, and James II. after Lely, have also been sent down. These last-named works have been hung in Lord Darnley's audience chamber.

The city of Edinburgh is rejoicing in the annual excitement caused by the General Assemblies of the Kirk of Scotland and the Free Kirk, and the Synod of the United Presbyterian Kirk. Lord Belhaven, as Lord High Commissioner, held a levée in the picture-gallery of Holyrood Palace on the morning of the 19th inst. He was attended by his purse-bearer and chaplain, by the Lord Provost of the city, pages, lacqueys, and beefeaters. After the levée the Commissioner, preceded by the Town Council, went in procession to St. Giles's Church. The Albany Herald appeared in the procession in the costume of the early Stuarts. After a sermon by Dr. Craik, the Commissioner drove to the Assembly Hall on Castle Hill. Dr. Pirie of Aberdeen, the Moderator, was introduced in the full Geneva ecclesiastical costume of the last century. Her Majesty's commission and letter were then read, and the general business commenced.

The five ships of the Channel Squadron which arrived in Plymouth Sound on the 13th inst., had undergone in dock the necessary cleansing, coating, and small repairs, and were afloat by the end of last week, ready again for work. They are the Edgar 71, the Black Prince 41, the Warrior 40, the Defence 16, the Prince Consort 35. The rapidity with which these operations have been conducted reflects great credit on the officials, and affords a striking evidence of the resources of the Government establishment.

On Monday last, Messrs. Samuda launched the fine iron-clad ship Prince Albert. This vessel is not only iron-cased, but also carries her batteries in cupolas. She is 240 feet in length, and 40 feet in breadth; her depth is 28 feet, and she is of 2,529 tons burden. Her plating is of 4½-inch iron and 18-inch teak, and is carried from end to end. Her upper deck is of pine, with a ¾-inch iron deck. Her engines are 500-horse power nominal. She carries four turrets, and an iron-plated pilot-house. Two of these turrets will carry two guns each, and the remaining two will carry one gun each. The equipment will be finished at Woolwich, and she will not be fit for sea for twelve months.

Messrs. Curry, Kellock & Co., shipbrokers of Liverpool, have been instructed to offer for sale by private treaty the Confederate screw-steamship Georgia. Her crew has been paid off, and her stores were sold by auction on Tuesday last at Birkenhead

AFRICA.

To the intense astonishment of the House of Commons and the country generally, it has been discovered that England is at war with the King of Ashantee. Some time last year an Ashantee chief robbed the king of a large amount of gold, and escaped with his booty to a neighbouring tribe. The King, on the refusal of his demand for the extradition of the fugitive, made war on the tribe which had harboured the robber. This tribe, for some reason or other, is deemed worthy of our protection. Consequently, Mr Richard Pine, the Governor of Cape Coast, has proclaimed war against the King of Ashantee, and, after demanding and receiving a reinforcement of 400 black troops from the West Indies, has proceeded to invade the territory of the King with the ultimate view of capturing his capital, the city of Coomassie. This place lies about 150 miles inland, and in order to get there a station has been occupied and a camp formed about 80 miles inland. The camp is said to be a collection of mud huts situated in a forest, the soil of which was under water at the very commencement of the rainy season. A detachment is to remain there till the dry season returns, and then, if any of the garrison are left, they will advance on Coomassie. Up to the last account it seemed that 200 of the rank and file out of 400 had succumbed to the climate, while 15 officers out of 19 had died or been sent home invalided.

The affair is said to cost about 1,000*l*. a day. Not a single Ashantee warrior has been seen since the expedition started, the King having evidently adopted the tactics of the old Scythian generals, and placed complete reliance on the climate and geographical difficulties of Ashantee. It is satisfactory to find that the Home Government has despatched orders to the settlement for the withdrawal of the troops from the interior, leaving the hostile tribes to their own resources.

TUNIS.

The disturbances in Tunis continue to excite great uneasiness among the Powers lining the Mediterranean. The insurgents have elected a new chief of the name of Mendouh, locally known as the 'Bey of the Mountain.' This potentate has now from 14,000 to 15,000 men at his disposal, who are more than enough to enable him to take possession of the capital, weakly defended by 700 or 800 badly equipped regulars; but he seems to have a prudent dread of the European intervention which must follow on the use of the strong hand, and is satisfied to starve out his foes. He is not, however, unwilling to treat with the Regent, as appears from the following ultimatum, which he has addressed to him:—1. The Kasnadar (prime minister) to be dismissed. 2. The Koran only to be for the future the law and constitution of the country. 3. No taxes to be collected save the tithe allowed by the Koran. 4. The financial affairs of the country to be subjected to a rigid scrutiny, and no further additions to be made to the public debt. The Bey was allowed from the 15th to the 22nd instant to return an answer to these requisitions.

The French Government have thought it necessary to despatch a squadron of six vessels under Admiral Count Bouet Willaumez, commander-in-chief of the active squadron in the Mediterranean, to protect their countrymen in Tunis. There are already assembled in that port 5 French vessels, 4 English, one of which is ironclad, 6 Italian, 3 Turkish, and 1 Portuguese. The Italians are also about to add an ironclad frigate to their squadron. The Tunisian ships, two frigates and a yacht, are of no service, as no workmen can be induced, in the present impoverishment of the exchequer, to put them in decent repair. The Ottoman, French, and English representatives have orders to act in the strictest concert in all measures which may be required for safety. We understand that the first demand of the insurgents has been complied with, and the resignation of the Khasnadar accepted.

ALGERIA.

The revolt of the inland tribes of Algeria gives ample occupation to the French forces in that country; not that they are in any way unequal to the task, but that defections and insurrections continue to occur at unexpected times and places. An important success was achieved by General Deligny on the 13th and 14th inst.: on the first-mentioned day he repulsed with perfect ease a formidable attack of Si-Mohammed-ben Hamza with 3,000 cavalry and 600 infantry; the number of the slain alone on the side of the natives was 200; on the second day he attacked and destroyed the important position of Stitten. Colonel La Passet on or about the same date was attacked by a strong party of the tribe of the Flittas; the fight lasted two hours, and was generally favourable to the French arms. It is probable that the insurrection has arisen on religious grounds; the priestly family of Si-Hamza was its immediate fountain-head, but abortive movements have already taken place; one of the orders of Sidi-Abderrhaman, a name recalling to us the vanished glories of Granada, lately took upon himself the office of an apostle of war; at present the Marabouts of the Flittas are calling for a holy war. All these circumstances, taken in conjunction with the return of the pilgrims from Mecca, leave no doubt that the khouans, or religious sects of the Mahommedans, have given rise to the present troubles. It is well known that the Arabs are perfectly well acquainted with the affairs of Europe: an Arabic journal published at Constantinople gives them every information, even to the debates in the English and French Parliaments; and it was confidently expected that France would at this time be engaged in a European war. It is curious to observe in this the unreasoning fanaticism of the Oriental joined to the cool calculation of the European; we may compare with it the conduct of our Indian mutineers, who had certainly been led to believe that England was not able to endure the blow they had so long meditated.

INDIA.

The Hon. Ashley Eden has returned to Darjeeling from a mission to Bhootan, where he was grossly insulted in public durbar, and dismissed with gross indignity, after having been compelled to sign a treaty ceding [illegible] the Assam frontier.

It is reported that Sir Charles Trevelyan, the Minister of Finance, will return to England at the close of the year, and that Mr [illegible] Her Majesty's Finance Commissioner, will succeed him.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

The House of Commons met on Thursday and adjourned to Monday till to-day. Lord Palmerston appeared in the House on Friday, for the first time since his attack of gout.

OUR TROOPS IN CANADA.

In answer to Major Knox, the Marquis of Hartington said it has been decided that two battalions of Guards and one battalion of Military Train [illegible] from Canada, and that no other troops will take their place.

CHINA AND THE RIGHT OF INTERVENTION.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Baxter called attention to our policy in China. He approves of non-intervention in America and Europe, and he objects to the policy of interference in Asia. As a merchant owning goods in the treaty ports of China, he did not hesitate to confess that he naturally wished the goods to be protected; but even if that was a proper object, it was not right to vote away the money of the taxpayers to support the Imperial dynasty, which he believed was tottering to its fall. Therefore the question which he had to ask Lord Palmerston was whether the Government meant in future to abstain strictly and honourably to the defence of British property in the treaty ports, refusing every kind of aid, direct or indirect, to the Imperialists, and abandoning altogether the attempt to bolster up and support the Government of Pekin.

Lord Palmerston objected to the general application of the principle of non-intervention. He said: 'My honourable friend said that the principle upon which the British Government ought to act is that of non-intervention in the affairs of other States—a very plausible principle, and one which in many cases ought to be strictly adhered to; but my honourable friend forgets that there are cases in which we have treaty rights—that there are cases in which we have national interests; and if his doctrine were to be applied rigidly and in every case, our treaty rights would be violated, and our national interests would be sacrificed. This has been the principle invariably acted on by the British Government. We have interfered with great success in the affairs of other countries, and with great benefit to the countries concerned. We so interfered, for instance, in the affairs of Greece, and we established the independence of that State. We interfered in the affairs of Belgium, and we established the independence of Belgium as a separate State. We interfered in the affairs of Portugal, and enabled Portugal to obtain a free and Parliamentary constitution. We interfered in the affairs of Spain with like success and with a similar result. We interfered in the affairs of Turkey, of Syria, and of Egypt, and we maintained the integrity of the Turkish Empire. These were all events preceding the Crimean war, and I do not think any man in this House will say that in that struggle we were unsuccessful. We have interfered in the affairs of China. Why? Because our treaty rights were endangered and our national interests were at stake.' Lord Palmerston said it was the object of the Government to defend our treaty rights, and to protect our commerce. No assistance would be rendered to the Imperialists, but he was of opinion that the overthrow of the Tartar dynasty would lead to anarchy, and that the suppression of the rebellion would benefit our commerce.

THE ASHANTEE WAR.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Cardwell stated that the war against the King of Ashantee was to be abandoned, and that the force on the Gold Coast was to be greatly reduced.

DEFENCES OF SHREVEPORT.—A Confederate paper says the fortifications of this important port are complete and very extensive, the natural advantages of the place, which are considerable, having been improved on by much engineering skill and labour. The river at Shreveport is about three hundred yards wide. The opposite banks are low, and the soil so boggy as to prevent an advance from that side. Our batteries are sufficiently elevated to secure plunging shots against the ironclads, and the guns are of heavy calibre and well-mounted. In addition to these defences the river is obstructed to such an extent that the fleet cannot advance on the town without much difficulty and delay, as well as danger. The garrison is provisioned for a siege of six months; the troops are in the best of spirits, and repose unlimited confidence in General Smith. The Trans-Mississippi army was never in better condition. Many desertions have taken place within the last year, it is true, but the practice has ceased, and the army, now thoroughly weeded, tested, and harmonious, and under a favourite leader, is prepared for victory.

EFFECTS OF WAR.—Five years ago, if a pirate, with a dozen murders on his crown, was in danger of being hanged, the whole Commonwealth was stirred and roused, and public meetings were held by the score, to protest, entreat, and denounce. Now, the life of a man is of no more account than the life of a dog or a rat. You might hang a dozen men, before breakfast, on Boston Common, and nobody would care about it. Such is war: and such is the result of a war which men opposed to capital punishment have done so much to bring on. And another consequence of war is that it leads to intemperance. Intemperance is the vice of all Northern armies, and it has done great harm in our army. No man can doubt that this war has increased drunkenness to a frightful extent, and put back the temperance reformation for years; and yet no men have done more to stir up this war than the zealous apostles of temperance.—Boston Courier.

WIVES AND NO WIVES.—The Boston Courier of May 10 says: 'It is noticed as a curious circumstance that on the Committee of the Ladies' National League, as published, are names of wives of two U. S. Senators who were never married.'

THE CONTINENT.

THE next sitting of the Conference is fixed for Saturday, May 28; it is hoped, but scarcely expected, that some basis will then be discovered on which the conditions of peace may be discussed. It is understood that matters at present stand on this wise: Austria and Prussia have declared that they are no longer bound by the treaty of 1852; Denmark on the contrary will only negotiate on the basis of that treaty; the neutral powers would prefer to accept it as valid, unless forced to take another view. A despatch sent to Vienna states that the two great German powers have presented a scheme to the Conference, by which the complete legislative independence of the duchies would be secured, and a personal union with Denmark allowed, with the strongest possible guarantees for its preservation: the whole proposition, however, is to be subject to the reserve made by the Diet on the question of the succession. The scheme, having been accepted by the Representative of the Diet, Herr von Beust, with the last-mentioned reserve, has been forwarded by the Danish Commissioners to Copenhagen for examination. There can be no doubt on the question whether Prussia now repudiates the treaty of 1852: Herr von Bismarck has addressed a despatch to Herr von Bernstorff, dated May 15, in which this point is strongly insisted on. Allusion is made in it to a mysterious statement in a previous despatch that Prussia might be forced to make such sacrifices as would materially alter her views; and this, Herr von Bismarck contends, ought to have been sufficient notice to diplomatists of the possibility of the step now taken by Prussia. A solution of present difficulties can be the only object of the present Conference. Prussia does not appear before that body in the light of a violator of obligations. The obligations were not taken to include England, France, Russia, and Denmark, but simply between the Cabinets of Copenhagen and Berlin; consequently the relations between the present neutral Powers and Denmark on one part, between Denmark and Prussia on another, and, lastly, between Prussia and the neutral Powers, have nothing in common: 'Denmark is a common, not a mutual, friend to both parties,' says the Times in explanation—a statement which is possibly true, but certainly not English. We must not omit to mention that several well-informed persons utterly deny the truth of the statement that the Austro-Prussian proposals have been referred to Copenhagen for examination; they say, on the contrary, that the propositions made were such that the Danish plenipotentiaries utterly declined to consider them.

A story is rife in Brussels that the Russian Government has signified to the Austro-Prussians its readiness to allow the annexation of the Duchies to Germany, so long as the two Powers agreed to combat to the utmost the formation of a Scandinavian Union.

The Oesterreichische Zeitung re-echoes the complaints made by the Prussian press on the unpleasant position held by the German plenipotentiaries in London. That journal asks how long this is to continue, and why the seat of the Conference should not be removed to another city, as, for instance, Brussels. Did not Balak say to Balaam, 'Come now, I pray thee, I will bring thee unto another place; peradventure it will please God that thou mayest curse me them from thence'?

A painful occurrence has taken place with regard to the secret despatches sent by Herr von Manderström to Herr von Wachtmeister, Swedish plenipotentiary in London. On their arrival at their destination, it was discovered that they had been tampered with during their transit through German territory; inquiries were immediately instituted, and an explanation has been given: how far it is satisfactory we have not heard; one idea is, that the despatches were meddled with before they left Stockholm. The moral of the story is, that there is more use in the hard-worked though envied Queen's messenger than has as yet been allowed by some of our ultra-ardent reformers.

A series of events of some importance have occurred in Germany in respect of the re-constitution of the Zollverein. The treaty of commerce between France and Prussia concluded on August 2, 1862, having materially affected the relative positions of the smaller members of the Zollverein, it was thought advisable to attempt a re-construction of that assocation on other and broader principles. The attempt, however, was abortive; the Governments of Bavaria, Wurtemburg, Hanover, Grand-Ducal Hesse, and Nassau refused to assist at the reopening of the Conference on the subject, and in fact led Prussia to understand that they were desirous of separating from the association. Negotiations were therefore entered into with other German Governments, the result of which has been that the Grand-Duchy of Baden, the kingdom of Saxony, and the duchy of Brunswick have given in their adhesion; and a favourable answer is hoped for from the Elector of Hesse. The effect of this will be to create a new league, which will thoroughly isolate Hanover from the other receding States, and which will extend continuously from the Rhine to the confines of Russia. Under such circumstances the States of Central Germany would be unable to maintain their position of exclusiveness.

The Norwegian forces are to be put into a state of activity; they consist of 6,000 men, with 400 horses and 4 batteries of rifled guns, and will be divided into 4 camps to be made at Trondjhem, Bergen, Christiansand and Christiania respectively. If we add to the number mentioned a body of Norwegian Guards about 200 strong, and a squadron of guides, we find that the whole military force of Norway cannot exceed 6,500 men.

The Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs has made a remarkable speech in the Cortes on the Italian question. He asserted very positively the necessity of an independent Pontificate, fettered by no foreign engagements of any description. The declaration was received with cordial and unanimous applause.

It is stated in the Epoca that Spain will make choice of a representative in Mexico, as soon as the Emperor Maximilian has notified to the Court at Madrid his accession to the Mexican throne.

The difficulties between Spain and Peru are assuming a very grave character. The Peruvian Government has refused to give an official reception to the envoy of Her Catholic Majesty, Señor Salazar y Mazarredo. This gentleman thereupon addressed an ultimatum to the Peruvian authorities, which was returned to him with the seal unbroken. He immediately took his departure.

The Progressista party in Spain, which is identical with that which in Italy is called the party of action, has held a banquet, remarkable, even in these days of tercentenaries, for the enormous number of guests (3,000) who were accommodated. This party has, for some time, been in a disorganised state; and court, church, and army have alike run riot, while their natural moderators, the Opposition, were powerless to restrain their vagaries. The Progressisti have now, however, apparently united under one head, Señor Olozaga: and it was to inaugurate this event that the late banquet was held. A procession was first formed, and a piece of plate presented to the new chief; whether as a token of future admiration, or a retaining fee for probable services, we know not. Señor Olozaga returned thanks in a well-toned and moderate speech, in which he expressed aspirations which, if acted on, will insure him the respect and sympathy of all Englishmen. The banquet followed, and went off amid the hearty enthusiasm and cordiality which the mere contact of a large and unanimous body of men always produces.

The final evacuation of the Ionian Islands will soon take place. The steamers Tamar and Himalaya will embark the small remnant of English troops; on the same day M. Laimis will receive his authority as Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands on behalf of King George I. of Greece.

The Duchess of Brabant gave birth to a daughter on the morning of the 21st inst. Both mother and child are in good health. The Duke of Brabant, as is well known, is heir-apparent of King Leopold of the Belgians.

By letters from Rome we are informed that the health of the Pope is improving; he has been able to leave his room, and hopes to assist in the procession of the Corpus Domini on the 26th inst.

The Chamber of Deputies at Turin discussed, on the 18th inst., a proposition made by Signor Guerrieri to forbid the collection of Peter's Pence. The honourable member asserted that it was by the money thus obtained that brigandage was supported, and the security of the kingdom of Italy endangered. Signor Cantu, on behalf of the Government, thought that the strong measures proposed were unadvisable; the Pope was poor, and was quite justified in appealing to the charity of Italians. The House supported the Ministry in their views, and negatived the proposition of Signor Guerrieri.

Garibaldi has landed at Caprera from the Duke of Sutherland's yacht: he is said to return to his own simple habits with an evident relief. It is now well-known that he has courteously but positively declined the gift of an estate which some of his enthusiastic admirers in England were disposed to present to him. The Duke of Sutherland has been the object of many flattering compliments from Italian corporations; a serenade was given to him by a crowd of 2,000 persons on the presentation of an address from Santa Maria (Capua Vetere), which is to be forwarded through his Grace to the Lord Mayor of London.

The Duc de Persigny presided at a great agricultural meeting held last week at Roanne. The speech which he addressed to the assembled crowds has been reported at full length by the French journals, an honour of which it was eminently worthy. We regret that we must here content ourselves with a very short summary of his observations. The orator called special attention to the constant influence of the rural constituencies on those of the towns. Beginning with the Roman Constitution, he observed that the two bodies were constantly in opposition, and that it was not until the agricultural element had been completely absorbed that the deterioration of Rome commenced. Then, turning to modern times, he said: 'It is a grand constitution which, in England, within the space of two centuries, has made out of an island containing 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 inhabitants a Power which to-day rules over more than 150,000,000 souls, and possesses a tenth part of the habitable globe. Well, in the course of so prodigious a development, the English Government has constantly found itself opposed by the ardent and passionate hostility of the representatives of the great industrial cities, who owed to that Government alone their astonishing prosperity. Like Rome, it outlived and triumphed over all obstacles only through the support which it received from the agricultural constituencies; and it may now ask itself, what would have become of the fortune of England if the indifference of the rural districts had left the field open to the passions of the great cities?' Following up the same thought, he considered what had been the influence of the agricultural constituencies on the fortune of France, and drew the conclusion that the Government and the rural population were mutually bound by the closest ties of interest and gratitude. Had the speaker enlarged further in his view of the English Constitution, and observed on the increasing disinclination to burden the House of Commons with more metropolitan or quasi-metropolitan members, he would have found a fresh confirmation of his principle, and a closer application of the maxim, all the more striking that it is in a great measure involuntary.

On the 17th inst. an unusual occurrence disturbed the serenity of French debate, which resembles nothing so much as a bright May-day: the few clouds of discussion which occasionally obscure for an instant the central sun only tending to enhance the regular and somewhat monotonous brilliance of Government success. On this occasion, however, the cloud was actually followed by a shower—the debate by a defeat. The question was one which has already occupied the attention of various Governments, but yet awaits solution. Joseph Lesurques was tried, convicted, and executed in 1794 on a charge of having robbed the Lyons mail and murdered the courier. The chief witness against him swore positively to his identity; but shortly after the execution another man was found bearing the most wonderful and minute resemblance to Lesurques, and who eventually turned out to be the real murderer. What was to be done? Lesurques was innocent; but unfortunately he was dead, and his property confiscated and sold to indemnify the Treasury for the 54,000 and odd francs of which the mail had been robbed. For sixty years the question has been discussed, and a few payments made to the family; but no thorough 'rehabilitation' of his character or restoration of his property has taken place. His wife went mad and destroyed herself; his son joined the army in the Russian campaign, and perished in the snow; his eldest daughter drowned herself; the second died in a madhouse. One grandchild only now remains to demand justice of Government. The story was pathetically told by the Baron de Janze, and the application supported by M. Clary and M. Jules Favre. The Government, while acknowledging the hardship of the case, objected to making a precedent whereby legal decisions might be overthrown by the House of Representatives. The House, however, decided against Government by a majority of one, the division giving 113 to 112. They were decidedly rather scared by their success, and probably would not have repeated their boldness had a second vote been called for; but the deed was done, and the amendment sent back to the Finance Committee for consideration. The question has again been discussed within four days of the original vote. On the second occasion 47 members only thought fit to support their former decision. It was stated, however, by M. Rouher that Government had been struck with the vote of the Chamber, and were desirous of reexamining the question. A debate of some interest arose on the vote for breeding establishments for horses: the pros and cons of the question were elaborately discussed. It appears that the Government are anxious to give full play to private enterprise, and are therefore determined to withdraw gradually from the quasi monopoly which they have held of the business. One deputy observed that the breed of horses was generally deteriorating, and instanced Ireland, which was once supposed to hold an inexhaustible stock of cavalry horses; but this breed is now exhausted, and country gentlemen have petitioned the Lord Lieutenant on the subject. The honourable gentleman might have remembered that Ireland was once considered an inexhaustible mine of another fighting material—namely, men—and that the breed is being exhausted, and that country gentlemen are holding meetings to ask the reason why. We take it, it is the same in both cases: the fine breed of cavalry horses has either emigrated or improved into hunters; the fine breed of infantrymen is either emigrating or improving itself into a form too valuable to form food for powder and shot.

The Parisian world has been delighted at the serious denial which M. Mocquard has thought fit to give to a pretended despatch published in the Owl, and purporting to be instructions sent to the Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne, French representative at the Conference. It must be confessed that the wit of the composition was at times so delicately veiled as to be almost imperceptible; but we should have thought that M. Mocquard would scarcely have troubled himself to deny the genuineness of a document not absolutely free from grammatical errors.

De la Pommerais exhibited marked signs of anxiety and emotion during the time that intervened between the charge given to the jury and the pronunciation of the verdict. After that time, however, he rallied, as if knowing and prepared for the worst; he asked for his dinner, and ate it quietly; before that time appetite had completely failed him. He was placed in a strait waistcoat, as is usually done where there is the remotest chance that a prisoner may put an end to himself. On the first evening after his condemnation he declared his intention of not appealing to the Cour de Cassation, being anxious, he said, to have done with it as quickly as possible. In this intention he persisted during the first part of the next day; but he finally yielded to the persuasion of his counsel, M. Lachaud, and agreed to make use of this his last resource. An officer of the Cour Impériale attended to receive his appeal, after which he was removed to the prison La Roquette, where the condemned are kept until the day of execution.

We read in the Constitutionnel of two accidents by fire, both of which contain a practical warning. The first, which was fortunately attended by no serious results, occurred at Antwerp. A lighted cigar was dropped upon a lady's dress as she was seated in a carriage; the muslin caught fire, and terrified her to such an extent that she jumped out of the carriage and bruised herself considerably. Luckily the bystanders were able to extinguish the flames speedily. In these careless days, when lighted tobacco is as common an object on the pavement as even the muslin dresses, such a warning should be seriously regarded.

The other accident was not less the consequence of carelessness, but its results were most appalling. A flame was allowed to approach too near to a large bottle of benzine, the spirit distilled from petroleum; the spirit caught fire, burst the bottle, and covered the two persons nearest to it with flames. The father of one of them, named Couchot, ran forward to save his son, but was only involved in the same fate. Streaming with fire he rushed to the door; the lock was hampered, and resisted all his efforts; he then leaped out of window, and was caught by some neighbours, who with difficulty succeeded in extinguishing the flames. In the meantime the room had caught fire; it contained, besides the victims already mentioned, a woman and three children, the wife and family of one of them. All the furniture was now blazing; their only hope was that the door might give way; all attempts from within were useless; at last it yielded to the vigorous blows of a neighbour from without, and the wretched family were rescued from the fiery furnace. All the sufferers were immediately taken to the hospital, but small hopes are entertained of their recovery.

The splendour of the day of the Prix de Diane at Chantilly was eclipsed by the magnificence of the French Derby day. Never on that beautiful course were seen larger multitudes, more lovely toilets, or a stronger desire for speculation. Four races besides the great event were decided, but none of them require peculiar comment. The Prix du Jockey Club, which is on the whole not unworthy to be called by the sobriquet of its great English prototype, offered this year a reward of 51,100 francs to the fortunate winner, and such a prize deserved to be regarded with considerable attention. The entrance-money for the stake is 1,000 francs, with forfeits varying from 600 francs to 500 francs, according to the date of declaration. Fifty-five horses were nominated, and thirteen came to the post. The distance is precisely the same as the course at Epsom, namely, one mile and a half. M. H. Delamarre's Bois Roussel, by the Nabob, out of Agar, was made first favourite, M. de Morny's Ninon de l'Enclos being next in popular estimation; and Commeça, by Collingwood, out of Coqueluche, the property of Count de Lagrange, was also backed heavily. Bayard, the stable companion of Nimon de Flandre, at out the running at a good pace, attended by Rose-nut and Scævola, the favourite and Nimon de Flandre heading the ruck. Civility, the property of M. T. Carter, a filly by the Flying Dutchman, out of Honesty, being several lengths in the rear. At the distance Fervente and M. H. Lamel's Affidavit singled themselves out, the former having slightly the advantage, which he retained to the end, finally winning by half a length. Civility was third, two lengths from Affidavit, and Pondrette, the property of M. Shickler, was fourth. The winner was ridden by Flatman. The horses were below the average in point of quality.

The War Hopeless.—We are convinced that neither Mr Lincoln nor any man of his Cabinet believes that, under the exasperating policy now pursued, the Federal arms will accomplish even a military triumph of a decisive nature. The war is now being prosecuted for partisan purposes, and every death-blow that is struck is murder. There is not in Washington a single representative of a foreign power that does not consider the war virtually hopeless to the object that its authors cannot be opposed. We are reckoning that a political reaction may have the deplorable effect of concealing this truth, but how is it that the people have lost the manhood to endure it? There is no shame in having failed to subdue our own countrymen, fighting as we have done with the whole of their resources against our arms. Our soldiers have earned the record of their valour in their best blood upon many battle-fields. It is no disgrace to them that the intrigues of political aspirants and the mean jealousy of tyrants in power have paralysed the military arm. But it will be a lasting disgrace to the people if they permit these intrigues and faults to prolong the war for their own purposes with financial ruin and political confusion as its merciful consequence and no single hope by its agency of restoring the severed Union. It is enough of shame that a general of the North should carry the torch in the van of his army, and leave ashes and desolation in its rear, practising Attila and preaching Tamerlane.—New York Daily News, April 28.

A Yankee Speculation.—It is stated in the Boston Journal that the subscription books of the American Artificial Limb Company are open at the First National Bank, 11 State Street. Several of our wealthy citizens and capitalists have subscribed largely for stock in this enterprise, one individual taking $30,000, another gentleman, who has worn an artificial leg for nearly fifteen years, subscribed for $10,000, and other similar amounts have been subscribed for. It will be remembered that this enterprise possesses features seldom or never seen in any stock company, viz. a guaranteed eight per cent. stock on a deposit of United States securities. This, together with a prospect that the dividends will more than double this amount, renders the investment a very desirable one. The immense Government patronage secured, and the broad field of civil practice so long and so successfully covered, with a patronage increasing by the inevitable casualties of war, must give an amount of business that will be measured only by the ability of the manufacturers to supply. Special permission has been granted by the War Department to manufacture limbs for the rebels. The arm business has already assumed large proportions, and orders are now so numerous that it will require at least two months to meet the present demand. The facts thus given will enable all interested in so rich a field of investment and enterprise to understand the basis upon which the business is to be conducted.'

An Exhausted People.—We are playing a terrible game. Half of the people of the North are 'stock mad,' and bubble companies are increasing daily. We are preparing for a crash which will startle Europe: for, when it does come, it is not the people merely that will break, but it is the Government also. Greenbacks are sinking in value daily, and the cost of the necessaries of life is increasing fearfully. The huge tax-bill now being prepared in Congress will grind out of labour 'four hundred millions per year.' I should say it will attempt this feat, but labour cannot respond, and this huge tax-bill will fail in its operations. The rich State of Ohio has already commenced to grieve over her prospects. Wait; if you groan now, what will you do when peace is declared, and the whole domain, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, from the great lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, prostrate from exhaustion, is as silent as the grave? A leading Ohio journal says:—'How can we raise the enormous taxes? A family of six persons will pay $72 per year. The average earnings of the people are not over $75 per year each, and one-sixth, therefore, of all we create, must go to support the damnable Lincoln war dynasty.' To pay her share to-day of this war debt, Ohio would have to part with one-third of her property. Every individual in that State would have to give up one-third of his possessions. Carry on the war four years longer, and it would eat up every dollar.—New York Day Book.

The Irish in the United States.—There is something very significant in the cessation of abuse on the part of New York Know-nothings towards foreigners. The latter are welcomed when they arrive, not as competitors for high wages, but as food for Confederate powder. 'The German and Irish millions,' says Emerson, 'have a great deal of guano in their destiny. They are ferried over the Atlantic and carted over America, to ditch and to drudge, to make corn cheap, and then to lie down prematurely to make a spot of green grass on the prairie.' Just now there is more terrible truth in that hard saying than when it was written. The Irishman is the negro of the North, but he is not so well taken care of because he does not cost so much. It cannot surely be long before our emigrants discover the nature of the bourne which they seek.—The Realm.

Miscegenation.—A new edition of the pamphlet on miscegenation, advocating the amalgamation of the white and black races in America, and the prosecution of the war for that purpose, is advertised, with the following extract from a letter of Parker Pillsbury, a New England preacher and Abolition lecturer, to the author:—'Your work has cheered and gladdened a winter morning. You are on the right track. Pursue it, and the good God speed you! All the mysteries of the wondrous apocalypse now unfolding in our country are not even dreamed of yet, and I hail your work as a true prophecy.'

The Late Hostilities in Virginia.—The Boston Courier, commenting on the news to the 10th, says: 'The summary of the news from the army of the Potomac appears to be, that it received a very heavy blow from Lee's army, as shown by our losses and the absence of any details of substantial advantages gained by us.' The same journal considers it significant that Grant's cypher despatch to the War Department could not be clearly translated.

PARIS TOPICS.

Paris, May 21.

In the hall at Longchamps yesterday [illegible] the last day of the Lent season, [illegible] the end of the last week [illegible] the course of events in America. [illegible] Before the latter is long and we [illegible] the preponderance of the military [illegible] Mr Lincoln's Government. [illegible] the dead by the impartial [illegible] change and [illegible] France began to appreciate the [illegible] and South than the war [illegible] Every day did not wait for further details to [illegible] the victory which [illegible] Mr Lincoln [illegible] God for a [illegible] the tenth of [illegible] made no [illegible] of the war. The Patrie declares that [illegible] the accident, and as both [illegible] friends need be [illegible] by the most extensively circulated of the evening papers, I send you some extracts on this [illegible]

'The news from America received to-day is of the highest importance. Every one knows the [illegible] the last despatches from New York led us to expect. The advance of the Federal troops has been rapid, and [illegible] the greater resistance of the Southern armies. It is true that the despatches, which will be found in another part of our paper, are worded so as to make it seem that the victory was divided between the North and South, between the Federal General Grant and the Confederate General Lee. But it is precisely because these accounts (of Northern origin, be it observed) do not attribute a complete victory to the Northern Generals, that we are authorised by numerous precedents to believe that the cause of the Union has met with a terrible reverse which it will hardly get over.

'It is well known that the situation at Washington is such that it was not a half-success, but rather two victories, which General Grant required. These two victories he has not gained, though on the days of the 5th and 6th he bore the shock of battle valiantly . . . After the numerous successes obtained of late by the Confederates, the events from the 5th to the 10th of May are very serious for the North, and must have a decided influence on the result of the American war. The Federal Government had collected, under General Grant's orders, its finest army and its best generals. This army is vanquished, its generals utterly defeated, and the North has nothing left but the frightful obstinacy which has induced it to pursue an unjust struggle, but it is probable that this obstinacy itself must soon give way.'

The Evening Moniteur, which, as an official paper, gives expression to no opinion, indicates sufficiently the importance which Government attaches to these events, by printing in extenso the last telegrams, and accompanying them by a map of the theatre of war. This morning's edition contents itself with a colourless résumé of the telegrams. The atrabilious Débats blames alike the Te Deums sung by either side, suggesting that it would be better to address themselves rather to the Prince of Peace than to the Lord of Hosts, and oddly explaining the meaning of the counsel by saying that the Confederates should beg for the spirit which would prevent their persisting in a false career, but the Federals for the order and discipline which alone secure victory. Even this one-sided view serves to show that while they deny they believe in the Confederate success. The Constitutionnel expresses its fears that the new Federal defeat is only a fresh effusion of blood not calculated to lead to any results.

Herr von Beust has made his long-expected visit, and after being immediately received by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, and by the Emperor on the day after his arrival, was invited to dine at the Tuileries. The Danish representative at the Conference, M. Krieger, arrived last night, and leaves again to-morrow. It is very generally believed here that the Emperor has arranged terms which will be accepted by all parties independently of the labours of the Conference, but there is for this no evidence at present before the public. The rumour is grounded on the frequent communications which have lately passed between this Court and those of Vienna and Berlin, and on the visits of the two diplomatists. In the general belief that the Conference must prove abortive, and the unwillingness to think that the war can be renewed, people have imagined this Deus ex machâ sort of solution as offering a forlorn hope.

The Court is preparing to leave this for Fontainebleau so soon as the Chamber is closed, and the last few days in Paris have been eventless, except for lovers of sport; and with the Derby and Oaks in prospect, even for them the Chantilly Derby ran last Sunday, and the cricket-match played at the end of the week between the Paris and Nottingham elevens, present nothing very exciting.

I cannot conclude this short note without again quoting from the Patrie. In this evening's leader it returns to the American news and says: 'English papers whose Northern sympathies are known pretended that neither party gained an advantage, but the impression caused by the private letters brought by the Europa is the same in London as in Paris. Public opinion acknowledges that Grant has suffered the most terrible defeat which has yet marked the American struggle.' The Patrie also of this date reminds its readers that the Federals were at least three to two.

News has arrived this evening of the death of Marshal Pelissier, Governor-General of Algeria and Duke of Malakoff.

Federal Taxation.—The whole taxing scheme of the present Congress is one that will destroy the credit of the Government. The Congress dare not impose taxes upon those who are possessed of the property to pay them, but they invent a long and complicated list of indirect taxes which consumers may or may not pay. In ordinary times, when the enterprises of peace are in full play, such enormous indirect taxes as are imposed cannot be collected at all. They are only bounties to smugglers, and with a frontier line such as that of the United States, is smuggling to be stopped when such enormous premiums are given to carry it on, and in face of the experience of England, which could not prevent smuggling even in her sea-girt and iron-bound coast, no larger than New York? The experience of foreign statesmen is such that the pranks of Congress will only inspire contempt and utterly destroy the national credit.—New York News.

NOT A CASE FOR MR. BRIGHT.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—I happened to be at the offices of the Southern Independence Association this morning when a gentleman well known in the Manchester trade called in to see whether any answer to the following communication

Has come to a subscriber, had of late years an extensive connexion with Boston, New York, and other cities in that country, but who was by the war entirely deprived of his business, and who came to this country to find himself a prisoner in the army of the Potomac, and take up his abode in the city of Washington, and comfortable position of prisoner of war at Richmond. During the unbounded services of Mr Bright for the last [illegible] and constantly as neither a secret Federalist nor a political opportunist, but one [illegible] of peace through the [illegible] of the South, [illegible] to the [illegible] to [illegible] to [illegible] Mr Lincoln [illegible] and [illegible] Richmond.

As I had to leave during the conversation, I do not know what advice he received from the officials of the Independence Association, and am I correct in what any those gentlemen could be of service to him; but it occurred to me that possibly a few lines briefly stating the case to the Editor of the Index might, in some chance way, do a little good, and hence this note.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Well-Wisher.

Manchester, May 24.

GLEANINGS FROM CONFEDERATE NEWSPAPERS.

The Condition of General Johnston's Army.—A correspondent of the Mobile Advertiser who is with the army of Tennessee writes: 'The condition of our army is splendid in every respect. It is well fed, well clad, in excellent health, and in high and hopeful spirits. For the first time in its history it has no barefoot soldiers. I have a firm faith in the future of the army of Tennessee and its great captain. Let him but be unfettered, and furnished with adequate means and all will be well. He is very fortunate in having such thorough soldiers as Hood and Hardee, and Stewart and Cleburne to direct his columns and execute his orders.'

An Incident of the Florida Campaign.—The Savannah News relates an instance of negro loyalty to their masters and their country. Before the defeat at Olustee a body of Federals, in passing through the village of Stark, were cheered by a negro boy named Calvin, who was known as a fond belonging to his master, Mr W. C. Temple. Calvin, knowing them to be enemies, continued industriously to ply his hoe until the troops had passed, when he enquired of some negroes in the rear: 'Is there any more of them coming?' The negroes replied, 'Oh, yes, plenty of them.' When they had gone some distance Calvin dropped his hoe, and, taking to his heels, leaped the fence and was soon out of sight. But the object of the faithful fellow was not only to secure his own safety. He ran immediately to the house of Mr. John M'Kinty, and notified a picket of eight soldiers and two deserters of the approach of the Yankees just in time for them to make their escape. It was long after twelve o'clock at night, he walked six miles to Mr. Dupree's, the Railroad Master, and informed him of the approach of the enemy in time to enable him to send to Gainesville thirty-two miles before daylight, and have the rolling stock of the road removed out of their reach.'

Capture of a Federal Gunboat by Land Forces.—The following official despatch was received at the Confederate War Department:—

'To General S. Cooper.

'Demopolis, Alabama, April 28.

'Brigadier-General Wirt Adams, commanding cavalry on the Yazoo River, telegraphs me from Yazoo City, on 22nd inst., to this effect: "I have the honour to report the capture of a gunboat (the Petrel) to-day, near the city, while lying near the shore. She was attacked by a section of artillery and a detachment of sharpshooters, under Colonel Griffin, who drove the men from two guns, and finally the crew from the boat. I removed her fine armament of eight 24-pounder guns and the most valuable stores, and had her burned to the water's edge. The captain and pilot are prisoners in my hands, and a number of the crew. My casualties are small.

'L. Polk, Lieutenant-General.'

General Wirt Adams has, with the permission of President Davis, presented the armament taken from the Petrel to the Confederate Navy. The gallant General writes: 'It will be my cordial satisfaction to arm this small, but possibly useful, contribution to an arm of the service which, with means and appropriations, has achieved results so important and beneficial to our country and cause.'

General W. E. Jones's Brigade.—The Lynchburg Republican thus summarises the result of the recent four campaign of this corps: 'The fruits of these engagements have been 1,767 prisoners, between 400 and 500 of the enemy killed and wounded, 152 wagons, 7 pieces of artillery, and about 2,000 horses and mules. All this has been done during an unusually severe winter, without tents, without comfortable clothing, almost shoeless, and with horses worn down by constant use and scarcity of forage.'

The Richmond Enquirer announces the arrival in the Confederate States of Commander W. L. Maury, of the Confederate steamer Georgia.

The Hon. R. F. W. Alston, ex-Governor of South Carolina, died on April 19, at his plantation on the Pee Dee River.

Fort Sumter.—An Augusta paper says that Captain J. C. Mitchell, a son of the Irish exile Mr. John Mitchell, is in command of Sumter during the temporary absence of Lieutenant-Colonel Elliott.

Preaching in Theatres.—The Richmond Sentinel says that on Friday, April 8, the Richmond Theatre was crowded to excess to hear a sermon from the Rev. Dr. J. L. Burrows, of the First Baptist Church.

De Bow's Review will reappear next July. It is to be published by Messrs. Evans & Cogswell, of Columbia, South Carolina.

THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.
MESSAGE OF PRESIDENT DAVIS.

(From the Richmond Whig, May 4.)

The message of President Davis, as was to be supposed, considering the short time which has elapsed since the adjournment of the last Congress, is not a very long document; yet, short as it is, it will be found, we think, to embrace all the important topics which it was to be presumed would be presented for the consideration of Congress. It is, likewise, marked by that purity as well as energy of diction which characterise all the productions of the Executive pen.

The President, speaking ex cathedra, tells us that he sees no prospect of an early change in the course heretofore pursued by those (the European) Governments. In his words, which are true enough and forcible enough to commend themselves to every citizen of the Confederacy—'It is enough for us to know that every avenue of negotiation is closed against us; that our enemy is making renewed and strenuous efforts for our destruction; and that the sole resource for us, as a people secure in the justice of our cause, and holding our liberties to be more precious than all other earthly possessions, is to combine and apply every available element of power for their defence and preservation.'

On the subject of the currency the President refers to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. We infer that that officer will ask Congress to relieve him of the power which he supposes to be conferred by the existing law, of issuing currency to the full amount of all received into the Treasury, either by funding or exchange. It is very justly said that the currency in circulation, say $230,000,000 on July 1, is ample for the business requirements of the country, and that the addition of $200,000,000 would be attended by disastrous effects, and would produce the speedy recurrence of the evils from which the funding law has rescued the country. We are glad to know that the Secretary takes this view of the subject; and we hope Congress will do something to relieve the unfortunate gentleman of the weight of power which so sorely oppresses him.

We are likewise glad to learn that the efficiency of our armies in the field is all that can be desired; and that 'the scipline and instruction of the troops have kept pace with their improvement in material and equipment.'

Various recommendations, contained in the report of the Secretary of War, are recapitulated by the President. Among the subjects referred to are an amendment of the law depriving officers in the field of the privilege of purchasing rations; an increase in the allowance of officers travelling under orders; provision for invalid officers resigned in consequence of wounds or sickness; the tenure of office of general officers of the provisional army; the organisation of the general staff of the army, &c.

The recapitulation of the recent successes of our army is sufficiently encouraging, and we cannot, perhaps, do better than to quote the paragraph in which it is contained:—

'The recent events of the war are highly creditable to our troops, exhibiting energy and vigilance combined with the habitual gallantry which they have taught us to expect on all occasions. We have been cheered by important and valuable successes in Florida, Northern Mississippi, Western Tennessee and Kentucky, Western Louisiana and Eastern North Carolina, reflecting the highest honour on the skill and conduct of our commanders, and on the incomparable soldiers whom it is their privilege to lead. A naval attack on Mobile was so successfully repulsed at the outer works that the attempt was abandoned; and the nine months' siege of Charleston has been practically suspended, leaving the noble city and its fortress imperishable monuments to the skill and fortitude of its defenders. The armies in Northern Georgia and Northern Virginia still oppose, with unshaken front, a formidable barrier to the progress of the invader; and our generals, armies, and people are animated by cheerful confidence.'

There is a passage in the message which deserves more than casual notice. He calls attention to the fact that the Congress under the provisional Government held four sessions, and the first Congress of the permanent Government also held four sessions, and now the second Congress under the permanent Government is assembled at the time and place appointed by law:—

'All these events have passed into history, notwithstanding the threat of our prompt subjugation made three years ago by a people that presume to assert a title to govern States whose separate and independent sovereignty was recognised by treaty with France and Great Britain in the last century, and remained unquestioned for nearly three generations. Yet these very Governments, in disregard of duty and treaty obligations which bind them to recognise as independent Virginia and other Confederate States, persist in countenancing by moral influence, if not in aiding by unfair and partial action, the claim set up by the executive of a foreign Government to exercise despotic sway over the States thus recognised, and treat the invasion of them by their former [illegible] as though it were the attempt of a sovereign to suppress a rebellion against lawful authority.'

Letter from Wendell Phillips.—Judge Stallo: Dear Sir,—Since you asked my judgment as to the course to be taken in nominating a candidate for the Presidency, I have been requested to sign a call for a convention for that purpose, to meet at Cleveland in May next. Let me tell you the national policy I advocate. Subdue the South as rapidly as possible. The moment territory comes under our flag, reconstruct States thus: Confiscate and divide the lands of rebels; extend the right of suffrage broadly as possible to whites and blacks; let the Federal Constitution prohibit slavery throughout the Union, and forbid the States to make any distinction among their citizens on account of colour or race. I shall make every effort to have this policy pursued. Believing that the present Administration repudiates it, and is carrying us to a point where we shall be obliged either to acknowledge the Southern Confederacy or to reconstruct the Union on terms grossly unjust, intolerable to the masses, and sure soon to result in another war, I earnestly advise an unpledged and independent convention, like that proposed, to consider public affairs and nominate for the Presidency a statesman and a patriot. Yours faithfully, Wendell Phillips.—Boston, April 21.

The Treasury Investigation.—Colonel Baker, who investigated Mr. Clark's department in the Treasury, has laid before the committee a mass of information of the most astounding character in regard to Mr. Clark's operations. The depositions of some ten women were read—some of them are now employed in the department—which are wholly unfit for publication. It was also shown that the entire responsibility of the issue of greenbacks and currency of the country rests with this man, and there is not now, nor has there ever been, any check upon him.—Correspondent of the New York World.

Act Aug. 19, 1861—General currency	154,356.631 00
Act April 19, 1862—Ones and twos	4,516,509 00
Act Oct. 13, 1862—General currency	118,997,321 50
Act March 23, 1863—General currency	511,182,566 50

From these two statements it appears that $177,022.960 50 of the non-interest-bearing issues have been redeemed and cancelled. This amount includes only such notes as have been regularly cancelled and destroyed in pursuance of warrants from the Treasury. There are always in the hands of the depositaries notes not yet reported for destruction. We have heard the amount thus held at present, apart from the four per cent. funding, estimated at ten millions.

There is but little doubt that the funding, east and west of the Mississippi, will amount to three hundred millions. The total issue outstanding March 31 is thereby reduced say to $485,000,000. Of this, a considerable portion, probably a hundred millions, is in hundred dollar notes. Excluding these, we have $385,000,000 left; of which, the issues of five dollars and under amount to $90.969.893 50. Suppose $85,000,000 of these are now in circulation, and we have for all others $300,000,000, which the tax of one-third has reduced to $200,000,000. The total circulation at the present time, irrespective of the new issue, is, therefore, largely less than three hundred millions, and of this a considerable amount is always to be found in the hands of the disbursing officers and depositaries.

Fading Hopes.—The Boston Courier (April 23) takes the following gloomy view of Federal prospects:—'The day is past in which even the most sanguine can see in every victory of our arms "the backbone of the rebellion" broken. Our armies have won many great victories, "decisive victories," as they were styled at the time; we have occupied a large but scattered extent of Confederate territory, and have even instituted military or decimal governments over such portions as lie within our lines; but all with no other result, as now publicly confessed by the more sagacious supporters of the Administration, than the extension of our own lines, and the shortening of those of the enemy. No one with any real knowledge pretends to say that the relative military strength of the South, as compared with our own, has been materially lessened by all our superhuman exertions, lavish expenditures, and seeming victories. There is evidence that the South is to-day actually stronger than at any previous time, more united, and more firmly resolved to maintain its independence. We believe that such is the fact. We see no evidences of despair, no marks of waning resolution or exhausted resources in all that comes to us from the belaguered States. Nothing but a firmness and calmness that border on contempt meets all our preparations and the threatening position of our armies. Meantime, reckless expenditure, profligacy in every department of the Government, dishonesty and incompetency everywhere, in civil and military administration alike, are working the certain ruin of the nation, and hurrying on the day when the scaffolding of Government credit which alone supports the war, long overburdened, will topple and fall. How long will it take for Lee and Johnston, then, to recover, from armies unsupplied and unsupported, the territories which, with such expenditure of strength and money, they now hold only with the utmost difficulty? The war as conducted is too great for us, and not for us only, but for any people upon earth. Failure is the necessary element of its very conditions, and no victories are sufficient to alter those, and turn the scale in our favour.'

Is the War Popular in the United States?—This question is answered in a logical and forcible article in the New York Daily News, a portion of which we copy:—'We have only to contemplate the simple and naked facts, that with a population three times that of the States at war with us, and a fighting population proportionately much larger—with bounties proffered, such as never tempted cupidity in any war before—we are compelled to seduce foreigners from their homes to fight our battles for pay, and are driven to the still more degrading necessity of committing the honour of our flag and the vindication of our manhood to the hands of negroes, bond and free. Not the relentless grasp of a most merciless and unconstitutional conscription, nor the seduction of bounties large enough to make a poor man's fortune, can now drag or entice American citizens, except in numbers absolutely insignificant, to fight the battles of this war. It is insolent, as well as idle and absurd, to talk of the "popularity" of any war which can command no warmer support than this from a brave and impulsive people. If the hearts of the people were in the war, they themselves would be in the field to fight to the death. If they sincerely believed it to be a war in which they ought to offer themselves as a sacrifice, they would crowd to the very horns of the altar, with threat or bribe. That they shrink from the contest—that they will devote all the little earnings of their lives to purchase exemption—that they cannot be tempted or forced into the ranks while there is any escape—all these things tell the story. The people do not feel any longer that the war is their war. They may support it for a little while because the Government is waging it and the flag is waved over it. Some of them may be willing it should continue, because it pays themselves or their friends large profits, or keeps up their influence, or advances their party, or flatters their vanity, or gratifies their rancour. But the great current of public feeling and opinion runs in its favour no longer. It has now no hold on public enthusiasm. Its popularity is dead!'

MEXICO, AND EUROPEAN RECOGNITION.

(From the Richmond Sentinel, April 26.)

The action of the Powers of Europe in reference to the two newly installed Governments in America has been grossly inconsistent and contradictory. The Confederate States have made comparatively but little change in their political organism. They have retained their State Governments in all their integrity, and they have made but few alterations in the articles and conditions of State confederation. They have merely reduced the number of those with whom they met in general council. They have but lessened the scope of their late alliance, and retired from those with whom they could no longer act in concert or live in peace. Their separate existence has been assailed by force of arms for three years; and for three years the nations of Europe have sat by, refusing to recognise us, refusing to hold intercourse with us: and this, not because they deny the justice of our action, or withhold from us their sympathies, but because they plead that international honour and duty require them to remain aloof until the war against us shall be abandoned by the enemy. Their own rulers do not hesitate to declare that Lincoln has no prospect of subduing us; that he has entered upon an impossible undertaking; but they hold it a point of international principle not to act upon their own judgment, but upon his; and to withhold their recognition of us, and treat the result of the war as in doubt, until Lincoln himself shall lose all hope, and his passions become exhausted.

But how do these same Powers act in regard to the new Empire of Mexico? It has been but a few months, comparatively, since the French arms invaded that country. Their banners have been successful, but the war is by no means ended, and the subjugation is far from complete. Determined chieftains, with numerous followers, still keep the field. Maximilian has not so much as taken his seat on his throne, or set his foot upon Napoleon's gift. He has yet to see for the first time the shores of the country upon which he has been imposed. He will find his authority disputed and defied from the very first. He will have no season of jubilation, no honeymoon, on his accession. He will have to address himself to war to get possession of his kingdom, and even to retain his seat. The people whom he is to call his subjects have notoriously a weak stomach for rulers of any kind. They are exceedingly addicted to revolutionary pronunciamentos at all times, and rarely endure the same chief for two harvests. Maximilian is going to take his seat upon a volcano. Yet this going-to-be king, over a country which he has never seen, and which is at war against him, is recognised, without a day's delay, by the Powers of Europe—by the same Governments that hold recognition in our case as inadmissible and improper!

It is impossible to reconcile such contrary proceedings, or to excuse the injustice which the nations of Europe have displayed towards the Confederate States. It will stand as a reproach to them upon the page of history; and whether instigated by the fell desire to see the American Confederacies destroy each other, or inspired by the bullyism of Seward, himself a craven, their conduct is alike without any feature calculated to propitiate respect, or reconcile us to its injustice. The action in the case of Mexico dishonours and refutes the pretext advanced as to the Confederate States; and forces us to look to the natural effect of their treatment to us, or to a cowering under the threats from Washington, for the motive which prompts it. Shame itself must force these Powers to take a more creditable attitude.

A House Divided against Itself.—Mr. Phillips says only five United States Senators are in favour of Mr. Lincoln's re-election, and among those are not Sumner and Wilson. Mr. Blair accuses the Secretary of the Treasury of gross misdeeds; says the department is rotten with corruption, and that this is so palpable that the friends of Mr. Chase dare not call for investigation. Fremont declares that he has been badly treated by the Administration, and pouts. The Gratz Brown Radicals smite the President as Samson did the Philistines, hip and thigh. General Banks is derided by the Republicans in Massachusetts. The Springfield Republican asks, 'Is lying a vice inherent in republican institutions, or merely incidental to Mr. Lincoln's administration?' Thaddeus Stevens says, if the Government go on expending money at the present rate, the people will be involved in one general bankruptcy and ruin. Thurlow Weed writes to the Albany Evening Journal, 'Until the Administration thoroughly sifts and probes the iniquities of the New York Custom House, the people will be justified in enquiring whether their treasure and blood shall continue to flow, by millions and in rivers, while its own officials are playing into the hands of the enemy.' Senator Pomeroy says, that should Mr. Lincoln be reelected, the affairs of the country will go on from bad to worse in his hands, and the war will languish until our public debt will overwhelm us. Mr. Boutwell denounces the President's plan of reconstruction; Winter Davis charges the President with acting without law, and Miss Dickenson boxes the ears of Mr. Seward. The persons here named are all Republicans, if not all 'honourable men.'—Boston Post.

'Peace Devils.'—A Republican paper having applied this epithet to those who do not believe in the doctrine of Fraternité ou la mort, the New York Daily News says:—'If peace men are devils, it follows that war men are saints, and we may soon expect to hear the President styled "his holiness," and his Secretaries "right reverends." General Butler will be addressed as Saint Benjamin, and McNeil and Turchin hereafter known as holy fathers. If peace men are to be turned over to his satanic majesty, it would seem that a better destiny awaits the advocates of war; and it may be that this new doctrine is to be preached this summer to reconcile the people to the war, and keep the war party in power. Who knows? We shall soon, at this rate, hear of thievish integrity, truthful lying, affectionate murder, pious wickedness, and honest stealing; or, what is very likely, of white-black men and black-white men. Such is the evident tendency of Black Federalism.'

Bull and Bullion.—A writer in the Boston Courier makes the following suggestion:—'It is very strange that Congress and Mr. Chase have never discovered the main cause why it now takes $175 in greenbacks to buy $100 in gold. It is plainly owing to the obstinacy of that old copperhead, John Bull, who persists, in this enlightened age, when we are fighting for freedom and the cause of mankind, in refusing to consider them a 'legal tender,' and as good as his Bank of England whitebacks, and will not buy our ten-forty loan at about 50 cents on the dollar. This is insulting, and Congress ought to take the matter up, and let Father Abraham at once issue a proclamation against Mr. Bull, confiscating all his property for his disloyalty, and send General Butler over there to execute it and hang a few Bulls and Roebucks.'

THE DERBY.

The eighty-fifth anniversary of this far-famed race was celebrated yesterday with the splendour, tumult, and wild joviality inseparable from the greatest of all festivities. Assuredly within the recollection of men who have not passed the middle age, no Derby had offered so wide a field of speculation, had so racked and wearied the feverish brains of the searchers into futurity, or had given such promise of competitors worthy of the prize. Men who had gazed on the forms and watched the action of their own idols, had spread abroad the sound of their unrivalled virtues, had extolled victories and extenuated defeats, until the imagination pictured a squadron of horses all capable of achieving the great task. Even the calm sagacity of bookmakers seemed for once at fault, and took refuge in the expedient of estimating the quality of the animals by the most gradual of sliding scales. Indeed, of the dozen horses that commanded attention, two had proved their excellence a few weeks since at Newmarket. The remainder boasted of laurels won many months ago, or built up their fame on the rumour of private success.

It is impossible here to tell again the thrice-told story of the adventures of the road, to repeat for the hundredth time the futile struggles of the overloaded jades, the ugly pranks of the untamed brutes condemned to the hated yoke by the exigencies of the hour, to applaud the white dresses, the pink and blue bonnets of the thousand belles, or to laugh at the extravagancies of the 'thorough-bred' cockney on his own high and holy day. It is enough to say that the throng of visitors was great beyond precedent, that the trains were crowded beyond imagination with passengers, and that the road was so blocked with carriages and horses that it seemed rather a device for checking progress than a means for facilitating locomotion.

Our business is rather with the true object of the day, the race itself, and to that and its concomitant circumstances we yield devotion. From the earliest arrivals on the scene of action, the wagering commenced with activity; and inasmuch as no mishaps were reported, the state of the market did not greatly vary from the condition of the past week. The odds at starting were 9 to 2 against General Peel, 5 to 1 against Scottish Chief, 13 to 2 against Birch Broom, 7 to 1 against Cambuscan, 100 to 8 against Paris, 100 to 7 against Blair Athol, 20 to 1 against Coast Guard and Ely, and 30 to 1 against Baragah. Of the weather and the scene it is enough to say that the sun shone with splendour on the immense mass of human beings which bounded the length of the course from the Corner to the Stand as with a living wall, and occupied the hill and every point of observation.

For the sake of those to whose fortune it has not fallen to visit Epsom—for 'non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum'—it may be right to describe in a brief sentence the form of the Epsom race-course. The running-ground there may be best compared in shape to a siphon; and if it be imagined that the horses start at the end of the shorter leg, and that the winning post is situated at the end of the longer leg, a just idea will be obtained. The character of the ground is most trying to the limbs and the endurance of the horse. For the first six furlongs a stout hill must be climbed; then ensues a rather ugly turn and a descent of considerable steepness; and from the hollow the ground again rises in a gradual but decided incline to the end of the course. The ugly turn is known to all the world as Tattenham Corner, and it is exactly at that point that the horses gain the straight, and burst upon the view of the spectators in the stands. The length of the course is one mile and a half.

Some fifteen minutes before three o'clock the course was cleared, and the noble troop of horses paraded in front of the Grand Stand. As they walked and cantered, the stately step and sweeping stride of each was eagerly scanned, and men came to the conclusion that seldom has Epsom seen so magnificent a company of Derby candidates. If nimble movement and the most perfect elegance of form was to prevail, then there was hope that Mr. R. Ten Broeck would triumph, to the glory of Tennessee, with the beautiful Paris, the son of Mildew and Daisy. But the wise men said that Paris could not endure beyond the distance of one mile, and that when he nearly reached the great General Peel at Newmarket, he had performed the highest feat of his life. Birchbroom looked a fine slashing fellow, and Ely reproduced to the eye the form of his true-shaped sire, the illustrious Kingston. The vaunted Baragah, the pet of the Wizard of the North, the son of Stockwell and Mowerina, and therefore uterine brother to the invincible West Australian, seemed to justify rather the event of the race than the flourish of trumpets with which it had been announced that the prize would go to John Scott of Whitewall, just as it did of old with Daniel O'Rourke. For Baragah, to our eye, was but a moderate animal when stationary, and an indifferent galloper when in action. So, too, Mr. Nayler had threatened to repeat the success of 1863, and to reproduce Maccaroni in the form of Coastguard. The latter certainly had size enough, and indeed bore a resemblance to a walking castle or an ironclad under steam. But when he galloped his knees threatened to strike his nose, and plainly declared that he would not win the Derby. The Scottish Chief pleased his backers in every respect, and animated them with the hope of a second Thormanby. The favourite General Peel was received with a hum of admiration, and he alone, of all the horses, seemed irritated at the noise around him. He fumed and fretted, and swung himself about in a manner quite unbefitting his position as the Derby 'crack,' but his action was admirable, and his grand appearance inspired the utmost confidence. Cambuscan, the son of Newminster and the Arrow, whose value last winter was tested by auction to be more than 5,000*l.*, looked the embodiment of perfection. He was so trim, so cleanly made, he had no superfluity, he skimmed the ground so like a swallow in his flight, there was in him so much of the active and so little of the obstructive, that it seemed that after all the great General Peel would succumb to his more elegant rival. These horses, with others on whom it is unnecessary to dwell, passed up the course, and then by himself came one whom many persons, whose eyes only follow the glitter of the metal coin and never look beyond the favourite, disdained to notice. This horse cantered steadily about two hundred yards, and was slowly led back to the winning-post by a careful attendant. He had not been saddled in the paddock—he had appeared but for a moment and departed again so quickly, there was such an air of mystery about him, that the very secresy drew attention. The horse was Blair Athol. He had never been on a public racecourse before. Rumour had been busy with him, but his character and pretensions were as mysterious as those of the ruler of Thibet. At least his blood was the best in the world. His sire was Stockwell, the noblest horse ever seen since the days of Bellerophon, and so he was the son of a winner of the Two Thousand and St. Leger on that side. Through Stockwell also his pedigree ascended to the Baron, the Birdcatcher, Waxy, Whalebone, and Eclipse. Moreover, his dam was Blink Bonny, the winner of the Derby and the Oaks, the daughter of great Melbourne. If pedigree could win, Blair Athol could not lose. His appearance, too, was magnificent. He stood 16 hands high; he moved gloriously; he had great length; his colour was a beautiful chestnut, and his face was marked with a large white blaze. He turned one foot out just like the good Sir Tatton Sykes, and recalled the famous saying of the Yorkshire Baronet.

The race, however, was now to begin. The starter marshalled the thirty horses to the post. Thousands still enjoyed their picnic, their chicken and champagne, unmoved by the event of the hour. But with thousands whose fate trembled in the balance at that moment, the delirium of hopes and fears through which the mind suffers a delightful torture grew in intensity, and all the forces of desire, confidence, and despair tossed the imagination in wild commotion. Their agony was prolonged by false starts, but at length the word was given. The Warrior, who, if he was to make a show, was put to doing it at the start, jumped off with the lead, with General Peel, Birch Broom, Scottish Chief, and Baragah close to him. At the end of a mile, Ely went to the front, and Coastguard, Cambuscan, Knight of Snowdon, and Blair Athol joined the leading division. In a mass the gallant horses hurled themselves with unrestrained fury round Tattenham Corner, Ely alone yielding to the frightful speed. In a cluster the rest crossed the road at the foot of Tattenham Hill, and General Peel rushed immediately to the front, while shouts of 'Lord Glasgow wins' rent the air. In truth the Scottish Chief, though leading the ruck, was evidently unable to grapple with the General, and at every stride the Two Thousand winner was distancing the field. But his jockey, the admirable Aldcroft, looked over his shoulder with nervous anxiety, for there was still one horse obstinately clinging to the General. It was the mysterious Blair Athol. Three hundred yards from home, his jockey gave him rein. With one grand effort the son of Blink Bonny passed the General gamely struggling to do the terrific pace, and, galloping on with a stoutness nearly miraculous, defeated the favourite with consummate ease by two lengths. Scottish Chief was three lengths from General Peel, and the Knight of Snowdon one length from Scottish Chief. Then followed in order Cambuscan, Birch Broom, Ely, and Historian. The pace was terrific, the time occupied being only 2 min. 44 sec. This speed has been only once exceeded, and that in the year 1861 by Kettledrum, who ran the course in 2 m. 43 sec., when Diophantus and Dundee raced from end to end. It was moreover one second faster than the race won in 1857 by Blink Bonny. Blair Athol is the property of Mr. W. I'Anson, the owner of Blink Bonny, Caller-ou, and Borealis, and was trained at Malton in Yorkshire. He is entered for the Grand Prix at Paris, and the Great Doncaster St. Leger.

Fort Pillow.—The truth is, that there was no other massacre at Fort Pillow than the killing of some fifty or a hundred Yankees during the assault; and a Yankee naval officer, in a published letter giving an account of the capture of the fort, of which he was an eye-witness, speaks of the rebels as having displayed great moderation on the occasion. This officer, whose name is N. B. Wetmore, wrote to the Memphis Argus that 'the garrison was so small and the rebel force so overwhelming, that the enemy carried our works about 3·30 P.M., and the gallant few who were left alive, were taken prisoners.' Again he says: 'Major Bradford, commanding the post, was taken prisoner, and is reported by the rebels as having been paroled, with the liberty of their camps, and violated his parole by escaping last night, but I was told that he was taken out and shot.' This is a mere light hearsay that the man was put to death, whilst it is far more probable that he was paroled, and, Yankee-like, broke his pledge and rejoined his countrymen. And again he says: 'Captain Young, Provost Marshal, was taken prisoner, slightly wounded, and paroled, with the liberty of their camps, and allowed to see his wife.' And still again he says: 'We threw shells, &c., for thirty minutes at detached squads. A flag of truce appearing, we ceased firing and sent a boat ashore. It presently returned with a communication from General Forrest, saying that a large number of our wounded were suffering for want of proper care, and that he would allow us to bury our dead and remove our wounded under a flag of truce, but that we should not remove anything from the battle-field. Captain Fergus, on knowing that our shells would explode among our wounded, causing greater loss of life, agreed to the proposal. Major Anderson, Aid to General Forrest, drew up the agreement, giving us possession of the fortifications and landings till 5 P.M., the flag of truce to end at that hour. The rebels were efficient and aided as much as possible our work. The wounded who were able to walk generally came down the bluff-road supported on either side by a rebel soldier.' This is the positive statement of an eye-witness of and participator in the affair, and he a true blue Yankee officer. There is not a word in his letter that charges a massacre of the prisoners, but on the contrary, he represents the conduct of Forrest and his men as having been remarkably kind towards them. And yet all Yankee-doodledom is in a storm of wrath about the matter, and are threatening, with their usual stage vehemence, unutterable things in the way of vengeance. They had as well keep cool and wait until they ascertain the facts in the case, before indulging in such ridiculous rhodomontade. They can act, however, just as they please, and the Confederates will pursue just such a course as will serve to meet, check, and punish any cold-blooded atrocity like that which Lincoln threatens, supposing him to be in earnest.—Petersburg (Virginia) Express, April 28.

The Jackson Statue Movement in England.—A letter received by Governor Smith from Hon. James M. Mason announces that the requisite funds have been raised by the gentlemen of England, who have proposed to present a statue of the lamented Jackson to his fellow-citizens in this country; and enquires whether their solicitude for a becoming disposition of the statue when sent here will be gratified. We doubt not that the choicest spot in Virginia or the Confederacy can be commanded for so interesting a purpose as the erection of a statue worthy of our great man. The Governor will make a suitable response to this tribute to Virginia's famous son from strangers across the water, who ask to join their affectionate admiration to ours.—The Sentinel, April 22.

The Press in New Orleans.—The following significant paragraph from the New Orleans Picayune tells a hard story, and will bear twice reading:—'We are in receipt of several anonymous communications, which, because anonymous, can find no place in our columns. This we rather regret; for some of our volunteer contributors write well—both in a literary and a chirographic point of view—and the subjects they discuss are either purely literary, or such questions of material or social interest as are entirely proper for newspaper discussion. Why, then, the writers withhold their names we cannot imagine.'

GENERAL SHERMAN ON THE RIGHTS OF WAR.

The commander of the Mississippi raid, and of the Federal army in Tennessee, has written a letter to one of his subordinates, from which we copy the following passages. They show the spirit in which the war is conducted by its military leaders.

'The United States, as a belligerent party claiming right in the soil as the ultimate sovereign, have a right to change the population, and it may be and is both politic and just we should do so in certain districts. When the inhabitants persist too long in hostilities, it may be both politic and right we should banish them and appropriate their lands to a more loyal and useful population. No man will deny that the United States would be benefitted by dispossessing a single, prejudiced, hard-headed and disloyal planter, and substitute in his place a dozen or more patient, industrious, good families, even if they be of foreign birth.

'For my own part, I believe that this war is the result of false political doctrine, for which we are all as a people responsible, viz., that any and every people have a right to self-government: and I would give all a chance to reflect, and, when in error, to recant.

'Whilst I assert for our Government the highest military prerogatives, I am willing to bear in patience that political nonsense of slave rights, State rights, freedom of conscience, freedom of press, and such other trash, as have deluded the Southern people into war, anarchy, bloodshed, and the foulest crimes that have disgraced any time or any people.

'The Government of the United States has in North Alabama any and all rights which they choose to enforce in war, to take their lives, their homes, their lands, their everything, because they cannot deny that war does exist there, and war is simply power unrestrained by Constitution or compact. If they want eternal war, well and good—we will accept the issue and dispossess them, and put our friends in possession. I know thousands and millions of good people who, at simple notice, would come to North Alabama and accept the elegant houses and plantations now there. If the people of Huntsville think different, let them persist in war three years longer, and then they will not be consulted. Three years ago, by a little reflection and patience, they could have had a hundred years of peace and prosperity, but they preferred war; very well, last year they could have saved their slaves, but now it is too late—all the powers of earth cannot restore to them their slaves any more than their dead grandfathers. Next year their lands will be taken, for in war we can take them, and rightfully, too, and in another year they may beg in vain for their lives. A people who will persevere in war beyond a certain limit, ought to know the consequences. Many, many people, with less pertinacity than the South, have been wiped out of national existence.

To those who submit to the rightful law and authority, all gentleness and forbearance, but to the petulant and persistent Secessionists, why, death is mercy; and the quicker he or she is disposed of, the better. Satan, and the rebellious saints of heaven, were allowed a continuance of existence in hell merely to swell their just punishment. To such as would rebel against a Government so mild and just as ours was in peace, a punishment equal would not be unjust.

We are progressing well in this quarter. Though I have not changed my opinion, that we may soon assume the existence of our National Government, yet years will pass before ruffianism, murder, and robbery will cease to afflict this region of our country. Truly your friend,

(Signed) W. T. SHERMAN,
Maj.-Gen. Commanding.

Emigration to the United States.—The following letter has been published in the Northern papers:—'United States Consulate, Liverpool, April 22, 1864.—Sir,—I perceive a notice in the papers of a recommendation for an act to encourage emigration from Europe to the United States. This probably will be considered a sufficient excuse for my venturing to call your attention to the matter so far as this port is concerned. Emigration may be said never to have been so active as it is now. It is quite unprecedented. For the past two months all the emigrant vessels from Liverpool to the State, both with steam and sails, have taken emigrants to their utmost capacity. At the present time there are not half enough ships to carry those who want to go. I called this morning on two or three of the leading shipping-houses to ascertain the true state of the business, and will briefly detail what I learned. Inman's steamers—the Liverpool, New York, and Philadelphia line—told me that every passage on all their steamers up to May 18 next is now engaged; and one-half of those of the steamers to sail after this period up to June 1. Guion & Co. and C. Grimshaw & Co., two other large houses, told me that all the passages on their respective vessels to sail between now and June 1 next are already taken, and that they are turning off people every day for want of accommodation; that they are so pressed that they do not know what to do. They have not half vessels enough, and cannot procure them to carry the passengers who want to go. What they say will apply with equal force to all the other shippers at this port. A large proportion of the emigrants have had their passage paid in the States. These have a preference. They have raised the price of their tickets for passage within the last few weeks at least a third higher than they were. All the vessels sailing are filled with passengers, and the only way emigration can now be increased, so far as England and Ireland are concerned, is to increase the means of transportation. One of the houses told me this morning that they could send out fifty thousand emigrants to the States in two months, if they had the ships to carry them. I do not write this with the view of interfering with the passage of the proposed bill to facilitate emigration—it may be quite necessary for the Continent—but merely to put you in possession of the facts as they exist at this place. And I am quite sure that you will rejoice with myself to learn that it is not required for England and Ireland, at least for the present, to encourage emigration.—I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, Thomas H. Dudley.—Hon. William H. Seward, Secretary of State.'

Washington Scandals.—Washington is full of stories of startling developments, certain to be made before the special committee authorised to-day on Treasury Department. Affidavits and witnesses are ready to testify that, in addition to gross frauds, a regular system of prostitution is carried on in the female bureau of the Treasury, with the connivance of its band of officials, and that a code of morals exists, degrading to women as it is repugnant to decency, and calling for the brand of infamy on those at the bottom of it. Many of the female clerks have been secured as witnesses.—New York World

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

The Index was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, The Index has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. The Index does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, The Index is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MAY 26, 1864.

The Fighting in Virginia.

The North has had one great advantage throughout this war. It has told its own story first. Whenever the news of great battles has reached us, it has come to us filtered through Northern sources: we have to wait days, and sometimes weeks, before we can hear the other side; and as the first impression is the strongest it is easy to conceive how much the Federal cause has profited by writing its own history of the war. It is necessary to point this out in commenting upon the recent intelligence from Virginia. Accounts have been received of seven days' awful fighting, of a struggle more desperate than that which drove M'Clellan from the Chickahominy to the James River, of a carnage more awful than the present generation of men ever witnessed, of battle after battle waged from sunrise to sunset; and for the results we are entirely dependent upon Federal correspondence, upon official statements put forward by the Washington authorities, upon unreliable rumours, magnified into positive facts by needy politicians and unscrupulous newsmongers. From the South we have one or two sentences almost barren of interest so far as the result is concerned—a word or two of encouragement from General Lee, a regret for some brave leaders fallen, and that is all. News from the South is withheld, and so is adverse news of any kind. Our readers may imagine how difficult it is to form a just estimate of the movements of the two armies, their objects, and their results, when the one side only narrates what is favourable to its hopes, and the other is altogether silent.

Grant's long-expected advance took place in the early days of the month. On the 4th instant, his army crossed the Rapidan in great force. It combined the three corps d'armée of Generals Hancock, Sedgwick, and Warren; the reserve, consisting nominally of 40,000 men under Burnside, remaining on the north bank. On the 5th, the Confederate army was found in front, and some heavy skirmishing ensued in which two Federal divisions suffered considerably. The morning of the 6th found the two armies in a position covering the direct road from the fords of the Rapidan to Spottsylvania Court House, and at daybreak Grant gave the order for an attack along the whole line. The country in which the battle was fought is most favourable for the army acting on the defensive. Thickly wooded and undulating, it affords little scope for the play of artillery or the cavalry charge, and presents enormous difficulties to the manœuvring of a large force. We may rely upon it that General Lee had made the most of these advantages; that his ground was well chosen for a stand; that his line of retreat was secured; and that an assault successful or unsuccessful cost the enemy dearly. The scene of the engagement was the Wilderness, and there must have been many amongst the veterans on both sides whose lot it had been to contend twelve months before on almost the same ground. Grant's dispositions were simple enough. He disposed his three divisions in a line of some five miles in extent, with Sedgwick on the right, Warren in the centre, Hancock on the left. Burnside had during the night crossed the Rapidan, and his force was held in the reserve on the right, to support Sedgwick. The Federal army attacked at all points and was everywhere repulsed. Two desperate efforts were made to penetrate Lee's lines, but in vain. The Federals were mowed down in their ranks by invisible enemies, and at noon the first fury of the attack had subsided. It was now the turn of the Confederates. Massing his troops in front of the most advanced division of the Federal army, General Hancock's, Lee hurled a powerful force upon his assailants, drove back Hancock's division in disorder, capturing many prisoners, and was only brought up by the Federal entrenchments far in the rear. The first portion of the Confederate army actually penetrated the Federal breastworks and captured one or two whole regiments. The defeat of Hancock on the left involved the left centre in his retrograde movement. Heavily pressed by the Confederates, it also gave ground, and, but for the support of the reserves, would have been routed. Aided by the reserve, the Federals re-formed and eventually drove back their assailants, but the retirement of the left and centre divisions gave Lee an opportunity, of which he was not slow to avail himself. Late in the evening Sedgwick's division was, in its turn, the object of attack. A powerful column advancing on its right flank, bore down upon it, enveloped and overwhelmed it. Brigade after brigade was swept away, two whole brigades were captured, the line was broken, and for an hour or more Grant's whole army was in imminent peril. A panic prevails; there is a rush through the woods for a mile and a half, but the nature of the ground and the closing in of night prevent Lee reaping the whole advantage of his successful charge, and Sedgwick's corps is saved. The losses of the Federals are admitted to be enormous. Three or four generals killed and two captured, 12,000 rank and file killed and wounded—such is the most moderate estimate of a New York correspondent. Nevertheless, President Lincoln glories that Grant's army has not been driven back, and, when the news arrives that Lee has not attacked on the following day, recommends a public thanksgiving. In the mean time, Lee, who in victory or defeat is reliable, thanks God that every advance of Grant's army has been repulsed, but regrets the loss of Longstreet and Pegram severely wounded, and of Jenkins killed.

On the 7th there was no serious fighting. The Federals remained on the defensive. Lee, after awaiting attack for some hours, and shelling the enemy, retired behind a cloud of skirmishers along the Spottsylvania Court House Road. Grant followed cautiously, and on the 8th the two armies came again into collision. The 5th corps of the Federal army was attacked by a portion of Longstreet's and Ewell's divisions, who seem to have taken the Federals by surprise, the latter suffering 'heavily in killed and wounded.' General Sedgwick, one of the ablest commanders on the Federal side, fell in this encounter. On the 9th there was no fighting, both sides busied in bringing up supplies. On the 10th the two armies were confronting each other at Spottsylvania Court House, the Federal line six miles in extent, Lee still occupying a formidable intrenched position. The battle is said to have commenced at daybreak with an artillery fight. Assault after assault was made on the Confederate lines, but each time the Federal columns surged back, bloodily repulsed. Towards evening, Burnside's reserves were brought into play, and an assault in heavy force was ordered upon the Confederate right wing. But the attack did not take place. Unperceived, Lee had made one of his famous flank marches, had got in Grant's rear, and captured his supply trains on the Fredericksburg road. Grant immediately changed front, to protect his artillery and supplies; and, although a momentary success was obtained at a weak point of the Confederate line, the battle of the 10th was substantially a Confederate victory. Lee had out-fought and out-manœuvred his opponent. On the night of the 10th the Federal losses were estimated at 40,000 killed, wounded, and prisoners, and General Warren, another distinguished Federal commander, was amongst the first. On the 11th nothing was done. The two armies continued to occupy the positions they held on the morning of the 10th. But on the 12th at dawn, the fight was renewed, and according to Federal accounts Hancock's division achieved a brilliant success, capturing 3,000 prisoners, 25 pieces of cannon, and 3 general officers. The account is an obvious exaggeration, and will be doubtless reduced to its proper proportions in a day or two. The battle lasted throughout the day; the carnage is described as exceeding that of the 6th and 10th, but the Confederates everywhere held their own, and all Grant's attacks were repulsed with terrible slaughter. On the night of the 12th, Lee held the position he had taken up on the 8th. But on a reconnaissance being made on the 13th, the Confederate leader was found to have withdrawn his army across the Po, in all probability to take up another strong position behind the North or South Anna River. Grant was awaiting reinforcements and supplies previously to recommencing the pursuit.

At this point the history of this fearful struggle breaks off. Grant's advance up to the night of the 10th, had cost him 40,000 killed and wounded, and he had advanced 20 miles. To that horrible list of casualties is now to be added the death-roll of the 12th, which has won him another 10 miles. He will have to fight again in all probability on the North and South Anna rivers, and halt a dozen other intrenched positions, before Lee retires behind the defences of Richmond. What will be his hope of reducing the Southern capital this year? Lee's programme is sufficiently plain. It is to compel his enemy to become the assailant under the most disadvantageous conditions, to fight him where his superiority of numbers will help him the least; to drag him, through an unfamiliar country, away from his supplies and his base of operations, to husband his own strength for the day of final struggle, and then, if strong enough, to close upon the enemy, exhausted and bleeding from his frequent wounds. From the first it will be seen that Lee has adopted very different tactics from those which he has ordinarily pursued. His is an obstinate defence. It is like the retreat of Wellington before Massena, and will end with another Torres Vedras. Grant's hardest fighting has to come; and it has yet to be decided whether the Federal army or the city of Richmond is in the more imminent danger.

Of the cooperating forces we know very little. Butler is magniloquent about his coloured cavalry, and was, at the latest date, advancing upon Drury's Bluff, where, if it be true that Beauregard is in his neighbourhood, things are likely to go very hard with him. Sigel is busy destroying railroads, and is reported to have been beaten by Breckenridge. The flotilla on the James River has already suffered severely from the torpedoes, and seems in no hurry to test the metal of Fort Darling; but north and east of Richmond the war is at its height, and a week cannot elapse before we are relieved from the terrible suspense which now hangs like a thundercloud over the capital of the Confederacy.

Outside Virginia, fortune smiles on the South. Louisiana and Arkansas bid fair for entire restoration to the Confederacy. Sherman makes no progress in North Georgia, and is himself threatened by Forrest's cavalry, which will probably compel him quickly to retrace his steps for East Tennessee. If, as we believe, General Lee has been husbanding his resources for a final struggle before the walls of Richmond, saving the lives of his men, and hoarding his supplies, so as to be enabled at a given moment to resume the offensive, the next few weeks may witness such a series of blows to the Northern armies as will well-nigh shatter the Union to pieces.

Is the Carnage in Vain?

It is not disputed that the late battles in Virginia were as bloody as any of the war. On this point the Federal accounts are emphatic and reliable. We do not as yet know the exact losses on either side, but it is past doubt that they are very heavy. It is, however, without profit to dwell upon the horrible slaughter. Neither sorrow nor remorse can restore the dead to life, or give health to the wounded, or make the crippled whole. But it may be profitable, as it surely is seemly, to consider whether the carnage that we deplore is in vain. May we hope that at length the demon of war is gorged, and that the sword will be sheathed? Whilst as yet the issue of the conflict is concealed from us—though, judging from what has transpired, we have little doubt about it—we propose to glance at the results to be expected from a Southern victory or from a Northern victory; and we think we shall convince the unbiassed judgment that a Confederate triumph alone gives a prospect of peace, and that a Federal success can have no other effect than prolonging the war.

When a nation engages in an aggressive war, it does so under the conviction that its strength and resources are so superior to those of the adversary as to ensure a speedy triumph. This was the case with the North. Whether Mr. Lincoln believed that he could restore the Union with the aid of 75,000 troops—whether he ever believed that the South would be subdued in sixty or ninety days—is very doubtful; but it is quite certain that, had he not promised that the war should be soon over, he would not have persuaded the people to have entered into the contest. If the Federals had deemed it even possible that the conflict would last for four years—that it would impose upon them a crushing national debt—that Mr. Lincoln would call for more than 2,000,000 of men to fight his battles—nothing would have induced them to commence hostilities. Nor, having commenced, could Mr. Lincoln have gone on so long with the strife as he has done, if he had not declared each campaign to be the last, and announced time after time the immediate subjugation of the South. The most striking illustration of this is the proceedings of the Federal Government during the past winter. No one knew better than Mr. Lincoln that his amnesty was a grim joke—that it was proffered to an enemy not thinking of submission, but flushed with past victories, and making ready for the next campaign. No one knew better than the Federal authorities that the reports of Southern despondency, and of famine and disunion in the South, were sheer falsehoods. When it was reported from Washington that certain States had returned to the Union, the authorities were well aware that the story was utterly untrue, and that the Federal generals were urgently demanding reinforcements to enable them to hold the positions they occupied in the enemy's country. And what was the object of all these misrepresentations? In the South we find a diametrically opposite policy pursued. There the difficulties and dangers of the war, so far from being softened, were positively exaggerated. The Confederate Government called upon the people to fly to arms and to expect a long and trying war. And is not this the right spirit? Does not our common sense tell us that if a people is to come forward and offer up its blood and treasure, the only feasible reason that can be set forth is the dire necessity for the sacrifice? But Mr. Lincoln could not follow the example of the Confederate Government. The people of the United States, the loyal contractors excepted, were sick of the war. They began to perceive the hopelessness of the struggle. Their faith in Mr. Seward's prophecies and in Mr. Lincoln's promises was rudely shaken. The prodigal splendour of New York no longer blinded them to the impending financial collapse. They would not be taxed. They would not fill up the ranks of the depleted army. Recruits could not be obtained by extravagant bounties. The Government feared to enforce the draft. The situation of the war party was desperate; and it was only saved by marvellously energetic lying. Still, despite the amnesty proclamation, despite the hourly asseverations that the rebellion was just over, the Northern public was not nearly so confident as formerly. Do what he would, Mr. Lincoln could not cajole, and was afraid any longer to gag, the peace party. Mr. Vallandigham had been banished in the autumn for expressing a hope that peace might restore the Union, but in the winter the bolder utterances of Mr. Vorhees, and a few weeks later the suggestion in Congress of peace and recognition, were feebly denounced by the Government, and only serve to show how the peace party had increased in numbers and courage. In the West, the country from whence Mr. Lincoln obtains his best soldiers, there were riots premonitory of civil war. Slowly, very slowly, under such circumstances came in recruits. In spite of the strenuous exertions of Mr. Chase, gold would go up and greenbacks would go down. Then came the disaster in Florida, the disasters on the Mississippi, Banks's tremendous disaster in Louisiana, and the disasters in North Carolina. There was an outcry then against Mr. Lincoln and his party, before which braver men than they might have quailed. They had only one word to say for themselves, and that word was—Grant. General Grant was to make all right. He was to redeem the fortunes of the Federal armies. He was to demonstrate to the world that when the Lincoln Government, by solemn acts and solemn words, declared that the South was broken up and about to yield, they were not infamously beguiling the people. By this means they obtained a respite.

There was no disguise about Grant's 'On to Richmond' being the supreme effort of the North. The partisans of the war would not hear of the possibility of failure, because they felt they were playing their last card. The friends of peace were obliged to acquiesce in the venture, though they knew that even if it succeeded it could not restore the Union. But if it has failed—if once more the grand army of the Potomac has been defeated and forced to return to Washington—then, indeed, there is a hope that the days of strife are numbered. There will be a cry for peace which we do not think the Administration can stifle. The people will be assured that the subjugation of the South is impossible, and they will not be driven any more into Mr. Lincoln's slaughter-pens. They will see then the pressing need of an immediate peace. And if this happens, at no distant period the whole North will confess that the defeat of Grant was the salvation of the Republic.

And now let us take the other supposition. Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that the great Captain of the South is defeated by overwhelming numbers, and the bulldog pertinacity of the Northern commander. Let us further assume that Grant not only defeats Lee, but takes Richmond, though the one does not in the least involve the other, for under M'Clellan an army of greater numbers, and certainly of equal discipline, was driven from a strongly fortified position so near to Richmond that the outposts could hear the chimes of the city bells. What follows? Would the Confederates lay down their arms? No, for they are not engaged in a war of aggression. Like the Netherlanders, like the revolted colonists of Great Britain, they are fighting for their homes, for liberty and independence. They know what submission means; they know how diabolically cruel are the tender mercies of New England; they know that the vile miscreant who insulted the women of New Orleans is the favourite officer of their enemy; they know what M'Neil, Turchin, and many such have done; they know what Dahlgren tried to do. Their burnt towns, their desolated villages, the inhuman treatment of those who have fallen into Federal hands, forewarn them of the indescribable horrors of submission. The pulpit and the press of the North have clamoured for their spoliation and extermination. In the halls of the Federal Congress resolutions to deprive them of their property and to reduce them to political serfdom have been received with acclamation. Therefore, if their case were ever so desperate, they would fight on to the bitter end. No Northern victory can subjugate the South. Before that can be accomplished the whole male population must be killed or captured.

The capture of Richmond would indeed be a triumph to the Northern arms, and a painful catastrophe to the South, but it would not help the North materially in its work of conquest. New Orleans has long been under the Federal yoke, yet Louisiana is not conquered, and though Richmond fell, the war in Virginia would not be over. In a military point of view, Nashville, the arsenal of the South, was a greater loss than Richmond would be, but the South was not crippled by the taking of that town. The fall of Vicksburg was regarded as a great misfortune, but the South was not discouraged, and took measures to deprive the North of all the fruits of that victory, and until this day prevents the Mississippi river from being an outlet for the commerce of the West. After every misfortune the Confederates have come forth in greater strength. At the outset of every campaign they have manifested an increased power of resistance, and at the commencement of the fourth year of the war have proved themselves stronger than ever by recovering much of the territory that the North had taken at a tremendous cost of life and treasure. The truth is, so far as resources are concerned, the Confederates cannot be exhausted. The blockade that was to be the means of their subjugation has made them supremely independent. Luxuries they have abandoned without a sigh, and they grow and raise food to supply the army and people abundantly. Shut out from the markets of Europe, they manufacture their own clothes. They make their own guns and gunpowder, and the siege of Charleston is evidence that Confederate artillery is a match for any artillery that can be purchased for Federal gold through the agency of Messrs. Baring & Co. But the most noted instance of their ingenuity and resources is the construction of an ironclad fleet. We say nothing of the brilliant success of their ironclads, but refer only to their skill in obtaining and fashioning the materials. When the war broke out there was not a foundry or a rolling mill in the country; but now full supplies of the precious ore are taken from the earth, and there is an abundance of machinery and skilled labour to prepare it for plating ships and repairing railroads. The only doubt about the resources of the South was in reference to men, and we submit that there is not the slightest reason for anxiety on that score. The Southern army is now larger than ever. The population of the North is greater, but its losses are also greater; and, not having negroes to till the fields, a great part of the men capable of bearing arms cannot be enlisted in the army. Every year adds 60,000 men to the fighting population of the South, and we need hardly observe that the deaths are not nearly so numerous. And let it not be forgotten that, as an ultimate resource, the negroes can be turned into soldiers, and would, at the bidding of their masters, fight with enthusiasm against the Federals; but there is not the most distant prospect of the military service of the negroes being required. Well, then, we say that there is no chance of the Confederates being subjugated. And, as it is certain they will not submit, it is clear that a Federal victory will not bring about peace. Such an event may prolong the war by giving a temporary éclat to the war party, but it cannot give peace. Only the success of the South will give a hope of the termination of the bloody strife.

We offer these suggestions at a moment when we think the South has achieved a great and momentous victory. Still, we know the proverbial uncertainty of the fortune of war, and far be it from us to imitate the jester of the White House, and triumph before we know the final result of the battle. We have merely endeavoured to point out the consequences of victory or defeat. We trust the South has been victorious, and that she will reap the fruits of victory. After Bull Run it was admitted that an attack on Washington would have ended the war. The North has admitted that after many triumphs of the South peace was near. But it has never been alleged that a Northern victory has made peace more apparent. It has been admitted, officially, that Gettysburg was, in one sense, a decisive battle; and that if the Confederates had gained a complete victory there would have been peace; or, to use Mr. Lincoln's expression the 'Union was saved,' by Gettysburg being a drawn battle. God grant that we have had to record the last great battle! We desire it for the sake of the gallant Confederates who have endured such an ordeal as no nation has passed through before. We desire it, too, for the sake of the North. We are not 'war Christians.' We cannot read of the slaughter of thousands of Germans and Irishmen without regret; for the Northern mercenaries are men, not vermin. So, whilst we know that the Confederates can bear defeat with heroism, and that it will not affect the final result, we earnestly desire they may be victorious, not only because their cause is just and their gallantry deserves to triumph, but because their triumph is likely to lead to peace. There are thousands at the North, not corrupted with greenbacks or blinded with fanaticism, who for their country's sake heartily sympathise with our hopes, well knowing that if Grant is victorious it will not bring peace, but, by continuing the war, consummate the ruin of the United States.

Sham Diplomatic Correspondence.

The first of April, the world over, is 'All Fools' day.' Some mauvais farceur in Mobile, Alabama, probably incited by the success of the Mallory forgery, conceived the idea of ridiculing the position of the English Government on the question of the steam-rams, and at the same time to satirise what he conceived the undue moderation of President Davis in his intercourse with foreign nations. Inspired by this brilliant idea, he indited a correspondence, the first piece in which was dated 'All Fools' day,' and the whole of which is in intent and execution an excellent companion piece to 'Mr. Mocquard's letter' and 'Lord Clarence Paget's Instructions to the Commander of the Channel Fleet' which have given a sudden celebrity to our witty and erratic contemporary, the Owl. The proprietors of the journal in which this diplomatic revelation was brought to light, with a considerate regard for the credulity of human nature, took care to announce the production as coming, not from any official quarter, but from 'a vigilant and energetic collaborator.' The 'collaborator' certainly did not dream of the European success he was about to achieve. He doubtless chuckled when he found that the Confederate Government deemed his joke of sufficient importance, after it had received publicity through a Richmond paper, to contradict it authoritatively, as was done in the Richmond Sentinel of April 23. Little did he think that this would be the smallest of his laurels. Through the medium of the New York press the 'correspondence' found its way to London. Yesterday morning the Morning Post reproduced it without comment; yesterday evening the Globe accompanied it with denunciations which, however severe, would not have been undeserved had Mr. Davis been the author of the pretended 'reply.' We have no desire to laugh at our two respected contemporaries, but we can only account for the extraordinary blunder into which they have been betrayed, on the supposition that the imitation of Lord Russell's style is so clever as to deceive two leading newspapers high in the confidence of Her Majesty's Ministers. That they should not be equally well acquainted with Mr. Davis's style—which, by the way, there was no attempt to parody—is perhaps pardonable.

We have only to add that we sincerely regret the occurrence. There can be no two opinions about the bad taste of selecting such a subject for a joke, but in this respect the author may plead a multitude of recent precedents. Of any malicious intention we readily acquit him, as he has shown his impartiality by handling Mr. Davis fully as roughly as the British Government. But it is to be feared that the Federal partisans will cite this harmless jeu d'esprit as an offset to the deliberate official forgeries which the Washington Government has imposed on British credulity; and it is for this reason that we concur in the serious tone in which the Richmond Sentinel condemns practical jokes of this character. We quote from that journal of the 23rd ult.:—

FABRICATED LETTERS.

A pretended correspondence is being published in some of our newspapers, professing to be an exchange of notes between Lord Russell and President Davis, the latter through Colonel Burton N. Harrison, his Private Secretary. The least consideration would, we supposed, satisfy any one of the spurious character of this alleged correspondence; and for ourselves, we did not judge it worthy of an allusion. But others have received it differently, and have given it additional publicity, as if to veritable papers. Among those journals that have republished it, is our neighbour, the Whig; accompanied with more than a column of editorial comment, in which, though 'seriously questioning' the truth of the correspondence, it decides to treat it 'as genuine.' Our cotemporary's office is scarce a hundred yards from that of the President's Private Secretary, making the fact of the case readily ascertainable if it had been esteemed of any consequence to be assured of it.

As these repeated publications have given more or less of credibility to the alleged letters, however improbable upon their face, it is proper to pronounce them, as we now do, after inquiry and by authority, as sheer fabrications. There has been no such correspondence. The whole story is a hoax and forgery, utterly without foundation.

We are sorry that any of our papers should have been found to give currency or countenance to these spurious letters. We can scarcely any longer criticise Lord Russell for being so easily deceived with the pretended report from Mr. Mallory; nor can we, without to some extent condemning ourselves, denounce Mr. Seward as he deserves for his connection with that abominable forgery. We had hoped all such exploits would have been left to the enemy.

Implicit Recognition.

It has been the practice of certain writers to argue that secession cannot possibly have been lawful, because the Constitution of the United States makes no provision for it; and those who argue thus imagine that they strengthen their case by dwelling on the absurdity that would be involved if a convention purporting to be the basis of a perpetual union should contain provisions for the dissolution of that union. Of course this would have been an absurdity. Any provisions of that kind would have been not merely a permission but a direct invitation to secession. They would have done away with that very sentiment of nationality which the framers of the Constitution were most anxious to cultivate; and would have rendered the idea of disunion so familiar to all minds that it would have been the ready resort whenever a State was discontented with the policy, or offended by the legislation, of the Federal Government. But to prove secession unlawful, it would be necessary to prove a great deal more than this. The presumption, it must be remembered, is in every case in favour of the States. The Union has no common law; the Federal Government has no powers or rights that are not nominated in the bond; and those who argue that a Government must as a matter of course have the right and power to preserve its own existence by force are misled by the analogy of European States falsely applied to the case of a Power which has no exact parallel in Europe. If secession be not forbidden by the terms of the Constitution, it is included as a matter of course among those rights and privileges which are reserved to the States. If it be forbidden, then the Constitution must contain some directions, express or implied, for its prevention; for it is a maxim of all law that there is no wrong where there is no remedy; and that it is not a law whose infringement brings with it no legal penalty or power of redress. Now it is beyond all question that the Constitution of the United States affords no means of coercing a refractory State. There are powers to assist in putting down rebellion against State authorities; but none can be found to put down the resistance of those authorities to the will of the Union. Even if this were the result of mere oversight, it would still be conclusive upon the right of secession. The Federal Government has no powers but those which are in express terms conferred upon it by the Constitution: and the power of putting down the secession of a State, and retaining it by force in the Union, not being so conferred, the Federal Government cannot possess it, and, in attempting to exercise it, must be guilty of a violation of law exposing the actors therein to condign punishment when their conduct shall become the subject of investigation in a Court of Law. But it was not by any oversight that the framers of the Constitution omitted to give to the Federal Government the right to coerce a refractory State. The question was carefully considered in the Convention, and deliberately resolved in the negative. It was thought that any such power would be inconsistent with the nature of the Union, and fatal to its duration; it was understood that the employment of violence against a State would inevitably assume the form, not of political coercion, but of civil war; and it was resolved that such violence should not be employed. That is to say, the Convention deliberately discussed and decided the very point at issue; for, in declaring that force should not be used to prevent secession, it declared that secession, however undesirable, should not be unlawful. And if the Convention had decided otherwise, there can be little doubt but that the Constitution would have been rejected by the States, none of which was disposed to give away its sovereignty so completely and irretrievably as it would have done had it admitted a right of coercion in its Confederates. Those therefore, who argue that secession was unlawful, and that Mr. Lincoln was justified in resisting it by force, virtually affirm either that they have never read the account of the framing of the Constitution, or that they are prepared to assert the possession by the Federal Government of an authority which its framers expressly withheld.

Perhaps a still more convincing argument in favour of the legality of secession is to be found in the helpless floundering of the Federal legislature and executive in their attempt to treat it as illegal The dilemma in which they find themselves may be very succinctly stated. Either the seceding States had the power they assumed, or they had it not. If they had it, then they are at present de jure and de facto an independent and separate Confederacy; and though the war upon them may be legal, the pretension to treat them as rebels is clearly absurd, and the refusal to recognise their Government indefensible. If they had it not, then they are still within the Union; secession is a nullity; and as the Constitution provides no means by which a State may forfeit or be deprived of any of its rights, they are now legally in full possession of their privileges; they may send members to Congress whenever they please: and, what is still more vexatious and inconvenient, many most important acts of Federal legislation and administration cannot be lawfully performed without their concurrence. Either the seceders are lawfully a distinct Power—the Confederate States of North America; or they are an integral part of the Union. And so completely is this question interwoven with all the future plans and politics of the North, that we find it tripping up President and politicians, ministers and members of Congress at every step, and plunging them either into the mire of illegality on the one side, or into the thorny hedge of recognition on the other. If the North would but remember the advice of the old proverb, and forbear to sell the bear's skin before he is killed, they might escape all trouble concerning the method in which the Union is finally to be 'reconstructed.' But as it is one of their favourite amusements to speculate on this subject, they are continually entangling themselves in the meshes of the law; and while some of them are committed to the grossest acts of lawlessness on the supposition that the Southern States are still a part, though a recusant and absentee part, of the Union; others, and these for the most part Republicans, are betrayed by the vehemence of their anti-Southern zeal into propositions which clearly involve a recognition of the independence and separate status of the Confederacy.

One of these too zealous gentlemen is Mr. Stevens, who, on April 29 last, moved some notable resolutions in the House of Representatives. We need not comment on the merely ferocious part of his resolutions concerning the confiscation of all rebel property and the severities to be inflicted upon the conquered. The South has long been aware that, if conquered, she has no mercy to expect—that she must make up her mind to undergo the fate of Poland, and to see her best and noblest murdered or driven into exile, while those who remain at home, enslaved and despoiled, will drag out a miserable existence under the rule of military tyrants. The points in these resolutions to which we wish to call the attention of our readers are of a different character. Mr. Stevens declared that the seceded States are waging an unjust war, inasmuch as it is wicked and iniquitous for any people to defend their homes and property, the honour of their fatherland and of their women, against the troops of the great and glorious Union; that they ought to suffer as a penalty for their iniquity the extreme rigours of war—and what this phrase means in America, the burning of defenceless towns, the slaughter of prisoners in cold blood, and the amenities of General Butler's rule, sufficiently inform us; and that when they are conquered they shall be governed as territories by rulers appointed from Washington, and shall have no further participation as States in the privileges they have despised and forsworn. When they are conquered, Mr. Stevens, or any one else appointed by Mr. Lincoln to the duty of hanging and robbing, illusing women, exterminating white men by the sword, and negroes by disease and hunger, may do his pleasure upon them; in the mean time it is worth while to notice that, in the opinion of this zealous Republican, this violent champion of Federal authority, secession is no longer the legal nullity it was at first pronounced. It has placed the Southern States, not as people or as individuals, but in their quality of States, in relations of war with the Union, which is entitled to deal with them 'according to the extreme rigours and rights of war' as an enemy's country. But if the States as States are at war with the Union, they cannot be members of it; if they are not members of it, their legal status is clearly one of independence, and they are, on Mr. Stevens's showing, what they profess themselves, no longer the Southern States of the Union, but de jure and de facto the Confederate States of America.

Mr. Stevens is still more explicit in another portion of these resolutions. He pronounces that none of the States which have seceded with the consent of a majority of their citizens can be tolerated and considered as within the Union; and, to make the meaning of this exclusion more plain, he not only denies to them the right of representation in Congress and of participation in political government, but he also declares that they shall not count as among the States of the Union, for the purpose of determining the number necessary to an actual or proportionate majority; and that three-fourths of the non-seceding States—thereby considered as forming the whole Union—shall have power to make amendments to the Constitution. It is worth while to observe that we have here at last a distinct confession of that which Mr. Seward so long and so impudently denied, viz., that secession was the act of a majority of the citizens of the seceding States. The intention is evidently to except only Kentucky and Missouri, in which, from the presence of superior Federal forces, it was impossible to gather the opinions of the people at large; and it must be held as admitted that the secession of the remaining eleven States was the act of a majority of the people. The oft-repeated falsehood about a Union majority held down by Secessionist terrorism, long since discredited, is thus finally disavowed. But the main purport of these resolutions is obviously to declare the seceded States outside the pale of the Union; and it is to this that we invite attention. There could not be a more complete recognition, by implication, of the Confederate States. If the seceded States are outside the Union, they are legally independent of it. If they are legally independent of it, they were fully entitled to set up a Government of their own, and that Government ought to be recognised as an independent Power. If Mr. Stevens's resolutions should pass, America herself will be unanimous in repudiating the pretensions to which Lord Russell yielded when he refused to receive the Envoys of the Confederate States; namely, that the States so styled still form part of the Union. They themselves denied it long ago; Mr. Stevens now denies it on the part of the North. If that denial be endorsed by Congress, what further excuse can the British Government prefer for refusing to recognise a Power which has proved its independence at the point of the sword, and which its would-be conqueror, no matter how sulkily and reluctantly, is forced to pronounce independent, even while he vaunts his purpose of conquest?

The Irish Exodus.

M. Michelet, in his 'History of France,' speaks of the first-born sister of the Celtic race as 'all-fruitful Ireland, where men sprout up like grass to the dismay of England, on whose ears the cry jars every day, they are a million more.' It is lamentable to think that from those who have bewailed the wrongs of Ireland the last drop of consolation has been rudely snatched. The race has not lost its sap; it still increases and multiplies in disobedience of the laws of Malthus; but it no longer frightens England by its fecundity. Like a vast volume of water which has threatened to burst every barrier and spread destruction, it has found a channel down which it may discharge itself with tranquillity, until it has ceased to trouble the anxious neighbours.

The emigration of the Irish race to the American continent is one of the most striking features in that vast political and social revolution which now shakes the Western world to its foundation. It will form for ever a theme on which the political economist may wrangle, on which the historian and poet may dwell with not unreasonable sorrow. The tide has set in now for more than two years, and gives no sign that it is on the turn. While thousands find places on board the heavily laden steamers, more are week by week left to chafe in impatience at the delay, and to long for the hour of their departure. The masters of the soil vie with the occupiers, and pay the cost of deportation of their own tenants; all are seized with an insatiable desire to plant the Irish people, whole and entire, on the American shore.

It may be possible to deduce from the examples of the past and the exigencies of the present the result to Ireland of this emigration. The bone and sinew of the country must go. The tenant, squatter, peasant, or by whatever name the occupier of from fifty to five acres of land be designated, will disappear, and his place will be taken by bullocks, by sheep, and by horses. It will not be as it was with happy Campania, where in the fifth century half a million of acres of land lay fallow, but rather as it is with the Highlands of Scotland, where estates extend ninety-six square miles, and the solitary shepherd with his numerous flocks roams over lands where once whole regiments were raised. Latifundia perdidere Italiam. Just as AUGUSTUS was unable to replace the legions of VARUS, so will it be impossible to recruit the British army from the great nursery of soldiers. Yet this is matter of necessity even for England. Breadstuffs here are a mere drug in the market; the great western farms of North America, the shores of the Baltic and Black Seas pour into London and Liverpool shiploads of wheat, barley, and Indian corn; but we look in vain for bullocks and for sheep. Beef is at 10*d.* the pound, and mutton scarcely cheaper, while wool is enormously dear. We ask supplies from Europe; the answer is, that the requirements of ordinary consumption, and the extraordinary ravages of disease, forbid any exportation. Yet the demand must be supplied, and Ireland, beyond all doubt, with its grass that never lacks rain, will satisfy the most extravagant wants. Her climate has again and again ruined the corn-grower; it has never disappointed the grazier.

But consequences are not causes, and Ireland is not deserted because its pastures are required for the London market. For what reason, then, do the Irish go? Are they so sick and wearied with vainly hoping for better times, for harvests free from blight and mildew, for rent-days on which they will boldly meet the agent with money in their hand and no entreaty in their mouth, that they are ready to falsify their reputation of love for their country, of unconquerable adhesion to the land of their fathers—in one word, to give the lie to the saying,

> It is better to bear the ills we have > Than fly to others that we know not of?

Is it that the old ways and old places are so full of sorrow, want, misery, and oppression, that any wild scheme of emancipation is clutched at? It is idle to talk of the efforts of Federal agents, to attribute a mighty river to the outpouring of a puny stream; for all the gold and the greenbacks of Washington would not tear the Irishman from his home if he were not driven rather than enticed. He has been told of kidnapping; he knows of the privation endured by his countrymen in New York; but he is willing to bear and endure, for he has heard of the farms of the West and longs for them—

There are no facts in history, the grandeur of which so strikes the imagination, or the effects of which are so visible on the destinies of the human race, as the movements of large masses of population. Yet there are none the causes of which are involved in so complete obscurity. The writers of history have wearied themselves to discover why Kymry and Teutons, Goths and Vandals, Huns and Tartars precipitated themselves on the fair plains of Western Europe. Lost in a maze of helpless conjectures, they venture to attribute one invasion to an inundation of the Baltic—to explain that the Goths crossed the Danube because the Hunnish cavalry pressed upon their rear—to assert that ATTILA came to Gaul because GENSERIC invited him.

It is in truth not to be doubted that whole tribes and nations are affected with sudden and universal emotions, just as masses of men are influenced at the critical moment of battle or in the quiet hours of night. Some mighty impulse of courage urges them with reckless daring against the enemy, or some strange and irresistible panic turns them from soldiers into a shameless and disorganised mob.

'There are things in the world,' Mr. KINGLAKE says, 'which, eluding the resources of the dry narrator, can still be faintly imaged by that subtle power which sometimes enables mankind to picture dim truths by fancy.' Under the figures of the Angel of Light and the Angel of Darkness, the historian has portrayed the valour and light which lighten the path to victory, and the fear, horror, and despair, the error and vain fancies, which seize the minds of the doomed soldiery; and he has told how over the souls of the men in the great Russian columns who fought at the Alma were spread first the gloom, then the swarm of vain delusions, and, at last, the sheer horror, which might be the work of the Angel of Darkness. The cloud of emotions fell upon all hearts at the same moment, and all were troubled as one man. Just in the same way a race of men breaks up from its encampment of three thousand years, and hurries across the wide ocean to a new resting-place, heedless alike of peril and of warning, obedient to an unknown, impalpable, but imperious force.

The effect of this migration upon America is a thing not easily foreseen. Up to the present time the Irish have performed on that continent the thankless offices of 'hewers of wood and drawers of water.' If any work involving more than ordinary peril or degradation was to be accomplished, the Irishman did it. He has built the railways and the bridges of both Northern and Southern States; he has so bowed his back to the burden as even to earn the contempt of the negro; and, finally, he has poured out his blood with unrequited prodigality in a struggle, success in which would have been, to him at least, unproductive of the smallest advantage. In his own island discord has been his ruin, and he has not yet, in the home of his choice, shown a capacity for united effort.

How far the Irish will neutralise by devotion to their faith the bigotry of the German Protestant, we cannot stay to discuss. But one side of the religious question is of striking import. It is affirmed that the Irish in Ireland, as well as in America, have made enormous progress in the distinction between the spiritual and temporal power. On the Transatlantic continent, Bishop DUGGAN, with violent menaces of the severest censures of the Church, forbade his flock to attend the Fenian fair at Chicago. The people for eight days and nights thronged the scene of festivity by thousands and tens of thousands. The Catholic Archbishop of Cashel has taken from his clergy 'the faculties,' so far as the absolution of Fenians is concerned. A Fenian organ declares that 'the people will not again be put down by ecclesiastical interference, nor cower before the authority which paralysed them in 1848. Men think for themselves now-a-days, and with reflection this truth comes—that the priesthood have no right to impose obedience on their flocks except so far as spiritual matters are concerned.'

There is reason, then, for supposing that the people of Ireland are undergoing a great change, a marked revolution, not merely in place of habitation, in material circumstances, in social and political condition, but even in religious sentiment. Strange indeed will that movement be if it shake off Ultramontanism from the necks of the most willing worshippers. But if the symptoms have been rightly judged, will it not result that to the Irish there will not be the expected heritage of liberty, but rather a wild and unrestrained love of license, neither limited by reverence for constituted order nor moderated by self-imposed control? The Irish have long laughed to scorn the rules of civil authority. They will complete the destruction of law when they have learned to defy the injunctions of religious restraint.

FEDERAL FINANCIAL LEGISLATION.—The New York Times says of the recent acts of Congress:—'If anything could lead us to fear a financial crash, it would be such bits of legislation as the resolutions adding fifty per cent. to the import duties for sixty days, without even two days' notice to the public. There is hardly a single rule of taxation which this does not violate. There is a suddenness and capriciousness about it, which entitles it rather to be classed amongst the means of raising revenue resorted to by Turkish Pachas than those of an enlightened constitutional Government. It deranges the whole course of foreign trade, without the slightest warning; destroys the calculations of all those who have already sent their orders abroad, as well as of those who have cargoes on the way home; fills the minds of home dealers with confusion and uncertainty as to the stock they have on hand; leaves them totally unable to decide what they had better ask for it, or when or on what terms they can renew it; and what is worse than all this, it fills the whole community with apprehension and doubt about the future. Moreover, the Government not only reaps no advantage from it, but loses heavily. Fifty per cent added to the existing tariff is a prohibitory tax, and will stop importation, thus causing the loss of some millions of duties. And it will certainly, along with such acts as the payment of the New York State interest in greenbacks, help to damage the national credit in the eyes of foreign capitalists; for who can trust a nation whose finances are in the hands of men who double taxation without notice for a term of sixty days? In what civilised country was such a thing ever heard of?'

THE FEDERAL STATES AND MEXICO.—The New York Daily News, April 30, urging the establishment of the Mexican Empire as a motive to peace, says: 'We must have peace with the South or war with France. The dilemma cannot be avoided by an ignoble acquiescence in the imperial plan; for though the Administration may acquiesce, the people will not, and Napoleon knows that they will not. The alliance that he contemplates is one that will be initiated by brotherhood in arms, and strengthened by community of interests. The tacit and unwilling compliance of the North will not serve his purpose; he will turn from it to the eager and dependent friendship of the South. That league between the two newborn nations, he proposes, shall be sealed with blood; it then attains a kind of sanctity that will make it lasting. A people will endure great provocation and make great sacrifice before they will turn upon the Power that has confirmed their independence. It is such a people that Napoleon would have along the frontier of Mexico. He wants the barrier of broad acres and grateful hearts between the Mexican confines and the limits of the Federal Government.'

MR. GOLDWIN SMITH AND THE QUESTION OF SLAVERY.

This remains the question of slavery. Mr. Smith owns that the Federals deserved no sympathy so long as they aborted this particular institution. But is it not true that Mr. Lincoln's proclamation was expressly a war measure intended to damage the Confederates, to incite their slaves to rise upon the women and children under whose charge they were left? Negro regiments have been formed, and some of them have fought well. That proves only that in the dearth of soldiers the Federals have allowed negroes to fight their battles as they have allowed Irishmen and Germans to fight them. On the other hand, has not Mr. Lincoln told the deputation of coloured men that the same continent cannot contain them and the whites? Have not negroes, the property of loyal subjects, been treated as slaves? have not thousands of those who have escaped into the Federal lines been suffered to die of starvation? It could be made clear to us that the success of the North would effect the freedom of the slave, confer upon him full rights of citizenship, and put an end to the system of slavery, for that great good we might be tempted to regard the subjugation of the South as the lesser of two evils. But before we can indulge such a hope we must have some assurance that the negro in the free North is already a free man; not a member of a despised race. We confess that for the sake of the slave himself we desire the triumph of the Confederacy. His condition under his owner, even as a slave, is preferable to what it is under President Lincoln. But the war has no such aim as his liberation. It exists neither in the policy of the North nor in the possibility of things. If our own nation, to take the brightest sample of a free community, has had to pass through centuries of training before it became capable of using the measure of liberty it enjoys, no one but an enthusiast would dream of suddenly enfranchising four millions of people but one degree removed from the condition of savage life. Mr. Lincoln has made the experiment on a small scale, and we are aware with what result. The negroes whom his proclamation made free have exchanged slavery for famine and death. Not less than Mr. Goldwin Smith do we pray that the time will come when America will rid herself of the stain of slavery; but the process must be cautious and gradual, and must have as its fundamental condition the independence of the Confederate States. —London Review.

GENERAL MEADE'S ORDER IN REFERENCE TO MUTINY.—Head-quarters of the Army of the Potomac, May 2.—General Order No. 23.—The Commanding General has learned that, notwithstanding the caution contained in General Order No. 22, of April 25, 1864, from these head-quarters, there are men in the army who refuse to do duty on the ground that their term of service has expired. It will be made known to such men that, their conduct being open mutiny, they will be punished with death without trial, unless they return to duty; and hereafter any soldier who refuses to do duty on a similar plea will instantly be shot, without any form of trial whatever. The honour of the service and the necessities of the hour admit of no other disposition of such cases. The Commanding General again expresses the hope that the soldiers of this army will respectfully ask for and cheerfully abide by the decision of the War Department with respect to their term of service; but he has no further word or warning for those who, at a time like the present, choose to defy authority. Corps and other independent commanders are charged with the execution of this order.—By command of Major-General Meade.—S. WILLIAMS, Assistant Adjutant-General.

A SUPPRESSED SPEECH.—The military authority has interposed to prevent the constituents of Mr. Harris from reading the speech of their representative in Congress, for delivering which he was censured by that august body. The newspaper published in his district gives the following explanation:—'Our readers, being the immediate constituents of Mr. Harris, will doubtless expect to read his speech in this issue of our paper; but the annexed communication, we presume, will satisfactorily account for our failure to publish it:—"Head-quarters, Cavalry Detachment, District of St. Mary's, Leonardtown, Md., April 12, 1864.—Sir,—The commanding officer of this detachment desires that you will not publish or make any allusion in the St. Mary's Gazette to the treasonable and disgraceful speech of the member of Congress from this district, delivered in the House of Representatives on the 9th instant.—I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, F. W. DICKISON, First Lieutenant Fifth Cavalry, Acting Adjutant.—To the Publisher and Proprietor of the St. Mary's Gazette, Leonardtown, Maryland."'

BANKS'S DEFEAT IN LOUISIANA.—A Washington correspondent of the New York Daily News writes, April 28: 'The people have not yet been allowed to see a true statement of the recent disaster on the Red River. But I have the facts, and the War Department has them; and, when they are published, they will show that our losses have been frightfully severe—that some of the divisions engaged were literally cut to pieces. The Administration may bluster about another advance towards Shreveport; but be assured that such an advance is an utter impossibility. The army is utterly demoralised and disorganised. The loss in officers has been heavy, and the loss of guns and small arms is so considerable as to render effective operations out of the question. The whole Red River expedition will have to be abandoned until the army can be reorganised and recruited, and, as there are no troops available for the latter purpose, the expedition is at an end. The Confederate forces which defeated Banks so signally are known to number 28,000 men.'

FORT PILLOW.—Lincoln is breathing daggers about the affair at Fort Pillow, and threatens retaliation, if, and if, and if. We have too many of his men in our hands to fear that. Where a small body of men are invested by a large one, and have no hope of escape or successful resistance, it is their duty, according to military rules, to surrender without the effusion of blood. If they refuse to do this, and resolve to kill as many as possible, they can do so, but they forfeit their right to quarter. A man, or a squad, challenged by a regiment, have no right to empty their guns, and then throw up their hands. From the enemy's own accounts, a handful of men in Fort Pillow several times rejected General Forrest's flag of truce, and wantonly forced him to sacrifice the lives of many of his men in storming the works. They should not complain, even of such consequences as they allege.—Richmond Sentinel, April 26.

A METHODIST PREACHER'S POLICY.—At a Methodist General Convention, held in Philadelphia in April, the negro question, as usual, was uppermost. A report says: 'Rev. Dr. Moody said he thought that God Almighty was going to give us an exodus of the whole coloured concern to South America. After we get this little family difficulty settled and the funeral over, we will then push on to the isthmus of South America, clear out Mexico, and give the people of colour pre-emption right to that territory.'

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

New Orleans, Louisiana: April 29, 1864.

THE RESULT OF THE FEDERAL DISASTER IN LOUISIANA—THE DESTRUCTION OF FEDERAL STORES AND BOATS AT GRAND ECORE—BANKS IN ALEXANDRIA—THE FEDERAL LOSSES—THE YANKEE 'VICTORY' ON APRIL 9—THE AFFAIR AT CAMP MOORE.

Here in New Orleans I find it difficult to write at present upon any other subject than the progress of the war in the valley of the Mississippi, and particularly of General Banks's disastrous campaign in West Louisiana. And indeed all other questions hinge upon this one. With a decided disaster to the Federal arms in this valley, 'Free State Governors,' 'Free State Conventions,' 'free navigation of the Mississippi,' restoration farces, the working of plantations by penniless Northern speculators, and the innumerable other shams and schemes of Yankee oppression or plunder receive a blow from which they can never recover. And this decided disaster has overtaken the Federal arms, and we are beginning to see the fruits of it not only in the brilliant and decisive victory on Red River, but here in this very city, and along the river from New Orleans to Cairo. Guerillas, as they are called, but in reality Confederate cavalry or mounted infantry, are visiting all the so-called Government plantations, and carrying off all the stock, negroes, overseers, and lessees, the would-be Southern planters and loud-mouthed revilers of 'Southern aristocrats.' The particulars of these 'guerilla raids' are given in the St. Louis newspapers; here such intelligence is contraband, but for all that the public are fully aware that Government plantations are being abandoned by the lessees. Many of this gentry are returning to their native North.

A steamboat arrived last night from Alexandria, where General Banks's army, or rather the remnant of it, had arrived from Grand Ecore, after fighting its way with unchecked ill-fortune. Before leaving Grand Ecore all the army stores—over a million dollars' worth—collected there were destroyed, also the village itself. Nine mortar-boats are reported to have been blown up, the river being too shallow to float them over the falls. Some few gunboats are also said to have been destroyed for the same reason, and the Confederates have burnt a few transports. In the retreat from Grand Ecore the Confederates pressed the enemy severely, driving them in disorder into Alexandria.

Our latest accounts state that the Confederates appeared in force about six miles outside of Alexandria, when they again engaged the Federal army and drove it into the town, where it lies cowering under protection of the gunboats. This last defeat is said to have been very disastrous for the enemy, and some reports have it that the Confederates have demanded the surrender of Banks and his forces. But, aside from reports, we have the admissions of Federal officers that Banks is now sorely pressed at Alexandria, and that there is but faint chance of his saving the remnant of those forty thousand troops with which he started out on what he expected would be nothing more than a promenade militaire.* A copy of the Louisiana Democrat, a paper published at Shreveport, has been received here, containing a semi-official report of the battles on the 8th and 9th. It reports the captures by the Confederates as follows: 35 pieces of artillery, 4,000 prisoners, 10,000 stand of small arms; 2,500 horses and mules; 250 wagons, and 2,000,000 dollars in 'greenbacks'—funds of the paymasters and cotton speculators. These were the spoils of the immediate field of battle, and do not include the captures since made, of which we have no authentic account.

The Yankee bulletins, as usual when a battle is renewed on the succeeding day, claim a victory for Banks on the 9th. Here we know that this is false. Officers arrived in this city from the scene of operations claim no such victory, and the subsequent movements of the hostile armies give the lie to any such claim. A Federal officer was asked by a friend about this victory on the 9th. 'What victory?' enquired the disingenuous soldier. 'Why, the victory on Saturday, the second day's fight, the one at Pleasant Hill, when the rebels were repulsed with such slaughter and pursued six miles.' 'Hanged if I heard of any victory!' said the honest fellow; 'all I do know is, that I was d—— tired from running.'

There are rumours that the Confederates are massing at several points on the east bank of the river, between here and the mouth of the Yazoo. An attack upon Port Hudson, Baton Rouge, or Natchez, is thought to be at hand. These and the other fortified positions on the river might easily be seized now, as they are held only by the negro troops, all the white regiments having been sent to reinforce Banks. Skirmishing is constantly taking place outside the above-mentioned ports. Within the last ten days, a body of Confederates have made their appearance at Tangipaho, a station on the New Orleans and Jackson (Mississippi) Railroad, about sixty miles from this city. The place is known in our military nomenclature as 'Camp Moore,' so called after Governor Allen's immediate predecessor. It was known that the Federals had started out to give battle to the force at Camp Moore, but of the result of the expedition we were left in ignorance, so far as the authorities could compass the same. I subjoin a copy of a letter which gives the result of the affair:—

'Clinton, Louisiana, April 24, 1864.

'My dear Son,—I write you a few lines in haste. Your brother was killed in the battle of Camp Moore. I was in the fight. We whipped them badly. Your wife is very sick: all others well. 'Your Father.'

I have given the letter entire, as I think it is unique. The brave old man no doubt feels the loss of his son as keenly as would most fathers. But it is evident his private grief is swallowed up in his love of country. It is the sacred cause in which he is engaged that nerves his heart for such sacrificial offerings on the altar of his country. And this is the spirit of all the 'rebels.' Were it otherwise, the gallant little nation would long ago have been overwhelmed by the multitudinous hosts of the enemy.

The son to whom the letter is addressed is a prisoner in this city. There was a fearful light in his fine dark eyes as he read it, and the brief words he muttered assured me that the blood of a brother will not be unavenged.

I find in the Mobile Tribune of April 17 what professes to be a copy of a correspondence between Lord Lyons and the private secretary of President Davis. It is a jeu d'esprit, intended as a satire on the foreign policy of the President, or a hint to the Government regarding the wishes and feelings of the people on the questions between them and the Cabinet of St. James's.

* On the eve of his departure for Red River, one of his officers wished him a successful campaign, and expressed the belief that there would be some hard fighting. Banks replied, 'Not at all, sir, not at all; merely a military parade.'

The Gambia was formerly an American Confederate vessel, sailing from Charleston, Carolina. Since the outbreak of the American war she lay for several weeks at Plymouth, and was ultimately registered as a British vessel, and left for the West Indies under the command of her present captain, Morris, with her owner on board. On her homeward passage she left Kingston, March 27. Her second mate died on April 3, and Captain Keen on the following Sunday, April 10. The second mate was buried at sea, and Captain Keen at Fortune Island, in the Crooked Island Passage. Captain Keen leaves a wife and two children at Charleston.

The Hydraulic Tube Drawing and Steel Ordnance Company.—We are enabled to introduce to the notice of our military readers a desideratum which all the recent gunnery improvements have hitherto been wanting—a steel tube or barrel, without join, solder, or weld, and therefore of perfect construction. The well-known 'ringed' construction of ordnance presents certain advantages of which Sir W. Armstrong and others have availed themselves. The machinery recently patented by Messrs. Hawksworth and Harding presents advantages which we consider very important, and may be shortly described, thus: a piece of granular steel or other metal of any required number of inches in diameter is drilled through; a mandrel with a bulb head, of the internal size of the required tube, is introduced; and the piece of metal is by the action of a very powerful hydraulic machine, of remarkably ingenious construction, drawn through a draw plate of the form required. The metal has now become a tube of most perfect finish, and the metal, before of granular structure, transformed to fibrous structure, and of course by this process of cold drawing is admirably adapted for all purposes requiring the utmost strength. This is proved by the well-known fact that the ultimate longitudinal strength of a piece of piano wire reaches often as much as 120 tons per square inch, when that of the original billet from which it was drawn was probably not more than 35 tons per sectional inch. The patentees claim the great advantages of facility and economy of construction. The applicability of this machinery to the ready formation of tubes of all kinds in any description of metal, especially iron and steel barrels for arms, tubes for ordnance, boilers, &c., is claimed with great justness by the patentees. The machinery having been experimentally worked in Paris for gun and rifle barrels, the ordnance department of France have examined and reported upon it in the highest terms. Large guns welded together cold and rifled by pressure, the skin of the metal is preserved intact, and the ordnance will possess all the elements of strength hitherto unattainable, and which artillerists have vainly desired. A company has been formed to work this invention, or application of the well-known method of wire drawing, and with every probability of success.

The Contrabands.—The following extracts from an army order issued in Natchez, Mississippi, shows how Federal officers treat the 'free' negroes: 'It is to be apprehended that serious danger to the health of this city will result from the congregation within its limits of the large numbers of idle negroes which now throng the streets, lanes, and alleys, and over-crowd every hovel. Lazy and profligate, unused to caring for themselves; thriftless for the present, and recklessly improvident of the future, the most of them loaf idly about the streets and alleys, prowling in secret places, and lounge lazily in crowded hovels, which soon become dens of noisome filth, the hot-beds fit to engender and rapidly disseminate the most loathsome and malignant diseases. To prevent these evil effects, it is hereby ordered that after April 1, 1864, no contraband shall be allowed to remain in the city of Natchez, who is not employed by some responsible white person in some legitimate business, and who does not reside at the domicile of his or her employer; and no contraband will be allowed to hire any premises in the city for any purpose whatever, and no other person will be allowed to hire such premises for the purpose of evading this order, nor allowed to hire or harbour any contraband who cannot satisfy the health officer that he or she needs the services of said contraband in some legitimate employment. All contrabands remaining in the city in contravention of this order after April 1 will be removed to the contraband encampment. The word contraband is here defined to mean all persons formerly slaves who are not now in the employ of their former owners.'

Pious Vandals.—The New York Christian Enquirer has the following rebuke of some of its less scrupulous brethren:—'In several libraries of New England clergymen, we have seen choice volumes of great cost, bearing the names of Southern ministers to whom they still belong, although they have been sent North as gifts from Yankee soldiers who had appropriated them. Some Massachusetts parlours are said to be carpeted with spoils of another kind. Now, if any one asks what has become of the Union party, once so strong at the South, we answer that, in part, they have been alienated from the government by the unjustifiable outrages committed by wicked or thoughtless Federal soldiers. At Beaufort, South Carolina, tombs were violated. At Holly Springs, Mississippi, a communion table was used in behalf of "euchre" and "old sledge." Such tales of wrong have infuriated many who were disposed to be friends of the Union, and their righteous indignation has had something to do with reverses that have overtaken our arms.' The Enquirer also quotes with indignation a letter from an officer, written at Camp Saxton, Beaufort, South Carolina, in which he says:—'The splendid mansion once occupied by that arch-rebel, T. Butler King, is on a Georgia island, and we stripped it of everything. I write this letter on his writing-desk, which, with his piano, was presented to me, on my return.'

Defences of Wilmington.—The defences of Wilmington have been greatly increased and strengthened since the spring of 1863. Fort Fisher, at the mouth of Cape Fear river, is ten miles below Wilmington. There are five large and strong forts along this space. One of them is built on a hill about one hundred feet high, nearly opposite the Quarantine Fort, and may prove a second Fort Darling if our vessels attempt to pass it, as it can throw a plunging fire upon vessels in the river below. The armament of this fort is sixteen guns; that of Fort Fisher fourteen guns, and that of the Quarantine Fort, ten guns, is the most formidable of any on the river. The forts around Wilmington on the north and east sides were not commenced until last summer, and are scarcely completed now. The guns for them all are ready, however, and some of them were being mounted in the early part of March of this year.—Correspondence of New York World, April 3.

Death of the Duke de Malakoff.—A telegram from Algiers, dated May 22, announces the death of the Duke of Malakoff, or Marshal Pelissier, to call him by his earlier and better known title. The deceased was born at Maromme, in the department of the Lower Seine, on November 6, 1794, and consequently at the time of his death was 70 years of age.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

Wednesday Evening.

Within the last few days the Money Market has become very much easier, and the applications for discount both at the Bank and in the open market have greatly subsided. Amongst the brokers to-day good bills have been done rather freely at 7 per cent., and in some exceptional cases as low as $6\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. There is abundance of capital in all directions, and the Joint-stock Banks find considerable difficulty in disposing of their ample resources at remunerative rates. As was fully anticipated, the Bank directors found it expedient, at their weekly meeting on Thursday last, to reduce the minimum rate from 9 to 8 per cent.; and there appears very little reason to doubt that, under the improved aspect of affairs, a further reduction to 7 per cent. will have to be made to-morrow. Should this prove to be the case, a fresh stimulus will be given to business, and now that the holidays may be said to have terminated, a further improvement in all monetary circles may be anticipated. On the Stock Exchange there is plenty of money for disposal, and loans from day to day are negotiated at from 4 to 5 per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The market for bullion and specie continues to be in a very satisfactory position. The gold sent into the bank during the week has been 461,000*l.*, against which there have not been any withdrawals for exportation. The arrivals of specie have also been large, amounting to 637,610*l.*, of which no less than 565,880*l.* is from New York, and the remainder from Port Phillip.—The Ceylon steamer has taken out to India and China 68,670*l.*, of which 65,025*l.* was in silver and 3,645*l.* gold. To India the amount was 15,615*l.*; China and the Straits, 41,975*l.*; Yokohama, 8,050*l.*; and Alexandria, 3,000*l.* The demand for silver is extremely quiet. For bar the nominal quotation is $60\frac{7}{8}$d. and for Mexican dollars, $61\frac{1}{2}$d. The gold ships at present known to be on their way from the Australian Colonies, are the Glendower, with 10,500*l.*; the Kent, with 14,500*l.*; the Wave of Life, with 21,000*l.*; the Royal Standard, with 78,000*l.*; the Lady Anne, with 16,000*l.*; the Anglesea, with 48,500*l.*; and the Chili and St. Dunstan from New Zealand, with 192,500*l.*; making a total of 381,000*l.*

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Business in the English Stock Market has not been particularly active this week, owing to the intervention of holidays of one description or another. During the greater portion of the week a large number of the dealers have altogether been absent from business, which has assisted materially to curtail operations. Nevertheless, prices are satisfactorily supported, and if there has not been any advance on the quotations of last week, there has not been any falling off. Consols closed firm this evening at $91\frac{3}{4}$ for money, and $90\frac{5}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ ex div. for the account. Exchequer Bills are steady, the March issue being 13*s.* to 8*s.* dis., and those of June 8*s.* to 3*s.* dis. Under all the circumstances a fair business has been transacted in Foreign Stocks, though the dealings have not been up to the usual average. Greek has advanced, $\frac{5}{8}$ per cent. being up to $24\frac{1}{8}$ to $24\frac{3}{8}$. Mexican are $44\frac{5}{8}$ to $44\frac{7}{8}$, an improvement of $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. Spanish are not quite so good, the Passives having declined $\frac{1}{2}$ and the Certificates $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., the former being marked $33\frac{3}{4}$ to $34\frac{1}{4}$, and the latter $11\frac{3}{8}$ to $11\frac{5}{8}$. Turkish six-per-cents. (1854) have advanced 1 per cent., being now at 89 to 90, but those of 1862 have declined $\frac{1}{2}$, closing at $70\frac{1}{2}$ to $71\frac{1}{2}$.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security has fluctuated considerably during the past week; the first un-authentic news of the opening battle in Virginia depressed the price to 61 per cent.: the authentic news of the 5th to the 10th brought up the value rapidly to 66–68. To-day's statement that Lee's right wing sustained defeat on the 12th caused a momentary drop to 60–62, a recovery quickly ensued, and the price is quoted at the close, 63–64.

THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

Our files of Southern papers of recent date record a great improvement in the currency. The Richmond Sentinel of April 27 observes:—'In six weeks we have exchanged a circulation of nine hundred millions for one of three hundred millions—one-third of the former sum. This reduction has been effected by the funding of nearly four hundred millions (interest-bearing notes and four per cents.), and by taxation to the amount of more than two hundred millions (tax of 1863 and tax on currency).' The money article of the Richmond Whig of April 25 reports: 'The bond and stock market is still inactive, but sales were made last week of small amounts of Confederate eight per cent. bonds, due 1875, at $108 and interest, ditto, due 1881, at $110 and interest, and Virginia registered sixes at $155 and interest. The bonds were sold for new currency. The last previous sales (before April 1) of Confederate bonds, of the same dates of maturity, were $120 to $124 and interest; and of Virginia sixes $190 and interest.' The prices of provisions are rapidly declining. We learn from the Mobile Tribune that in the Mobile market butter fell in three weeks from $10 to $5 per pound. In fresh meats there has been a decline of from 30 to 50 per cent. The Lynchburg papers contain advertisements from storekeepers announcing a reduction of 33 per cent. on their goods.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Business in American Government and Railway Securities continues to decline, and the recent accounts of the progress of the war in America have tended to a further depression in prices, and there does not at present appear much likelihood of an improvement. The only transactions recorded during the week have been in United States Five per Cents. at 56; Atlantic and Great Western Railway Pennsylvanian Section, $72\frac{1}{4}$, 72, $72\frac{1}{4}$, and $72\frac{1}{2}$, Erie, \$100 all paid, 55 and $54\frac{1}{2}$; Illinois Central, \$100 shares \$90 paid, 29; ditto ditto, all paid, 63, 64, and $63\frac{3}{4}$.

BANK MEETINGS.

At the second general meeting of the English and Irish bank proprietors, held for the purpose of authorising the amalgamation with the European Bank, resolutions to carry the amalgamation into effect were unanimously agreed to.—At the thirty-ninth annual meeting of the proprietors of the Provincial Bank of Ireland, Mr. J. M. Montefiore in the chair, the report and statement of accounts, which were adopted, showed a small addition to the rent, and a dividend was continued at the same rate as for some years past, namely, 20 per cent. per annum, the bank paying in July an extraordinary dividend of 30*s.* on each 100*l.* share, and 12*s.* on each 10*l.* share of the capital stock of the bank in addition to the ordinary dividend of 4 per cent. At an extraordinary general meeting of the New Zealand Banking Company, which was purely of a formal character, resolutions passed at a former meeting were confirmed, increasing the capital by 600,000*l.* by 60,000 shares of 10*l.* each, and for altering certain regulations in Table A. in the first schedule of the Companies Act, 1862.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The market for British railway shares has not presented much activity, business having, in the early part of the week, been greatly interfered with by the Whitsun holidays, and, within the last day or two, by the Queen's Birthday and 'The Derby.' The dealers are also restrained from operating with freedom in the present unsettled state of the money market; but should the Bank Directors reduce the rate to-morrow, as is generally anticipated, a fresh stimulus to business may be anticipated. Prices have not varied to any considerable extent, but the balance, if anything, is on the favourable side. The variations, as compared with this day week, are a rise of 2 per cent. in Taff Vale; of 1 per cent. each in West Midland (Oxford) and North Staffordshire; of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in North Eastern (Berwick), and of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in Great Western. On the other hand, there has been a decline of 1 per cent. in Metropolitan and Scottish North Eastern, and of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. each in Great Eastern, London and South Western, and South Yorkshire. In Foreign railway shares, business has not been so brisk, but on the whole prices are fairly sustained. The shares in British Possessions continue to be well supported, and quotations show a slight improvement.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has been issued of the London and Venezuela Bank, with a proposed capital of 500,000*l.* in 10,000 shares of 50*l.* each; first issue to be 5,000 only; 1*l.* per share to be paid on application, and 4*l.* on allotment. The object of the undertaking is to open banking operations in Venezuela, a ground at present unoccupied, and where banking facilities are infinitely required. The directors of the Bank of Caraccas have already engaged to transfer their business to the bank, and as they have on limited means earned 30 per cent. per annum, the prospects of the new Company are considered favourable.—The Maritime Credit Company has just been brought forward, with a proposed capital of 1,000,000*l.* (with power to increase), in 20,000 shares of 50*l.* each; first issue, 10,000 shares. The undertaking is established for the purpose of making advances on shipping, wharves, and other dock property, and, in fact, every description of maritime security. The increase of this sort of property has within the last few years been very rapid, and it is urged that there has been no property upon which leading capitalists have been able to charge so high a rate of interest.—The English, Swedish, and Continental Financial Company (limited) has been introduced for the purpose of promoting the development of the resources of Sweden and Norway, by facilitating the application of capital to safe and profitable enterprise. Arrangements are in progress for the management of the company's business in Sweden by a committee of gentlemen of position and connections resident in Stockholm. The capital asked for is 1,000,000*l.* in 20,000 shares of 50*l.* each, with power to increase. The first issue is to be 10,000 shares, of which 2,500 are reserved for Sweden, and it is not intended to call up more than 15*l.* per share.—The prospectus has been issued of the Wilnecote Collieries and Blue or Iron Brick Company, the capital of which is to be 100,000*l.*, in 10,000 shares of 10*l.* each. Deposit, 1*l.* per share on application, and 2*l.* on allotment. The company, through the possession of the Wilnecote estate in Warwickshire, can produce the blue or iron brick, which is held in high esteem; and being enabled to offer it at a great reduction, it is thought it will be extensively used. Another new company is that of the General Contract Company (Limited), with a capital of 1,000,000*l.*, in 40,000 shares of 25*l.* each. The first issue is to be 20,000, with a deposit on application of 1*l.* per share, and an allotment of 4*l.* per share. The company have arranged on very favourable terms with Mr. Rowland Brotherhood, a large contractor, for the transfer of his business including his freehold works at the Great Western Railway Station, Chippenham, with all its machinery, stock, &c., as well as the plant and material in railway and other contracts now on hand. The prospectus has been issued this evening of the Reading Iron Works (Limited), with a capital of 200,000*l.*, in 10,000 shares of 20*l.* each, 1*l.* to be paid on application an 3*l.* on allotment. The company has been formed for the purpose of purchasing and carrying on the extensive and well-known business of Messrs. Barrett, Exall, and Andrews, engineers, ironfounders, and manufacturers of agricultural machinery and implements, Reading, and which has been established nearly half a century. The vendors have agreed to become large shareholders in the undertaking, and Mr. Exall and Mr. Andrews will take seats at the board.

Liverpool, Wednesday, May 25.—Business in the Cotton Market has not been so active this week, operators seeming disposed to wait the events of any further changes in the value of money. The falling off in speculative dealings has caused the market to be better supplied, buyers for the most part obtaining a slight advantage as regards prices. The sales this week have been only to the extent of 38,000 bales, of which 10,500 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year to the present time have been 1,040,910 bales; whilst to the corresponding period in 1863 they were only 831,780 bales. There have been imported this year 891,886 bales, against 550,042 bales last year. The exports this year have reached 168,744 bales; at the same period in 1863 they were 166,399 bales. There have been taken for consumption this year 653,200 bales, and to the corresponding date last year 435,900 bales. This year there have been taken on speculation 188,520 bales; to the same in 1863, 209,500 bales. The computed stocks at the present time are 351,170 bales; at the like period last year they were 340,240 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were: American descriptions, $27\frac{1}{4}$d. to $29\frac{1}{4}$d.; Pernambuco, 29*d.*; Maranham, 29*d.*; Maceio, $27\frac{1}{4}$d. to 28*d.*; Bahia. $27\frac{1}{4}$d. to 28*d.*; Egyptian, $28\frac{3}{4}$d. to $30\frac{1}{2}$d.; Surats, $14\frac{1}{2}$d. to $23\frac{1}{2}$d.; Madras, $21\frac{3}{4}$d.; China, $19\frac{1}{4}$d. to $19\frac{3}{4}$d.; and Japan, $20\frac{1}{2}$.

There has been comparatively little doing in the Manchester markets during the last few days in all descriptions of goods. For home trade yarns the dealings have been particularly quiet, but prices though nominally the same as last week, are in reality a shade weaker, particularly for the lower numbers; for 50's and upwards, however, sellers are demanding very full rates. For shipping yarns the market is somewhat firmer, and rather more business has been transacted in them, but chiefly for Germany and the Mediterranean. For the orders given out the prices obtained have been fully equal to those of the last few weeks. Long stapled yarns have been more sought after, and for these also spinners are asking stiff prices. This branch of the market closes strong, and an impression prevails that quotations will shortly further improve. With regard to cloths there is very little alteration to notice. There is a tolerably fair inquiry, but buyers seem quite indisposed to operate to any extent, and the purchases that have been made have been only in retail quantities, and the shortness of stocks enables manufacturers to stand out for full prices.

PROSPECTUS.

EXPERIENCE has proved the superiority of Iron as a material for Ship-building. Its substitution for wood, together with the general activity of commerce, has produced a demand for Iron Ships and Steamers beyond the present means of supply.

Hence the present demand for Iron Ships and Steamers is likely to continue undiminished. As wooden vessels are lost they are replaced with Iron Ships. New lines of steamers are constantly being formed, to connect with this country ports hitherto frequented by wooden sailing ships alone. And whilst other countries excel us in the materials for building a wooden ship, we command a virtual monopoly of the construction of Iron Vessels. The present activity of the trade is not, therefore, to be regarded as temporary in its nature, but as likely to continue for a long series of years.

The River Tyne possesses special advantages in the construction of Iron Ships or Steamers—in the low cost of coal, the supply of experienced labour, and the abundance of iron produced on the spot. Plates for Ship-building are sent from the district to the Clyde, the Humber, and the Thames. The economy of cost, as compared with several other Ship building districts, amounts to a remunerative profit. In consequence the trade has made rapid strides on this river, and has known no interruption to its progress or prosperity. In addition, also, to cheapness of construction, there is a local advantage in the constant demand for screw colliers, which can always be built when other orders are not abundant, thus securing the benefit of continuous full work.

This Company has acquired the Ship-building Premises and Dockyard, formerly in the occupation of Messrs. T. and W. Smith, at St. Peter's, Newcastle-on-Tyne. To these extensive premises will be added those of Messrs. Rogerson & Co., thus giving an unbroken frontage on the Tyne of more than a third of a mile. At Messrs. Smith's yard was built the well-known line of East Indiamen now trading from London, and including the 'Marlborough,' 'Blenheim,' and other noted ships. The 50-gun frigate, 'Carlo Alberto,' was built here, as also many gun-boats for Her Majesty's service, and more than 100 ships and steamers of wood or iron.

The works are now in operation, there being seven vessels on the stocks, and others contracted for. Their capacity is sufficient for the construction of 30,000 tons of shipping per annum. The premises comprise the only building sheds on the Tyne; a Graving Dock of sufficient width to admit two vessels; and ground laid out for a patent slip. The yard room is spacious, and the buildings and machinery are adapted for business on a scale of the first magnitude. The united works, adding the premises which at present intervene, will afford the means of executing all descriptions of work from the boiler or the tug-boat to the armour-plated ship of war.

The premises, machinery, and contracts have been transferred to this Company on terms which are deemed equitable and moderate. Calculations have been made with care, on the basis of actual results, and they permit, no doubt, of a large return on the capital required, not merely in times of brisk demand, but on an average of years. At present the trade is well known to be lucrative in all quarters. The advantage believed to exist in this case is that of being able to work at a profit during periods unprofitable to those who are less favourably situated.

One half of the capital of the Company has been already subscribed.

ACTS OF THE FOURTH SESSION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA, 1863–1864.

AN ACT TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE.

WHEREAS, the Confederate States are engaged in a war, upon the successful issue of which depend the integrity of their social system, the form of their civilisation, the security of life and property within their limits, as well as their existence as sovereign and independent States; And whereas, the condition of the contest demands that they should call into requisition whatever resources of men and money they have for the support of their cause, to faithfully administer the same: Therefore, as a part of the system of the public defence:—

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the exportation of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses, and rice, from the Confederate States, and from all places in the occupation of their troops, is prohibited, except under such uniform regulations as shall be made by the President of the Confederate States.

SEC. 2. That if any person, or persons, shall put, place, or load on board any ship, steamboat, or vessel, or any other water craft, or into any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for conveyance or transportation beyond the Confederate States, or into any portion of said States occupied by the enemy, any of the articles mentioned in the first section of this act, or shall collect the same for the purpose of being conveyed or transported, contrary to the prohibition aforesaid, within the Confederate States, or beyond them, the said articles, and the ship, boat, or other water craft, wagon, carriage, or other vehicle, with the slaves and animals that may be employed or collected for the purpose of aiding therein, shall be forfeited, and all persons, their aiders and abettors, on conviction of being interested or concerned in the enterprise, shall be deemed to be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and punishable by such fine or imprisonment, or both, as the court may impose.

SEC. 3. That it shall not be lawful to put on board any ship, boat, vessel, or other water craft, or upon any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for transportation or conveyance as aforesaid, any of the articles aforesaid, unless a permit be previously obtained from some officer of the Confederate States specially authorised to grant the same, particularly describing the articles thus to be laden, and the ship, boat, vessel, water craft, wagon, carriage, cart, or other vehicle, on which the same is to be transported, and until bond shall be given that the same shall be conveyed and transported to the place of destination under such conditions and regulations, and for such objects, as shall be prescribed by the President under the first section of this act.

SEC. 4. That the collectors of all the districts of the Confederate States, and such other officers as may be designated by the President of the Confederate States, shall have power and authority to take into their custody any of the articles before mentioned found on any ship, boat, or other water craft, when there is reason to believe that they are intended for exportation, or when in vessels, carts, or wagons, or any other carriage or vehicle whatsoever, or in any manner, apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or towards the territory of the Confederate States in the occupation of the United States, or the vicinity thereof, or towards a place whence such articles are intended to be exported, and not to permit the same to be removed until bond shall be given, with satisfactory sureties, that no violation of this act, and the regulations under the same, is intended.

SEC. 5. That the powers granted by this act to the revenue and other officers of the Confederate States under this act to allow or refuse exportation of the articles before mentioned, or for the seizure or detention of any of the said articles, shall be exercised in conformity with such instructions as the President may give through the Departments of War and of the Treasury, which instructions may impose conditions as to the destination and sale of the same, and the investment of the proceeds of the same, or a portion thereof, in military or other supplies for the public service, which instructions such officers shall be bound to obey; and if any action or suit shall be brought against any such officer or officers, or their agents, he or they may plead the general issue, and upon proof of a compliance with the provisions of this act, or with the regulations and instructions of the President, he or they shall be absolved from all responsibility therefor; and any person aggrieved by any of the acts of any of the officers or agents aforesaid, may file his petition before the district court of the district in which such officer or agent resides, and after due notice to him, and to the district attorney, the said court may proceed summarily to hear and determine thereupon as law and justice may require, and the judgment of the said court and the reasons therefor shall be filed among the records of the court, and in case any release shall be granted, the judge may impose such conditions as to giving bond and security as may, in his opinion, be necessary to secure this act from violation, and, in case of refusal, may impose double or treble costs upon the petitioner if circumstances warrant: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account.

SEC. 6. That exclusive jurisdiction is conferred upon the district courts of the Confederate States of all suits or actions that may arise under this act in behalf of the Confederate States, its officers and agents, for the recovery of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures imposed in the same, by indictment, information, or action, according to the practice of the court, and the distribution of the penalties and fines shall be made under and according to the laws now in force for violation of the revenue acts, and all laws for the mitigation and remittance of penalties and forfeitures shall be applied in similar cases.

SEC. 7. That it shall be lawful for the President, or such officers as he may designate, to employ any portion of the military or naval force of the Confederacy or of the militia, to prevent the illegal departure of any ship, vessel, or other water craft, for detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody the same, or any wagon, cart, or other vehicle heretofore mentioned, their teams and drivers, and their products aforesaid, and to suppress and disperse any assembly of persons who may resist the execution of this act, or oppose the fulfilment, by the officers, of the duties imposed by the same.

SEC. 8. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

APPROVED, February 6, 1864.

REGULATIONS TO CARRY INTO EFFECT THE ACT "TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE," APPROVED, FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

I. AS TO THE SEA.

1. The owners of any vessel intending to sail from a Confederate port with a cargo consisting in whole or part of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses or rice, shall, before the landing on board of any such articles, file with the collector of the port from which the vessel is to sail, a copy of her register, with a declaration of the names of the owners and officers thereof, the place of their birth and of their residence for the preceding year, together with the port or place to which the said vessel proposes to sail. The said declaration shall also set forth the quantity and value, in Confederate currency, of the cargo proposed to be taken out, as also the consent of the said owners, that one-half of the tonnage of the said vessel may be employed by the Confederate Government for its own use, both on the outward and homeward voyage, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned. The collector shall submit a statement as to the owners and officers to the military command ant of the port, and if he shall not object to their loyalty, or to the sailing of the vessel, for reasons of military necessity, the collector shall grant a permit for the lading of the said vessel, one-half for account of the owners and one-half for account of the Confederate States.

2. Before the said lading shall be completed, the owners of the vessel shall execute to the Confederate States a bond in double the value of the vessel, with security deemed adequate by the collector, conditioned that she will pursue the voyage designated, and that she will return with reasonable dispatch to a Confederate port, after her outward cargo shall be discharged with a cargo, consisting one half of articles not prohibited by the laws of the Confederate Government, and the other half of such articles as the Government shall offer for shipment from such port, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned.

3. Each shipper of any portion of the cargo proposed to be laden on board the said vessel, shall, before the lading thereof, make application to the collector for a permit to lade the same, which application shall declare the articles to be shipped, and the quantity and value thereof in Confederate currency, the port of destination, and the name of the consignee. A permit shall then be granted by the collector if the application is deemed satisfactory. The lading shall be had under the inspection of a revenue officer, who shall be charged with the duty of seeing that the goods laden conform to the permit.

4. Before the completion of the lading on board or the granting a clearance, each shipper of any portion of the cargo shall execute and deliver to the collector a bond to the Confederate States, in double the value of his shipment in Confederate money, with security deemed adequate by the collector, with condition that at least one half the net proceeds of said shipment shall be invested in goods or articles not prohibited by law, and said goods or articles shall be shipped by the same or some other vessel to the Confederate States within sixty days from the unlading of said cargo; or that the said half of the net proceeds shall be paid in coin or sterling exchange to the proper agent of the Confederate States, to be reimbursed to the shipper by the delivery to him of cotton at the port of departure in the Confederate States, at the rate of ten pence sterling per pound for middling uplands.

5. The freight to be paid by the Confederate States on all cotton and tobacco shipped from a Confederate port shall be five pence sterling per pound, payable on delivery at the port of destination, in coin or sterling exchange. Return freight shall be at the rate of 25*l.* per ton, payable on its delivery in a Confederate port, in cotton at ten pence sterling per pound for middling uplands, and at a proportionate price for cotton of other qualities. In calculating the ton of freight by weight, 2,240 pounds shall be allowed; by measure, forty cubic feet shall be allowed.

6. If the outward bound vessel shall consent, at the request of the Government, to take two-thirds of her cargo for account of the States, the outward freight shall be six pence sterling per pound, and whenever the Government is not prepared to fill up any portion of the tonnage reserved for its use at the time at which any vessel may be made ready to sail, her owners may fill up the same on their own account: but no vessel shall, without consent of the Government, sail on her outward voyage until one-third of her cargo shall be laden for the use of the Government.

7. The rates of freight for articles other than cotton and tobacco shall be adjusted at the same relative rate and payable in the same way.

8. The Government reserves the right to limit or prohibit the shipment of rosin, turpentine, or any manufacture thereof, whenever deemed dangerous to its own shipment.

9. Upon the completion of the lading of the vessel, and before receiving her clearance, there shall be delivered to the collector, in addition to the usual manifest, another setting forth the names, ages, and description of her officers and crew, and of every passenger intending to sail in her. The said last-mentioned manifest shall be delivered to the commandant of the port, who shall thereupon cause the entire vessel to be searched, and if satisfied that the parties on board are persons who may safely be permitted to leave the Confederacy, and that the passengers have the proper passports, he shall certify the same on the manifest and return the same to the collector, whereupon, and not before, a clearance shall be granted to the vessel, and he shall be permitted to sail.

10. The owners of each vessel, and of each portion of a cargo sailing from a Confederate port, shall be allowed to take up their respective bonds, by producing to the collector the certificate of the proper agent of the Confederate Government at the port of delivery, setting forth the particulars, showing that the said party has complied with the obligations of the said bond so far as the same was practicable, and the collector, upon being duly satisfied, shall be authorised to surrender the said bonds.

11. Nothing in these regulations shall be so construed as to conflict with the proviso of the law, which declares "that nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account;" nor shall a bond be required of a State in any case.

12. The penalties of all bonds executed in conformity with these regulations, shall be recoverable in full on proof of breach of the conditions of the bond, and without proof of any damage suffered by the Confederate States in consequence of such breach, and all bonds shall be executed in such form as to give effect to this regulation.

13 Vessels sent into the Confederacy for the purpose of exporting cotton received in payment of any Confederate bond or obligation shall be subject to these regulations only so far as relates to such portion of the tonnage, if any, as may remain vacant after the lading of the cotton received in payment as aforesaid.

14. The regulations for overland commerce with neutral countries will be issued separately, within a few days.

Treasury Department, C. S. A.
RICHMOND, March 16, 1864.

THE following additional regulations are established to carry out the act to impose regulations upon the foreign commerce of the Confederate States, and to provide for the public defence, approved February 6, 1864:

The bond required by the second article of the regulations shall be in one half the value of the vessel, and that required by the fourth article shall be in the single value of the shipment; and the security which the Collector may accept may be either personal security, or a mortgage of the vessel, or a transfer of the Bills of Lading, or of cotton, tobacco, or Confederate securities.

2 Whenever any vessel shall bring into the Confederate States an entire cargo for account of the Confederate States, the owners of the said vessel, and the shippers of her cargo, shall be relieved from the bonds previously given to invest and bring in one-half the net proceeds of her outward cargo, and the certificate of the agent of the Treasury Department at the port of lading, that such cargo was duly shipped in pursuance of the regulations, shall authorise the collector to cancel and surrender the said bonds.

Approved, March 16, 1864.

AN ACT TO PROHIBIT THE IMPORTATION OF LUXURIES, OR OF ARTICLES NOT NECESSARIES OR OF COMMON USE.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That from and after the first day of March next it shall not be lawful to import into the Confederate States any brandy, wines, or other spirits, or any other article specified in schedule A of an act entitled "An act to provide revenue from commodities imported from foreign countries," approved May 16, 1861, or any goods, wares, or merchandise, enumerated in schedule B of said act, except the following articles:—All things for medicinal purposes, camphor refined, pickles, molasses, pepper, pimento, cloves, nutmegs, cinnamon, and all other spices; soap, Castille, Windsor, and all other toilet soaps; sugar of all kinds; syrup of sugar; galloons, laces, knots, stars, tassels, tresses and wings of gold and silver, or imitations thereof, intended for uniforms of officers in the military and naval service.

SEC. 2. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles enumerated in schedule C of said act: Beer, ale, and porter; muffs and tippets, and all other manufactures of fur, or of which fur shall be a component part, except caps and hats; carpets, carpetings, hearth rugs, bedsides, and other portions of carpeting, of any kind or description; carriages and parts of carriages; cider and other beverages not containing alcohol; clocks and parts of clocks; cotton laces, cotton insertings, cotton trimmings, or laces of thread and other material; coral, manufactured; dolls and toys of all kinds; fire crackers, sky rockets, Roman candles and all other similar articles used in pyrotechnics; furniture, cabinet and household; glass, coloured, stained, or painted; India matting of all sorts; jet and manufactures of jet, and imitations thereof; jewellery, or imitations thereof; manufactures and articles of marble, marble paving tiles, slabs, or blocks, and all other marble; matting, China or other floor matting and mats made of flags, jute, or grass; paper hangings, paper for walls, and paper for screens or fire boards; paving and roofing tiles and bricks, and roofing slates and fire bricks; thread lacings and inserting; velvets of all kinds.

SEC. 3. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles, enumerated in schedule D of said act: Angola, Thibet, and other goats' hair, or mohair, unmanufactured; bananas, cocoa nuts, plantains, and oranges; cabinets of coins, medals, gems, and collections of antiquities; diamonds, mosaics, gems, pearls, rubies, and other precious stones and imitations thereof, set in gold or silver or other metals; engravings, bound or unbound; rattans and reeds; paintings and stationery; leaf and unmanufactured tobacco and cigars; or the following articles enumerated in schedule E. Diamonds, cameos, mosaics, pearls, gems, rubies, and other precious stones and imitations thereof, when not set.

SEC. 4. None of the manufactures of metal, designed as either household or personal ornaments, shall be admitted; and in order to confine importations to articles of necessity and of common use, the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the maximum foreign prices at which and within which importations of goods manufactured wholly or partly of cotton, flax, wool, or of silk, and designed for wearing apparel, and not herein prohibited, may be made, and beyond which importations thereof shall not be made: Provided, That articles herein allowed to be imported shall not be impressed by the Government or its agents after they have reached the Confederate States: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any importation for the use or account of the Confederate States, or either of them: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to any articles which have been or shall be shipped, without knowledge of the passage of this act, before the first day of March next, but which shall arrive in a Confederate port after that day.

SEC. 5. That whenever any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, after the first day of March next, be imported into the Confederate States, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or shall, after said first day of March next, be put on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, with the intention of importing the same into the Confederate States, all such articles, as well as all other articles on board the same ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, belonging to the owner of such prohibited articles, shall be forfeited, and the owner thereof shall, moreover, forfeit and pay double the value of such articles.

SEC. 6. If any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, nevertheless, be on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, arriving after said first day of March next in the Confederate States, and shall be omitted in the manifest, report, or entry of the master, or the person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, or shall be omitted in the entry of the goods owned by the owner, or consigned to the consignee of such articles, or shall be imported or landed, or attempted to be imported or landed, without a permit, the same penalties, fines, and forfeitures shall be incurred, and may be recovered, as in the case of similar omission or omissions, landing importation, or attempt to land or import, in relation to articles liable to duties on their importation into the Confederate States.

SEC. 7. Every collector, naval officer, surveyor, or other officer of the customs, shall have the like power and authority to seize goods, wares, and merchandise imported contrary to the intent and meaning of this act, to keep the same in custody until it shall have been ascertained whether the same have been forfeited or not, and to enter any ship or vessel, dwelling-house, store, building, or other place, for the purpose of searching for and seizing any such goods, wares, and merchandise subject to duty; and if any person or persons shall conceal or buy any goods, wares, or merchandise, knowing them to be liable to seizure by this act, such person or persons shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a sum double the amount or value of the goods, wares, and merchandise so concealed or purchased.

SEC. 8. The following additional oath or affirmation shall be taken by masters or persons having charge or command of any ship or vessel arriving at any port of the Confederate states after said first day of March next, viz.: "I further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board [insert the denomination and name of the vessel] any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board [insert the denomination and the name of the vessel] any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, or merchandise on board of the said vessel, or of which shall have been imported in the same, I will immediately, and without delay, make due report thereof to the collector of the port of this district."

SEC. 9. After said first day of March next, importers, consignors, or agents, at the time of entering goods into the Confederate States, shall take the following additional oath, viz.: "I also swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, amongst the said goods, wares, or merchandise, imported or consigned as aforesaid, any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover any such goods, wares, or merchandise among the said goods, wares, and merchandise so imported or consigned as aforesaid, I will immediately and without delay report the same to the collector of this district."

SEC. 10. All penalties and forfeitures arising under this act may be sued for and recovered, and shall be distributed and accounted for, in the manner prescribed by the act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage;" and such penalties and forfeitures, mitigated or remitted, in like manner and under the like conditions, regulations, and restrictions as are prescribed, authorised, and directed by the act entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned."

SEC. 11. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

Approved, February 6, 1864.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company is formed for the purpose of purchasing and developing certain new and valuable Patents for Improvements in the Drawing and Shaping of Metals, and for the machinery employed therein. By this process metal tubes can be produced from the fineness of a needle to the size required for the largest ordnance, and its products may be applied to numberless other uses, with infinitely increased strength and diminished cost.

The Patentees, in order to afford those interested a means of testing the commercial value of their mode of manufacture, have erected a powerful hydraulic draw bench, of 600 tons pressure, at temporary works in London, 67 Willow Walk, Bermondsey, where it has been seen in operation, in consequence of which applications have been received for licenses and machinery, and from these sources alone a large annual income cannot fail to be derived.

Samples of the manufacture can be seen at the Company's Offices.

Further particulars are given in the detailed Prospectus.

Applications for Shares must be made either to the Secretary or the Brokers of the Company.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

DRAWN STEEL TUBES.

From The Times, February 25, 1864.

The whole process is neither an invention nor a discovery, but simply a most valuable development of our present means of manufacture, and one which we think will prove as lucrative to its patentees as it will undoubtedly be most useful to our steel-producing districts. Just now, however, when our improvements in artillery have taken us to a point at which wrought iron can help us no further, and when all inventors are looking for a steel lining to their guns, this new process is likely to be regarded with unusual interest. If, as the patentees claim, their process can draw homogeneous steel tubes of 8 in. and 10 in. diameter, the long-vexed question of trying to make wrought-iron guns to stand their rifling would appear to be near its settlement. The perfect ease and immense strength with which the common rifles and fowling-pieces can be lined with steel tubing is shown at the Works at Bermondsey. The patentees of the machine intend putting up at once a press and dies by which taper steel barrels for the Enfield rifle can be drawn in one piece. More, however, is to be gained by drawing steel tubes for the artillery, though neither guns nor rifles open up such a field of profit as is likely to be found in the everyday mercantile wants of Sheffield and Birmingham. Steel tubes, badly and expensively as they are now made, are still an everyday want in the hardware districts, and it is only their cost, and the uncertainty of their production, which puts a tolerable limit to their use. If by this process they can be produced of more than double the strength of the present steel tubes, and at the same price as gas piping, their uses in manufacture would seem to be almost endless. For tubing to boilers alone there is enough work to be done to keep all the hydraulic machinery in England, if fitted up to draw steel tubes, going for the next twelve months.

AMERICA.

THE smoke clears away from the great battle-field of Virginia, and we see how little cause there was for the Yankee shouts of victory. On May 14, at Washington, General Lee's army was represented as disorganised and flying, with the legions of Grant in rapid pursuit. Lee was wounded, and Longstreet dead. 'Our cavalry and infantry,' said the Federal despatch from which we copy, 'are capturing hundreds and thousands of prisoners. The rebel killed and wounded have all fallen into our hands.' The rear of Lee's column was seen leaving Spottsylvania Court House, and it was believed that it would not stop short of Richmond. The New York Herald of May 14 said: 'The end approaches. A few days more of success, and the once formidable army of General Lee in Virginia must submit to the inevitable fate which overwhelming numbers, splendid generalship, indomitable valour, and an almost unprecedented combination of disasters have cut out for it. The official despatches of Mr. Stanton convey intelligence so positive and reliable that we can come only to the one conclusion—namely, that the rebel army of Virginia, being driven at all points, whole divisions, brigades, and batteries captured, its communications cut off in every direction, and every chance of reinforcements or supplies reaching it being utterly gone, must surrender to the conquering forces of General Grant.' This was the news the Washington Government sent to Europe. The arrival of the Scotia has changed the scene. General Lee, unwounded, had not retreated, but was in his strong entrenchments at Spottsylvania Court House. Grant was waiting for reinforcements, hastily forwarded from every quarter, to secure his own position or enable him to renew the conflict. Butler was driven back from Drury's Bluff to the cover of his gunboats. Sigel had been defeated by Breckenridge, and driven across the Shenandoah. Beauregard had passed through Richmond, and was supposed to have joined his forces to those of General Lee. Gold, in New York, went up to 182, and a panic succeeded the elation based on falsehood.

THE battle of May 6, if not a complete Confederate success, was very near, and bore many of the fruits of, a victory. The Federal right wing was first assailed, then the left, then the centre. For a whole day, General Lee hurled his legions against the Federal lines, and not always in vain. At the close of the day he shattered the Federal right, broke through Seymour's brigade, outflanked and drove it back upon Shaler's, broke that too, and captured both officers with a great portion of their commands. The Tribune's account says: 'Firing of musketry broke forth in heavy and repeated volleys, mingled with the sound of which came that familiar yell which indicates a rebel charge, and as the sounds grew rapidly nearer it was evident that General Sedgwick had experienced the misfortune which had been anticipated the entire day. Soon the 6th corps came rushing in a disorderly mass out of the woods, some weaponless, some hatless, all panic-stricken and pale, with extended neck and arms, with drooping heads, some indignantly or angrily shouting to their comrades, charging them with cowardice and dishonour. The crowds rushed through the valley and up the opposite hill, a part only gathering resolution enough to make a stand upon the summit.'

Another despatch says: 'The charge of Longstreet was completely overwhelming and crushing. Solid masses of infantry were hurled upon General Hancock's line with an impetuosity which nothing could withstand. Night closed the conflict: and because Grant was not utterly routed, the Washington authorities telegraphed victory.'

THE position taken by General Lee after the battles of the Wilderness, in which, from chosen and sheltered positions, he inflicted such terrible losses upon the Federal army and twice very nearly defeated them, is so strong in itself and has been so well fortified, that General Grant had not up to the 18th ventured to renew the attack. The reinforcements sent him were believed to equal his losses, and sixty tons of field ammunition were sent from Washington. A siege train of 200 guns had also been demanded, and a strong force of engineer officers. Instead of immediate victory, six weeks are now required to take Richmond, which General Grant hopes to have by July 4. Of the supposed retreat of General Lee, a New York journal says: 'His retreat involves recuperation; Grant's advance involves exhaustion. Richmond is not yet captured even in the loose theories of our over-sanguine contemporaries; but if it is written that it shall be captured, its doom is traced upon the book of fate in letters of blood, and the wail of bereavement all over the North will mingle with the cry of rejoicing. And beyond its capture the terrors of war loom far away into the shadowy future.' A well-informed Washington correspondent says: 'At the close of the tenth day's battle the Confederates held their own, and Grant's army was so exhausted, he determined to rest and strengthen his depleted corps. I am sure that Lee was also in need of rest; but we all know if Grant had offered battle on Friday, Lee would have accepted. It is doubtful if the present lull is not as advantageous to Lee as it is to Grant, as it gives him an opportunity to repair the railroads said to have been broken by Sheridan. He can also bring up supplies, of which he must stand in need, and reinforcements, if there are any to spare from other points.'

THE comparative losses of the two armies are not easy to estimate. Those of General Grant are admitted to be immense—from 40,000 to 80,000. In his official despatches General Lee returns grateful thanks to a merciful Providence that his losses were small. Fighting on his own chosen ground, every foot of which was well known, behind formidable entrenchments concealed in dense woods, the Confederates were generally protected, while the Federals, attempting to carry breastworks and rifle pits, exposed to enfilading fires, were mown down by thousands. When Burnside attempted to carry the Confederate works on Thursday, his men were exposed to this most destructive of all fires, until, as at Fredericksburg, they reeled, staggered, and fell in heaps. The Federals make only wild guesses of their aggregate losses, but we can form some idea of them from separate items. Three hundred buildings in Washington were filled with 20,000 wounded. There were 15,000 at Fredericksburg, filling houses and churches, and even encumbering the streets; and many at Alexandria and other places. The 140th New York regiment lost 300 men and 10 line officers. The 9th Massachusetts went into the fight with 600 muskets and came out with 93. The 62nd Vermont had 131 left of 530. The 4th Michigan, of 277, saved but 17. And so of many others. Among the Federal killed were Generals Sedgwick, Wadsworth, Price, Hays, and Webb. Of killed there were 5 generals and 16 colonels and lieutenant-colonels. Of wounded, 11 generals and 51 colonels and lieutenant-colonels. The names of killed and wounded inferior officers fill whole columns.

We have no indication of Southern losses, except the declaration of General Lee that they were small. General Jenkins was killed, and General Longstreet severely but not dangerously wounded by their own men in mistake. General Sam Jones is also among the killed, and the cavalry General J. E. B. Stuart was killed in a fight with Sheridan's cavalry expedition, and buried in Richmond on the 13th. General E. Johnson and Brigadier-General Stuart are prisoners.

NEW YORK and the whole North were thrown into consternation on the 18th by the appearance of a proclamation of President Lincoln, declaring the campaign in Virginia ended, appointing a day of fasting and prayer, and ordering a draft of 400,000 men. The document was denounced a forgery, but it turns out to have been very close upon, and, for the Government, an annoying anticipation of, the truth: for Secretary Stanton announces that a draft will be necessary on the 1st of July to replace the 100-days' volunteers, and make good other losses.

GENERAL MEADE, as the result of Federal operations to May 13, claims to have taken 18 guns, 22 colours, and 8,000 prisoners, including two general officers. The Confederates had taken several guns, about half this number of prisoners, including two or three generals, and inflicted losses on the enemy out of all proportion to their own, and maintained their position, which in itself was a substantial victory. For an invading army not to beat, is to be beaten.

THE death of General J. E. B. Stuart, killed in an encounter with the Federal cavalry May 11, is thus described by a correspondent of the Richmond Enquirer: 'Generals Stuart and Fitz Lee came up with the enemy at Yellow Tavern, but, being terribly outnumbered, they managed to maintain their ground and inflict heavy loss upon the enemy. Here, in one of those desperate charges, at the head of a charging column, the gallant and chivalrous Stuart fell, mortally wounded—an irreparable loss to our cause. His many gallant and daring deeds and glorious exploits will challenge the admiration of the world. He was best known and loved by his troopers. His frank and agreeable face always cheered them in the camp, the march, and the bivouac. His bright flashing eye, and clear ringing voice, inspired and nerved them in the hour of battle.

A noble soul to liberty born—
A noble soul for liberty died!'

THE Confederate ram Albemarle, with her tender, the Cotton Plant, and her prize the Bombshell, were attacked near the mouth of the Roanoke on May 5, by a fleet of seven Federal gunboats. One of them, the Sassacus, attempted to run down the ram, but was riddled by the steel-shotted 100-pounders of the Confederate, had one of her boilers penetrated, and many of her crew killed or scalded. Per contra, the Bombshell, taken at Plymouth, was recaptured.

GENERAL SHERMAN in Georgia, after trying in vain to take Dalton and Resaca by direct attack, succeeded, May 12, in flanking General Johnston, and compelling their evacuation, with a loss of 3,000. This is the Federal account. A Confederate despatch says: 'The affair at Resaca was a plan of General Johnston to catch the enemy. Snead Gap was left open, troops sent to the rear of it, and everything prepared to meet him in front. It is not yet known whether the enemy is bagged.' General Johnston's army is believed to be 60,000 strong, including 15,000 militia. General John Morgan, the celebrated raider, is in command of a brigade of infantry. The Confederate troops are in fine spirits, and no fears are felt for the result.

THE report that General Sigel had destroyed a portion of the West Virginia Railway turns out as false as most reports of Federal victories. He was defeated on the 15th with the loss of 600 killed and wounded and 5 pieces of artillery, at Newmarket, by the forces of Echols and Imboden, under General Breckenridge. He effected a 'retrograde movement to Strasbourg.'

ADMIRAL DAHLGREN took advantage of the absence of General Beauregard and a large portion of the South Carolina troops in Virginia, to make a furious attack on the defences of Charleston, on the 14th, with a large fleet of monitors, with what result has not been heard.

THE news from the Trans-Mississippi department continues highly favourable to the Confederates. General Banks was reported to be retreating to Brashear City: a regiment sent to his aid had been captured with its transport; and General Smith, at last dates, was expected to make a desperate attempt to fight his way to the Mississippi. General Magruder was expected with a considerable force from Texas, to assist in that department.

THE communications of General Lee, reported to be partially interrupted by a strong force of Federal cavalry under General Sheridan, had been quite restored at the last dates, and the raiders driven with severe loss to the shelter of General Butler's gunboats on the James River. The raiders, as usual, lived on the country they traversed, and, when not engaged in a running fight with or rapid retreat from the Confederates, were a terror to the women and destructive to hencoops and smokehouses. They even left their mortally wounded to be nursed by those they came to plunder and destroy.

THE Confederate Congress has passed resolutions thanking General Forrest and the officers and men of his command, for their important services in West Tennessee and Kentucky. At last accounts this able commander, with General Roddy and a force of 10,000, was threatening Huntsville and Decatur in General Sherman's rear in Northern Alabama.

WHILE the New York Herald, like other Northern papers, was filled with shouts of victory, its own correspondents with General Grant's army, were sending despatches like the following of 'Monday, May 9, 1864: We have now been out six days, and have been fighting continuously. We have succeeded in penetrating some fifteen miles into the rebel territory, and have fifty miles further to go to get to Richmond. We have eaten and used up a very large proportion of the supplies which we took with us. If the rebels give us as much trouble on the rest of the route as they have thus far our chances for success are slim indeed.

'Our losses have been terrible. I hardly dare to give my own opinion as to the numbers; but I think I am within bounds when I give the estimates of those who are supposed to know, as follows:—Killed, 3,000; wounded, 18,000; missing, 6,000. Total, 27,000.'

THE Federal armed transport Harriet A. Weed was destroyed by two torpedoes, twelve miles below Jacksonville, Florida, May 9. She was instantly and totally destroyed, and most of those on board killed or wounded.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN and General Fremont have both been dismissed from the Federal service, by a resolution of Congress, to the great anger of their respective partisans, who are more than ever determined to give them Presidential nominations.

COMMANDER JOHN K. MITCHELL has just been assigned to the command of the Confederate naval forces in the James River; Commander Pegram to the ironclad Virginia; Commander Rootes to the ironclad Fredericksburg; Lieutenant-Commander W. H. Paulding to the ironclad sloop Richmond.

ENGLAND.

WE have already stated that Her Majesty's Government has put an end to the expected litigation in the case of the Attorney-General v. Laird, by purchasing the steam rams El Toussin and El Monassir. Last Thursday the Solicitor-General came into the Court of Exchequer at Westminster and said, 'I have to inform the Court that the case of the Attorney-General v. Laird and others, in respect of which your lordships were pleased to order a trial at bar at the instance of the Attorney-General, will not now be tried.' The Lord Chief Baron said, 'Not at all? neither in banco nor at nisi prius?' The Solicitor-General replied 'No. In pursuance of an arrangement come to between the Crown and the claimants, the case has been withdrawn, and the judgment of the Court will pass for the Crown. It is right I should state that the object of Her Majesty's Government is not to punish individuals by fine or forfeiture, but to prevent vessels issuing from our ports to make war on nations with which we are at peace. That object has been obtained in this instance, and, therefore, the case is at an end.' We have quoted the exact words used by the Solicitor-General, in order that the sequel of the story may be fully appreciated. The law officer of the Crown is presumed to be capable of expressing in intelligible language that meaning which he desires to convey. That the Solicitor-General from some cause failed to do so may be collected from what follows. On Friday, the Attorney-General with Sir Hugh Cairns, Q.C., came into Court and desired to make a statement with reference to what had fallen from his colleague on the previous day. He said that the Solicitor-General did not mean to convey the impression that the formal steps of entering judgment for the Crown had either been actually taken at the time or that the form had been finally resolved on. He would state in a few words the true state of the affair. The Crown had asserted that there was a valid seizure for a valid cause of forfeiture. The claimants had to the last asserted, and still asserted, that there was no such valid cause of forfeiture: but the matter had been by arrangement withdrawn from the cognisance of the Court, so that no determination of it would be necessary, and that had been done upon the footing that the Crown had agreed to pay to the claimants the value which the Crown themselves had placed upon the property, and that, too, entirely without prejudice to the position of the Crown or the claimants with regard to that question that would have required to be tried, if the arrangement had not been made. The mode of doing it and giving effect to that arrangement had not been finally arrived at, but no mode would be adopted that would in any degree whatever authorise any one to say that there was any admission by the claimants that it was a valid forfeiture. The Lord Chief Baron observed, 'that the explanation was necessary after what was stated by the Solicitor-General, for undoubtedly his statement was, that the claim on the part of the claimants was withdrawn, and therefore the seizure stood as an uncontested seizure of the vessels: the Solicitor-General had unquestionably used the words "the claim had been withdrawn," there was no doubt about that.' Baron Martin also said, that 'he could perfectly well understand how the misapprehension did arise, from the last two or three words used by the Solicitor-General.'

The learned Attorney-General seems to be as unfortunate in being dragged into difficulties by his colleagues as he is skilful in rescuing them from their difficulties.

THE members of the Conference on the Danish question met on Saturday last at the official residence of the first Lord of the Treasury, at one o'clock, and sat till half-past three. All the plenipotentiaries were present. The Conference was to meet again to-day.

M. BILLE, the Envoy of His Danish Majesty, has, by a letter dated May 23, notified to Earl Russell that the blockade of the ports of Cammin, Swinemunde, Wolgast, Griefswalde, Stral-und, Barth, Dantzig, and Pillau in the Baltic, as well as the blockade of the ports and inlets in the Duchies of Slesvig and Holstein, which were raised on the 12th of the month in conformity with the stipulations of the suspension of hostilities, will immediately be reestablished on June 12 next, unless the negotiations carried on at the Conference of London should before that time have led to at least some preliminary agreement.

ON Saturday last the Volunteers were reviewed in Hyde Park by the Commander-in-Chief. The number of troops on the ground reached the extraordinary figure of 25,000 men. The London regiments paraded at their mustering places at 3.30, and marched to the various squares allotted for the formation of brigades. These brigades entered Hyde Park by the different gates situated on the north-east and south sides. In one hour from the appearance of the head of the first division the whole force had taken up position. The divisions were all drawn up in order by 5·30 P.M. Precisely at six o'clock the signal guns were fired, and at the same moment the Prince of Wales, the Commander-in-Chief, and Prince Louis of Hesse, surrounded by a brilliant staff, and followed by the Princess of Wales, the Princess Louis of Hesse, and the Princess Mary of Cambridge, appeared on the ground. General Sir Richard Airey, General Sir George Wetherall, and Generals Knollys, Pennefather, and Rumley were present. After the force had presented arms, the Commander-in-chief rode along the line and inspected the different regiments. After the inspection the troops marched past in quick time in open column. The Honourable Artillery Company took the lead with six light guns, and were followed by the Oxford and Cambridge University corps. The Prince of Wales marched past at the head of the brigade in the uniform of the Honourable Artillery Company. The Civil Service regiment came next with Lieutenant-Colonel Lord Berry at the head of it. Then came a force of light cavalry 100 strong from Surrey, Hertford, and Middlesex. The Middlesex Artillery Volunteers then paraded in charge of twenty guns of heavy calibre, and were followed by a brigade of artillery volunteers 2,000 strong, armed with carbines. After these came the various volunteer regiments of the metropolis, and last came the provincial corps, consisting of the 6th Lancashire (1st Manchester), 2nd battalion 1st Nottingham (Robin Hood), 3rd battalion 1st Warwick (Birmingham), 1st Derbyshire, and 5th battalion 33rd Lancashire (2nd Manchester). There were also regiments from Herefordshire, Somersetshire, Berkshire, and Essex. The steadiness and admirable bearing of the provincial regiments gained the most hearty applause from the spectators. The progress made in drill and appointments, as well as in numbers, since the day when Her Majesty reviewed 14,000 volunteers in Hyde Park, now four years since, was such as to astonish and delight those who place faith in the citizen soldiery. The ground was kept by the Royal Horse Guards (Blue), some companies of foot guards, and a detachment of lancers. The first division was commanded by Major-General Eyre; the second division, by Major-General Lord F. Paulet, C.B., who commanded the British troops in Canada in 1862; and the third division, by Major-General Rumley. The whole force was under the command of Lieutenant-General Sir J. L. Pennefather, K.C.B. After the review the troops left the park with rapidity and without confusion. No better proof could be given of the skill of the officers or the discipline of the men; and it was difficult to doubt but that the army of 25,000 volunteers would be capable of taking the field with credit to themselves and the country.

ON Monday, May 30, Louis Philippe Albert d'Orleans, Comte de Paris, the eldest son of the late Duc d'Orleans, and therefore grandson of Louis Philippe and heir of the house of Orleans, was married to his first cousin, the Princess Isabelle of Spain. The marriage was celebrated in the Roman Catholic Chapel at Kingston. The Queen Marie Amélie was present at the ceremony, which was also attended by Marie Louise Fernande, Duchesse de Montpensier, the sister of the Queen of Spain and mother of the bride; by the Prince and Princess de Joinville, the Duc de Nemours, and the Duc d'Aumale. The Spanish, Belgian, Italian, Austrian, Prussian, Bavarian, Portuguese, and Saxon Ministers were present. Several members of the French and Spanish aristocracy also attended. The Marquis of Clanricarde, Earl Russell, Lord Stanley of Alderley, General Peel, and Earl St. Germains were the principal Englishmen at the ceremony.

AN error of a somewhat peculiar nature has been committed by a cotemporary which aspires to infallibility. Cardinal Wiseman, in his Pastoral, had quoted a passage from a letter of Garibaldi to the English nation, in which a comparison was drawn by the writer between the 'Papacy' and the 'goddess and temple of reason' of a kind by no means advantageous to the 'Papacy.' The Times, commenting on the Pastoral, was clearly at a loss how to turn the position of the Cardinal or to explain away the damning evidence of Garibaldi's folly; so it resorted to the simple method of denying the genuineness of the letter, and thereby charging the Cardinal with aiding his argument by a false quotation. 'Magna est veritas et prævalebit.' An apology to the Cardinal followed, and the journal condescended to explain how the mistake arose. It appears, marvellous though the statement may be, that the Times copied its own version of the address of Garibaldi from the Morning Post, and that this version contained 'the strange rhapsody;' while the individual who reviewed the Cardinal's denunciation relied on the version of another cotemporary, which for some reason or other omitted the expressions in question. When the accuracy of Cardinal Wiseman is impeached on such a ground as that, one does not wonder that even the Times should much regret the mistake made.

THE same auspicious weather which rendered the Derby Day in the highest degree enjoyable, gave pleasure to the large crowd of persons who assembled on May 27 to witness the race for the 'Oaks.' The first race of the day was set for half-past one o'clock, and just before that time the agent of the International Telegraph Company posted up, in the full view of the assembled multitude, the following announcement: 'America—New York, May 18.—Lee remains at Spottsylvania. Confederates attacked Butler, inflicting considerable loss, compelling him to retire to his lines. Sigel has also been defeated by the Confederates. Gold 82.' Immediately a buzz of excitement ran through the people as they read the words of the message, and at length the ring broke out into a tremendous cheer; and the news, spreading among the crowd, seemed to cause as much joy as ever did the victory of a popular favourite. The race for the 'Oaks' was set for three o'clock, and up to that time the betting proceeded with vigour, Fille de l'Air being made the favourite at 6 to 4, while 5 to 1 was taken about Teneriffe, 100 to 15 each about Saragossa and Tomato, and 10 to 1 about Breeze. It may be mentioned that for the Stakes there were 188 subscriptions; of these 19 were represented at the post, the remainder becoming forfeits at 25*l.* each. The total value of the Stakes was 5,175*l.* The length of the course was one mile and a half. On the lowering of the flag, Mr. W. Day's Teneriffe, by Marsyas, went away with the lead, followed by Fille de l'Air and Baron Rothschild's two fillies, Tomato and Breeze. At the end of half a mile Fille de l'Air took up the running, and Lady de Trafford, a daughter of Longbow, with Lord Zetland's pretty filly Saragossa, by Newminster, joined the leading division. However, Fille de l'Air, without much apparent difficulty, maintained her lead, and finally won by half a length, Breeze, who came with a rush in the last few strides, getting the second place, Tomato being third, and the elegant Molly Carew, a daughter of Wild Dayrell, being fourth. Then followed Lady de Trafford, Merry Wife, Tooi Tooi, and La Gazza Ladra. Poor Saragossa received a fearful wound on the fetlock at Tattenham Corner, and brought her career to an end. It is not necessary to make more than one observation on the fillies Breeze and Tomato. They were first and second in the One Thousand Guineas Stakes at Newmarket, but in that race Tomato beat her stable companion. Both are daughters of King Tom, the brother of Stockwell and Rataplan, and though Breeze presents points worthy of admiration, neither of the fillies comes up to the standard expected in the case of the best English mare of the year. Fille de l'Air is by Faugh a Ballagh out of Pauline, and is perhaps one of the most exquisite mares ever bred. She has size, symmetry, and strength, and her action is magnificent. Her career on the turf has been somewhat peculiar. Last year she began by winning the Woodcote Stakes at Epsom, beating Molly Carew. Next she was beaten for the Two-year-old Stakes at Epsom by Midnight Mass and Tomato. Then at Goodwood she won the Molecomb Stakes, and defeated the Scottish Chief. At Doncaster, she was beaten by Ely for the Champagne Stakes, and by Coast Guard for the Two-year-old Stakes. Then at Newmarket, carrying 9st., she beat Prince Arthur 8st. 10lbs., Ely 8st. 13lbs., Coast Guard 8st. 10lbs., and several other horses, proving herself to be the best two-year-old that had appeared in public. Her next appearance was at the Two Thousand Guineas at Newmarket, for which race she was made first favourite, but was defeated ignominiously, never having in fact galloped with her horses for more than a few hundred yards. Her performance on that occasion seemed altogether inexplicable, and the multitude imagined that the vaunted Fille de l'Air was a grand failure. Then at Paris Spring Meeting she ran nowhere in the Prix de la Grotte, won by Cascarilla. Her next appearance was in the French Oaks at Chantilly, a few weeks since, when she managed to win in a canter by four lengths. Now she has succeeded in defeating with ease all the English fillies for the great prize of the year. In the public mind this extraordinary alternation of victory and defeat generated grave suspicions, and from the result it seemed that Count F. de Lagrange, the owner of the mare, had foreseen the probability of danger. Immediately on the winning number being hoisted a fearful noise of mingled shouts, hisses, and groans arose, and a portion of the mob made a furious rush at the mare: with the speed of thought, however, a body-guard of pugilists, who had been provided for the purpose, surrounded the mare, and with sticks kept off the crowd, while foot and mounted police escorted rider and horse to the neighbouring enclosure. Count F. de Lagrange was prudent enough to leave the course immediately after the race, and thus avoided the risk of the treatment which would most certainly have been awarded to him by those individuals who regarded themselves as 'victims.' Fille de l'Air is engaged in the Grand Prix de Paris.

INDIA.

THE Viceroy, accompanied by the principal members of the Government, left Calcutta about the middle of April for Simla. During the preceding three months a most searching supervision had been exercised in all the departments, and many reforms inaugurated. There had been an absence of events in the political world. Public attention was arrested by the ravages of a frightful epidemic, which has been raging over a great part of Lower Bengal for some years. Its violence has increased year by year, till 36 per cent. of the population have fallen victims to it. The fever comes on suddenly, and the patient succumbs in from two to five days. Should he survive the attack, the disease returns at new and full moon. It is styled by the faculty 'a congestive remittent fever,' and by the natives mutan jwar. The fever has been generated by that most prolific cause of disease, namely, the total neglect of all sanitary rules. An able writer, in a letter to a cotemporary, in describing the carelessness of the native, says—'Close to the mud hut of the ryot is a hole where he places all filth and refuse. The hut itself is surrounded with jungle or bamboo, through which scarcely a breath of fresh air can ever penetrate. There is perhaps a tank here, covered with slime and vegetation, in which the people bathe and wash their clothes, and the water of which they daily drink. In the Mahometan quarters, the dead are buried on the borders of these tanks, and the graves are seldom made sufficiently deep to insure the people against poisonous exhalations from the interred bodies. The bodies lie so near the surface, that sometimes, as is well known, they are disinterred by jackals and dogs.' By this fever, whole villages are depopulated. Neither age nor youth can withstand the attack, and even unborn children fall victims to it. The commissioners are unable to persuade the people, and unwilling to compel them, to abandon their manner of life.

From advices just received we learn that 170 miles of the Indian telegraphic line from Bussorah to Bagdad still remain incomplete, and cannot be constructed, on account of the disturbed state of the intervening country, the Arabs having revolted against their Turkish masters. The Porte undertook the task of constructing the line through the Pashalic of Bagdad; but the Turks dare not venture into the country except in military force. There is also a break in the line at the first stage from Bagdad, between that place and Constantinople, owing to the extreme negligence of the Turks in executing the necessary repairs. It is said that the Arabs would not molest the English if they undertook the work themselves.

CHINA.

DETAILS have been received of the defeat of Major Gordon in his attack on Kintang. The garrison had sent in their submission, and Gordon had set out with a force of 800 men and two 32-pounders to take possession. However, reinforcements had been sent from Nankin to the town, and when Gordon arrived he was received with musketry shots instead of with open arms. Thereupon Gordon opened fire from his guns, and, after two hours, ordered his men to the assault. Three attacks were delivered, but in each case the troops were driven back in disorder. Ultimately, Gordon retired, with the loss of 14 officers and 115 men, to Leyang and thence to Fooshan. Gordon was wounded in the leg, and Colonels Kirkham, Tambelty, and Williams were also hit. Major Toute was killed. A report was current that Gordon had sustained a further serious reverse near Chiangzu. Hangchow had been evacuated by the rebels, who for a whole day had successfully withstood the assaults of the Franco-Chinese force. The Chekeang province was cleared of rebels.

FROM Japan we learn that a good understanding exists between the Tycoon and the Mikado. A council of six Daimios had assembled to report to the Government the wish of the nation in regard to the admission of foreigners.

AFRICA.

ACCOUNTS from Egypt represent, in the most glowing colours, all the improvements and advances made under the late and present Viceroy. A slow but practical revolution has been going on in that country during the whole of the last half century; and the mighty resources of the land have been skilfully applied by two generations of princes to the advancement of Egypt on the path of progress and civilisation. Most of the machinery used in the Western World for the better management and administration of the country, and for the economisation of labour, have been adopted by the present ruler. Not only the necessities, but even the luxuries of civilisation, have been taken up and constituted as a part of their social system; so that we may ere long expect to see Egypt step forth and demand a place among the European, or, to speak more accurately, the Mediterranean Powers.

Advices from Tunis dated the 23rd ult. state that the town is in a state of tranquillity, but that the Bey still persisted in his refusal to dismiss the remainder of his ministers. The Europeans residing near the coast are still obliged to take up their abode on board ship; the admirals of the various naval forces have decided to land troops, in order to protect their countrymen against pillage and anarchy. If this intention is carried out, the Italians will be requested to occupy the ports belonging to the Bey of Tunis.

We hear from Morocco that a despatch has been addressed to the Government of that country from the French Government, demanding satisfaction for the assassination of a Frenchman not far from Tetuan, and for the asylum afforded to an Arab chief, who took a leading part in the Algerian insurrection. France demands, 1st, Either the extradition of the assassins, or an indemnity of 500,000 francs; 2nd, The dismissal of the governor of Tetuan; 3rd, The surrender of the Arab chief. It is said that a French squadron will blockade the ports of Morocco if the satisfaction asked for is not given within forty days; but it is generally supposed that the Sultan will concede all that is demanded of him.

The English and the Emperor of Abyssinia have been fast friends for upwards of ten years, and the latter has, by the force of this friendship, found himself raised from the rank of a provincial governor to that of supreme ruler over the whole of Abyssinia. Indeed, he had shown his appreciation of our courtesy by rescuing our late consul, Plewden, from the hands of the rebels in Tigré, who had wounded and seized him. This occurred in 1860. From some unexplained reason the Emperor has completely changed his policy, and has commenced a general persecution of all British subjects within his territories, including our consul, Captain Cameron. He has ordered the Rev. Mr. Stern, a missionary from the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, to be publicly whipped. Captain Cameron had succeeded in getting a message conveyed to Massowah from Gondar, dated Feb. 14, stating that he was, with several other gentlemen, confined in chains, but that all were well.

ENGLISH SYMPATHY FOR THE SOUTH.—Go where you will, either to the clubhouses of Pall Mall, or to any knot of artisans conversing over their Sunday newspaper, you will find that the weight of sympathy rests with the South. 'Secesh' carries the day.—The Realm.

THE CONTINENT.

NEVER might mankind with so much justice as at present have cursed the hour when the various appliances of modern science were invented. Had it not been for the invention of steam power, the war in America could not have occurred in its present hideous proportions; if 'villanous saltpetre' had not been fashioned into gunpowder, the awful slaughter of the last few days could not have taken place; if printing-presses, penny posts, and telegraphs did not exist, we should not have to wade through the daily quagmire of untruths and absurd conjectures with which the home and foreign press teem. Let any man read carefully the pretentious statements made in the Vienna and Berlin journals with regard to the Conference of London, and then examine the authority on which these statements are made; he will stand aghast at the appalling difference between the insignificant foundations and the imposing superstructure. To take an instance, the German correspondents have chosen to assert that the personal union between the Duchies and the Kingdom of Denmark has been discussed and negatived, and that a second proposition has been made for dividing the Duchy of Slesvig into two parts by the river Schlei and the Dannewirke, whereof the northern part shall belong to the Danish monarchy, and the southern to Holstein; forming an independent State, which is to choose its own form of government by universal suffrage. Against this proposal the Austro-Prussian journals are extremely virulent; they will never willingly suffer a yard of land on which a German population exists to be under a foreign ruler; it would be, they say, to give up the whole principle for which so much blood has been shed. We recommend these ardent patriots to look for a moment to the other side of the Atlantic, where they will find territories which would endow two or three German kingdoms inhabited entirely by their beloved nation, but under the domination of Yankeedom. Why do they not take up the banner, and, crossing the ocean in their magnificent navy, demand a footing for the German Confederation in the centre of North America? The Monroe doctrine would for once at least find supporters and friends among men of common sense.

Again, we learn that the English Government has objected strongly to any scheme by which Kiel should become a Federal port, or a canal be cut through the south of the Peninsula between the Baltic and the North Sea. This objection has also been met by yells of indignation from the irate journalists, who see in it a new proof of the determination of England to put every obstacle in the way of a German navy.

A question of more immediate importance is that of the prolongation of the truce. It is stated, we know not on how good authority, that the Danish Government have declared their intention of resuming the blockade on the 12th instant, and of returning generally to a state of hostilities. Whether they think that the chances of war are likely to be more favourable to them than the methodical progress of a Conference, or whether any secret diplomacy has shown them a way out of their difficulties by this course, we cannot guess. Of one thing there is no doubt: the burden of war is, if anything, less onerous than the pettifogging tyranny of a truce to the inhabitants of the continental provinces of Denmark. Our private advices from Aarhuus state positively that the odious and unnecessary rigour with which the suspension of hostilities was inaugurated, is in no way lessened; and that, in spite of official Prussian denials, the military authorities have enforced, and still continue to enforce, the barbarous exactions which have made their name a byword in Europe. The denial referred to is in the following terms:—'Berlin, May 27.—The official enquiry instituted upon the statements of the French and English press—statements wittingly or unwittingly false—has proved that the Allies have executed every stipulation in the suspension of arms to the letter. Commerce, business, and government have been in no way impeded; no contributions have been levied since the date of the suspension; provisions and goods confiscated before that date have been kept, but not sold. The troops have been supplied by Prussian contractors; and a line of demarcation, in the fixing of which all interests were consulted, has been agreed upon between ourselves and the Danish General von Gerlach. The Commander-in-Chief of the Allied armies has of course put a stop to everything by which our military interests might have been prejudiced. The Danish authorities have made several attempts either to raise recruits or to levy customs' duties, but these abuses have been stopped. The Allies have always firmly opposed all Danish encroachment, but have rigorously acted up to all the stipulations of the arrangement of May 12.' That the Allies have put every impediment in the way of Danish action we can readily believe: a despatch from Copenhagen, dated May 24, illustrates the manner in which 'Danish encroachment is opposed;' from it we learn that, immediately on the arrival of the Danish commissioner for arranging the suspension of arms at Horsens, the Prussian head-quarters took their departure, without leaving any person with whom the commissioner could negotiate. This step was followed by the arrest of several Danish municipal officials.

OUR more distant readers, to whom the whole territorial question involved in the Dano-German war must appear absolutely contemptible, will very probably have lost sight of the magnificent Duchy of Lauenburg, another of the German principalities tied round the neck of the Kingdom of Denmark. The succession to this duchy has never been disputed, and it was once even a question whether the King of Denmark, though not recognised as Duke of Slesvig-Holstein, might not be represented in the German Diet as Duke of Lauenburg. Certain German agents, however, have, since that time, been at work in that petty duchy, and the effect of their intrigues is seen in a declaration transmitted through them from the 'Lauenburg Association' to the Federal Diet and to Herr von Beust, stating that they also are desirous of separation from Denmark. They affirm that the treaties which fixed the law of succession in Denmark had taken no notice of the laws of Lauenburg, and consequently that the Lauenburgers were not bound to recognise the present King of Denmark as their sovereign. Herr von Beust in his answer assured the Association that the result of the Conference would be eminently satisfactory to their wishes.

THERE is no diminution in the stubborn obstinacy of the Danes. On the 23rd ult., a deputation from Kolding arrived at Copenhagen for the purpose of imploring the King to defend the rights of Denmark when the question of peace supervenes, and protesting against the continuance of the truce. Similar addresses are expected from other towns of Jutland. We must bear in mind that these deputations come from the very country now occupied by the Germans, and we may judge what is the natural determination of the Danish spirit, and how violent the aversion to their foreign invaders.

IT is said that the Austrian Government are prepared to take the first lawful opportunity of reinforcing their fleet in the Baltic. Three new frigates are now almost ready to take the sea.

THE Grand-Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin has, it is said, expressed great disgust at the new law passed in his territory to enlarge the power of his nobility to inflict corporal punishment. The affair was, he says, quite unknown to him, and he was not made aware of it until after his return from Darmstadt. Some statistics have been given of the use of the rod in that duchy, from which it appears that in eight years about 2,000 persons were chastised for infraction of game laws only. These 2,000 persons divided amongst them some 30,000 blows, giving an average punishment of fifteen per man. A woman was lately beaten with rods for the offence of having a second illegitimate child. It is curious that there are more natural children born in Mecklenburg than in any other country proportionally to its population.

THE Russian Budget for the year 1864 has been lately published; the ordinary expenses are calculated at 364,000,000 roubles; the extraordinary military expenses at 37,000,000. To balance this we have 355,000,000 roubles of receipts, 18,000,000 of treasury bonds, and 28,000,000 loan; total 401,000,000 roubles, or about 40,000,000*l.*

The Russian Government appear to view with the utmost satisfaction the emigration of the Circassian people; the Grand-Duke Michael has visited Anapa in order to concert measures to bring about a second emigration to comprise 100,000 souls.

IT is expected that the policy of General Berg with regard to the treatment of the Poles will again come into favour, and that MM. Milutine and Tscherkaskoï will resign their offices of Civil Governor and Minister of the Interior for the kingdom of Poland. The chief objection to these gentlemen at first was that they knew nothing of Poland and the Polish language: the wretched people will now object that they know already only too much of General Berg and his policy.

WE have already stated that the Emperor of Russia is about to visit Kissingen in company with the Empress; we now hear that Prince Gortschakoff, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, will be in Germany at the same time, with his private secretary M. Hamburger.

PRINCE COUZA of the United Principalities, having dissolved his House of Representatives, applied to the people for a general vote on the new electoral law. The result of the suffrages is that 713,283 have voted in favour of the Prince's proposal, and 57 against it, while 53,563 have abstained from giving an opinion.

TURIN, May 25.—On this day the Minister of War, in answer to a question addressed to him by Signor Mordini, stated that the military force now under arms numbered 380,000 infantry, 80 batteries of artillery, and 19 regiments of cavalry. He added that this force was competent to defend the kingdom against any attack; but he was not sure that it was capable of taking the offensive without a foreign alliance. The state of the fortifications he declared to be excellent; the national guard was almost entirely placed on an active service footing. An official statement has been made of the position of the Treasury in December 1863. The receipts amounted to 2,433,000,000 francs, the expenditure to 2,668,000,000 francs, deficit 235,000,000 francs or 9,400,000*l.* We may add that 200,000,000 francs of the last loan authorised have not yet been issued on the Stock Exchange; the present stock stands at 69.10.

'PETER'S PENCE' have produced to the Pope since the year 1859 the sum of 37,630,000 francs, or rather more than 1,500,000*l.* Cardinal Antonelli has gone more at length into a defence of the Pope's language with regard to Poland, repeating in greater detail the observations of which he had already made use in reply to the Russian Ambassador.

THE second Conference held at Constantinople on the matter of the Principalities was opened by a speech from Ali Pacha; he declared that it was necessary to arrest in a summary manner the encroachments of Prince Couza, and to maintain the suzerainty of the Sultan and the rights of the guaranteeing Powers either by military occupation or by the agency of diplomacy. His sentiments were echoed by Sir Henry Bulwer, the English representative. The Marquis de Moustier, on the other hand, replied that allowances must be made in consideration of the existing circumstances, which perhaps compelled the Prince to take decisive action against a factious opposition. Ali Pacha responded by stating that the Porte was most anxious to adopt conciliatory measures. Shortly after this conversation the news arrived of the coup d'état executed by the Prince in dissolving his Chamber.

THE Queen's birthday was celebrated at the English Embassy in Paris by a grand dinner, at which most of the Ministers were present. The health of Her Majesty was proposed by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, and Lord Cowley reciprocated by a toast to the Emperor.

AN important decision was given by the Cour Impériale de Paris on the 14th ult., on a matter affecting sensibly the operations of speculators in the Bourse. The facts were shortly thus:—M. Anthier-Bellerose had effected purchases 'for the account' in French and Spanish Crédit Mobilier to the amount of 8,408,070 fr., through the agency of a M. Desmaze. When settling-day came, serious disagreements arose between the principal and his agent as to the amount to be paid by the former, and the matter was referred to arbitration. The decision was unfavourable to M. Bellerose, who appealed first to the Tribunal Civil de la Seine, and again to the Cour Impériale. In this court judgment was given for M. Bellerose, and the decision of the arbitrators and of the court below reversed. It was held that transactions 'for the account' were by the Code Pénal considered only as wagers, which will sustain no action at law, but are, on the contrary, punishable by fine or otherwise; that the very largeness of the sum in question was sufficient to prove the fictitious and illegal nature of the transactions; and, consequently, that the arbitrators were wrong in giving a decision by which the said transactions were recognised as legal. This decision has somewhat startled the denizens of the Stock Exchange, who find that in affairs of this questionable nature the court is determined to give full play to the injunctions of the Code Pénal.

The Corps Législatif has closed its session for 1864; it was dismissed by a speech from the Duc de Morny, its President, in which he enlarged on the necessity for kindliness and forbearance between members of that House, and descanted on the impartiality required from every person holding his own position. He knew, however, that 'party' meant 'partiality;' hence, both for president and members, it was necessary to temper the heat of party warfare by the courtesies of society.

SOUTH AND CENTRAL AMERICA.

ON May 14 a Spanish squadron took possession of the Chincha Islands, which belong to Peru, in consequence of the final disagreement between the Spanish and Peruvian diplomatists. An attempt was also made, but ineffectually, to surprise the Peruvian fleet at Callao. The Spanish commander has issued a proclamation, stating that the seizure of the islands has been effected in satisfaction of injuries suffered by his country at the hands of the Peruvian Government, but desires it to be understood that no obstacle will be placed in the way of trade. The Peruvian Congress has authorised the Government to raise a loan of $50,000,000, to augment the army to the number of 30,000, and the navy to 20 ships. It is hoped that an European Government will intervene to adjust the difficulties between the parties.

ADVICES from San Domingo inform us that the Spaniards are unsuccessful in their attempt to quell the insurrection. 9,030 of their sick and wounded have arrived at Havannah, and 2,000 at Porto Rico.

THE FEDERAL LOSSES.—The New York Correspondent of the Times, writing on May 13, observes: 'Hitherto the march of Grant though, if it be ultimately successful, it will be considered heroic—is the advance of a piece of mechanism. He sees no obstacles, and goes blindly and ruthlessly on. He trusts to nothing but superior numbers and hard fighting. The lives of his men are of no value. He throws them away by thousands, to gain half a mile of jungle. He has pushed on for five leagues, and paid about 9,000 lives for each. At every step he fights at a disadvantage, on ground of the enemy's choosing. But he fights on. His men are picked off by unerring sharpshooters from behind every tree, but his order is still to push forward. His Generals fall as if they were of no more account than private soldiers. Up to Tuesday evening—the seventh day of the conflict—he had lost 13 of them in killed, wounded, and prisoners, and at least 45,000 men. This loss is admitted by friends and admirers, while those who are neither incline to add 15,000 to that enormous estimate. But still he holds his way undaunted, seeing nothing, caring for nothing, but Richmond, which if he ever reach upon the terms of these seven days, he will reach without so much as a bodyguard—a solitary prisoner. The havoc committed in his ranks it is sickening to reflect upon. One New York regiment, the pride of the city, which not long since marched down Broadway amid flaunting banners, waving kerchiefs, loud huzzas, and the music of drum and fife, suffered so terribly that out of its full complement but four officers and fifteen men were left after half a day's fighting. Whole brigades have lost their officers and two-thirds of their rank and file, and, having none to lead them, have been incorporated with other brigades, only less cruelly decimated than themselves in having a brigadier left to reorganise their shattered remnants. . . . But the voice of wailing and lamentation is heard in too many thousands of households in this and all the cities of the North to permit unqualified approbation of a system of war so costly as this, or to silence the buzz of adverse criticism. If Grant's army, instead of a throbbing, thinking mass of human beings, were but an agglomeration of steel and iron—a monster steam-engine cunningly put together for purposes of destruction—its driver could not more deliberately urge it forward in its pitiless career.'

THE LARGEST-CIRCULATED AND CHEAPEST PAPER IN THE WORLD.—The paper having the largest circulation in the world is now said to be that issued by Secretary Chase. It is an extremely loyal publication, too. It supports both the Administration and the Union. And it is also the cheapest paper ever issued: it now costs only half as much as it did at first, and in a little while can be had for nothing.—Chicago Times.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THE MERSEY STEAM-RAMS.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Hodgkinson, in reference to the Solicitor-General's statement in the Court of Exchequer on Thursday last, that the case of the Attorney-General v. Laird and others, relating to the seizure of the Confederate rams, had been arranged, asked the Attorney-General whether the arrangement alluded to involved the purchase of those vessels, and, if so, whether only at their fair value, or at some higher price; whether the inducement to the Crown to make such arrangement was a doubt as to the construction and application of the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act with regard to equipping and arming vessels; whether it was part of the terms of arrangement that the alleged misdemeanour under the 7th section of the Foreign Enlistment Act should be condoned by the Crown, and that no claim for compensation for the seizure should be made by the defendants; and whether any legislation would be proposed in order to obviate in future the doubts and difficulties attending the construction and enforcing of the Foreign Enlistment Act, and thus prevent the arrangement of the recent case operating as a premium to shipbuilders to speculate on building vessels of war for belligerents.

The Attorney-General replied: In answer to the question of the hon. gentleman, it will be necessary for me to make a short statement to the House. The House is probably aware that in the month of September—some time before the seizure of these vessels—the Government applied to the persons representing themselves to be the owners of these ships, expressing their willingness, if they were really in the hands of bonâ fide owners, to treat for the purchase of them. At that time the overture so made by the Government was entirely ineffectual, and the seizure afterwards took place. No overture was subsequently made by the Government, but, on the other hand, an offer was made to the Government some time ago, offering the ships in question to the Government at a price named, which in the opinion of the Government did not represent their fair value, but was, in fact, a much higher price. That overture was simply and absolutely declined, and no further communications were made having any tendency to lead to an arrangement. The same party, and I may mention his name—M. Bravay—afterwards renewed the application in another form. He stated that he was desirous of knowing whether there were any pecuniary terms which the Government, on their part, would be willing to offer, by means of which the matter might be brought to an end, it being understood that no admission was to be asked from the one party to the effect that a violation of the law had been committed, or from the other in the contrary sense. Upon that the Admiralty, by the assistance they were able to command, ascertained what in their opinion would be the fair value of the vessels. They named that value, stating that they were prepared, for the reasons assigned, to put an end to the matter on the terms of paying the fair value of the vessels, but not on the terms of paying any other or greater price. That value was very much less than the sum named, and very much less than the parties stated they would be able to obtain from any other purchasers they could command. They accordingly closed with the offer made by the Government. The hon. gentleman further asks whether the inducement to the Crown to make such arrangement was a doubt as to the construction and application of the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act with regard to the equipping and arming of vessels. In answer to that question I may say that the House is perfectly well able to judge what the doubts are which appertain to the subject, but I may, in reference to this particular case, add that doubts as to the construction of the Act in regard to it had no considerable place in the motives which influenced the Crown to enter into the arrangement to which I have referred. The motives of the Crown were rather these,—when the question before the Courts was one of fact as well as of law, it would not have been in accordance with the experience of those acquainted with the uncertainty attending the administration of justice to assume with a too absolute confidence that the verdict, however strong the Crown might feel in the goodness of its case, would necessarily be in its favour, more particularly in a matter in which, to say the least of it, political feeling might exercise an influence on the result. The Crown could not, therefore, take it for granted that they would, as a matter of course, be successful, but I am, at the same time, bound to say that it was not any doubt in the mind of the law officers of the Crown that they had a good case in which they might hope to succeed that induced them on their side to enter into this arrangement. Besides the advantage to the public of securing those public objects for which, and not for the sake of inflicting any loss or forfeiture upon individuals, the seizures had been made, these considerations operated on the mind of the Crown. In the first place, there certainly had been prevailing great and considerable uncertainty in the public mind as to the extent to which a subject might go in the way of building or equipping ships for belligerents without infringing the law. It was well known that before these seizures took place opinions had been given by which individuals might have been encouraged to believe that they were safe in acting on a view of the law contrary to that on which the Government might be advised to act. Consequently, there were grounds for believing that British subjects in this country had offended against the law under a bona-fide impression that they were not doing so. Then the Crown had the case of the Pampero in Scotland in view, in which they had recently made arrangements upon the same as I venture to think them—liberal principles. It had allowed the ship to remain in the hands of the owners, not insisting upon the forfeiture, but upon the terms that security should be given against its belligerent employment. In this particular case the ships are good ships, which it is worth the while of the nation to possess at their fair and legitimate value. At the same time, it was felt that the possession of the ships by the nation would be more complete and satisfactory security against their employment for belligerent purposes than any other engagement into which it was possible to enter. Under these circumstances, the Crown not caring to make money out of the transaction, or to inflict pecuniary loss on the individuals concerned, its law advisers thought they were at liberty to deal with the defendants in this as they had done in another case. Of course, these defendants throughout insisted, and still insist, that they were guilty of no violation of the law, and no arrangement was made with them which entitles any one to say that they were guilty of any such violation. With regard to the next question, my answer is that no such condonation as that which it indicates was part of the terms of the arrangement. The Crown was not prosecuting for a misdemeanour; it was only proceeding against the ships. As regards the question of the claim for compensation for the seizure, I can only say that it is quite impossible that any such claim can be made on the footing on which the arrangement proceeded. I may add, in reply to the last question, that I hope it will not be found necessary to propose any new legislation on the subject. The Government confidently trust that all parties will profit by what has taken place, and that there may be no occasion for further legislation or prosecutions; but, undoubtedly, the Government are as much prepared and determined as ever to maintain the law as they understand and still understand it to be, if any future infraction of it should be attempted. They do not, I may further observe, think that this arrangement will operate as a premium to shipbuilders to speculate in building vessels of war for belligerents, because the parties to the arrangement have represented, and the Government have no reason to doubt the bona fides of the representation, that if the ships were entirely under their own control they would be able to bring them to a more profitable market, and to obtain for them a larger price than the Government consented to give. The price demanded by the owner was 300,000*l.* The price, as they stand, was fixed by the valuer for the Admiralty at 195,000*l.*, and for their completion in all respects a further sum of 25,000*l.* will be required.

[Perhaps the Solicitor-General thinks that anything is fair 'in love and law,' and that he was doing no more than his duty to his clients (the Government) in making such a statement in the Court of Exchequer as left the impression that the owner of the rams admitted he was in the wrong, and allowed a verdict to be taken for the Crown, and which is utterly false. Such a view, however, will not be endorsed by an honourable profession, and we doubt not the Solicitor-General is convinced by this time that his zeal has led him into error. We hope that the assertion of the Attorney-General that if the case had gone on to trial, 'to say the least of it, political feeling might exercise an influence on the result,' is altogether unwarranted. We cannot forbear to call attention to another point. The Attorney-General said 'there was no reason to doubt that if the ships had been free they could have been taken to a more profitable market.' What does this mean? That the Government took advantage of their power as prosecutors to get the ships for less than their market value, under threats of a long and ruinous litigation? If the Government deemed the vessels forfeited, they ought not to have abandoned the prosecution. If they felt their case too weak to go to trial, they ought to have paid a full price for the vessels.]

On Tuesday, Lord C. Paget said a supplementary estimate would be brought forward for the purchase-money of the steam-rams.

On Wednesday Mr. J. Tollemache asked the Attorney-General whether the offer to sell the Birkenhead ironclads at the price of 300,000*l.* was made to the Government by the owners, Messrs. Bravay, or by the builders, Messrs. Laird. He had referred to the report of what took place in the House on Monday evening, and he wished to have it clearly understood by all parties that the 300,000*l.* was not asked by the Messrs. Laird, and that they had no control whatever over the actions of the Messrs. Bravay.

The Attorney-General said the offer was made by the gentlemen who represented themselves to be the owners of the ironclads—the Messrs. Bravay. No such proposal emanated from the Messrs. Laird.

RECOGNITION OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Lindsey said he should postpone his motion until the 17th inst.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

On Thursday there was a short but interesting discussion. The Earl of Ellenborough, after complaining of the exactions of the Prussians in Jutland, remarked that it was the impression in Germany that we should under no circumstances go to war; and also that 'on all public questions relating to Germany, Her Majesty's Ministers have as much difficulty in carrying out a purely English policy as was experienced in former times, as history teaches, by the Ministers of our first two sovereigns of the House of Hanover.' He hoped that the Government would remove that impression, and prove that they were influenced by the same English feelings that animated George III.

Earl Russell did not defend the conduct of the Prussians in Jutland, but thought it better to wait until the Government of Denmark had furnished a statement. If Prussia set at defiance the suspension of arms, it was not only an insult to Great Britain, but to all the Powers represented at the Conference. His Lordship then defended his policy with regard to Poland, and took credit for not engaging in hostilities, for in his opinion, 'of all the wild, imprudent, and extravagant wars that were ever made, a war for Poland would have been the most so.' He had declared that this country would not go to war for Poland, so that the Poles might not be deceived by vain hopes. He did not deny the patriotism of George III., but to him and his Ministers we owe 'two of the most unjustifiable wars in which a nation ever engaged'—the war against the North American Colonies, and the war against France for the restoration of the Bourbons. His Lordship then said: 'All I can say is this, and I say it with perfect truth, that however much Her Majesty may have, as other Princes have their private affections—connected as she may be by marriage with Princes who derived their birth from Germany—much as she is connected with German families, Her Majesty's great object has been to maintain intact the honour, to maintain high the reputation, to maintain the interests of this country. And however much Her Majesty may desire that every step, whether relating to Germany, or Denmark, or any other subject, should be carefully weighed by her advisers, there has been no occasion on which, when those advisers have deliberated and have given the result of that deliberation to Her Majesty, Her Majesty has not wholly followed their counsels, and adopted the resolutions to which they had come. Therefore, my Lords, having stated this, I need hardly state that which follows, that if the interests of the country have been deserted if there is any stain on its honour—if there has been any abandonment of those great interests which we are bound to preserve if there has been any abandonment of the interests of Europe which we with others are bound to look to, it is upon the heads of Her Majesty's advisers that the responsibility must rest.'

THE WITHDRAWAL OF TROOPS FROM CANADA.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, the Marquis of Hartington said that our force in Canada was to be decreased in order to diminish the heavy expenditure for providing accommodation for the troops, and because it was desired to concentrate troops now scattered about.

[A press of matter compels us to omit any notes upon the debates that have taken place upon our policy in China and other subjects. But as the motions and resolutions submitted were withdrawn or postponed, the exigencies of space will not make our record of actual Parliamentary business incomplete.]

PRESIDENT DAVIS'S MESSAGE TO CONGRESS.

THE following is the President's Message to the Confederate States Congress which met on May 2:—

TO THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA.

You are assembled under circumstances of deep interest to your country; and it is fortunate that, coming as you do, newly elected by the people and familiar with the condition of the various localities, you will be the better able to devise measures adapted to meet the wants of the public service without imposing unnecessary burdens on the citizen. The brief period which has elapsed since the last adjournment of Congress has not afforded sufficient opportunity to test the efficacy of the most important laws then enacted, nor have the events occurring in the interval been such as materially to change the state of the country.

The unjust war commenced against us, in violation of the rights of the States, and in usurpation of power not delegated to the Government of the United States, is still characterised by the barbarism with which it has heretofore been conducted by the enemy.

Aged men, helpless women and children, appeal in vain to the humanity which should be inspired by their condition for immunity from arrest, incarceration, or banishment from their homes. Plunder and devastation of the property of non-combatants, destruction of private dwellings, and even of edifices devoted to the worship of God; expeditions organised for the sole purpose of sacking cities, consigning them to the flames, killing the unarmed inhabitants, and inflicting horrible outrages on women and children, are some of the constantly recurring atrocities of the invader. It cannot reasonably be pretended that such acts conduce to any end which their authors dare avow before the civilised world, and sooner or later Christendom must mete out to them the condemnation which such brutality deserves. The sufferings thus ruthlessly inflicted upon the invaded districts have served but to illustrate their patriotism.

Entire unanimity and zeal for their country's cause have been pre-eminently conspicuous among those whose sacrifices have been greatest. So the army which has borne the trials and dangers of the war, which has been subjected to privations and disappointments (tests of manly fortitude far more severe than the brief fatigues and perils of actual combat), has been the centre of cheerfulness and hope. From the camp comes the voice of the soldier patriot invoking each who is at home, in the sphere he best may fill, to devote his whole energies to the support of a cause in the success of which their confidence has never faltered. They, the veterans of many a hard-fought field, tender to their country, without limit of time, a service of priceless value to us, one which posterity will hold in grateful remembrance.

In considering the state of the country, the reflection is naturally suggested that this is the Third Congress of the Confederate States of America. The Provisional Government was formed, its Congress held four sessions, lived its appointed term, and passed away. The permanent Government was then organised, its different departments established, a Congress elected, which also held four sessions, served its full constitutional term, and expired. You, the Second Congress under the permanent Government, are now assembled at the time and place appointed by law for commencing your session. All these events have passed into history, notwithstanding the threat of our prompt subjugation, made three years ago, by a people that presume to assert a title to govern States whose separate and independent sovereignty was recognised by treaty with France and Great Britain in the last century, and remained unquestioned for nearly three generations.

Yet these very Governments, in disregard of duty and treaty obligations, which bind them to recognise as independent Virginia and other Confederate States, persist in countenancing by moral influence, if not in aiding by unfair and partial action, the claim set up by the Executive of a foreign Government to exercise despotic sway over the States thus recognised, and treat the invasion of them by their former limited and special agent as though it were the attempt of a sovereign to suppress a rebellion against lawful authority. Ungenerous advantage has been taken of our present condition, and our rights have been violated, our vessels of war detained in ports to which they had been invited by proclamations of neutrality, and in one instance our flag also insulted where the sacred right of asylum was supposed to be secure, while one of these Governments has contented itself with simply deprecating by deferential representations the conduct of our enemy in the constantly recurring instances of his contemptuous disregard of neutral rights and flagrant violations of public law.

It may be that foreign Governments, like our enemies, have mistaken our desire for peace, unreservedly expressed, for evidence of exhaustion, and have thence inferred the probability of success in the efforts to subjugate or exterminate the millions of human beings who, in these States, prefer any fate to submission to their savage assailants. I see no prospect of an early change in the course heretofore pursued by these Governments; but when this delusion shall have been dispelled, and when our independence, by the valour and fortitude of our people, shall have been won against all the hostile influences combined against us, and can no longer be ignored by open foes or professed neutrals, this war will have left, with its proud memories, a record of many wrongs which it may not misbecome us to forgive—some for which we may not properly forbear from demanding redress. In the meantime, it is enough for us to know that every avenue of negotiation is closed against us; that our enemy is making renewed and strenuous efforts for our destruction; and that the sole resource for us, as a people secure in the justice of our cause and holding our liberties to be more precious than all other earthly possessions, is to combine and apply every available element of power for their defence and preservation.

On the subject of the exchange of prisoners I greatly regret to be unable to give you satisfactory information. The Government of the United States, while persisting in failure to execute the terms of the cartel, make occasional deliveries of prisoners, and then suspend action without apparent cause. I confess my inability to comprehend their policy or purpose. The prisoners held by us, in spite of human care, are perishing from the inevitable effects of imprisonment and the home sickness produced by the hopelessness of release from confinement. The spectacle of their suffering augments our longing desire to relieve from similar trials our own brave men, who have spent so many weary months in a cruel and useless imprisonment, endured with heroic constancy. The delivery, after a suspension of some weeks, has just been resumed by the enemy; but as they give no assurance of intent to carry out the cartel, an interruption of the exchange may recur at any moment.

The reports of the departments, herewith submitted, are referred to for full information in relation to the matters appertaining to each. There are two of them on which I deem it necessary to make special remark.

The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury states facts justifying the conclusion that the law passed at the last session for the purpose of withdrawing from circulation the large excess of Treasury notes heretofore issued, has had the desired effect, and that by the 1st of July the amount in circulation will have been reduced to a sum not exceeding $230,000,000. It is believed to be of primary importance that no further issue of notes should take place, and that the use of the credit of the Government should be restricted to the two other modes provided by Congress, viz. the sale of bonds and the issue of certificates bearing interest, for the price of supplies purchased within our limits. The law, as it now stands, authorises the issue by the Treasury of new notes to the extent of two-thirds of the amount received under its provisions.

The estimate of the amount funded under this law is shown to be $300,000,000, and if two-thirds of this sum be reissued, we shall have an addition of $200,000,000 to our circulation, believed to be already ample for the business of the country. The addition of this large sum to the volume of the currency would be attended with disastrous effects, and would produce the speedy recurrence of the evils from which the funding law has rescued the country. If our arms are crowned with the success which we have so much reason to hope, we may well expect that this war cannot be prolonged beyond the current year, and nothing would so much retard the beneficent influence of peace on all the interests of our country, as the existence of a great mass of currency not redeemable in coin.

With our vast resources, the circulation, if restricted to its present volume, would be easily manageable, and by gradual absorption in payment of public dues would give place to the precious metals, the only basis of a currency adapted to commerce with foreign countries. In our present circumstances I know of no mode of providing for the public wants which would entail sacrifices so great as a fresh issue of Treasury notes, and I trust that you will concur in the propriety of absolutely forbidding any increase of those now in circulation.

Officers have been appointed and despatched to the Trans-Mississippi States, and the necessary measures taken for the execution of the laws enacted to obviate delays in administering the Treasury and other Executive Departments in those States; but sufficient time has not elapsed to ascertain the result.

In relation to the most important of all subjects at the present time—the efficiency of our armies in the field—it is gratifying to assure you that the discipline and instruction of the troops have kept pace with the improvement in material and equipment. We have reason to congratulate ourselves on the results of the legislation on this subject and on the increased administrative energy in the different bureaux of the War Department, and may not unreasonably indulge anticipations of commensurate success in the ensuing campaign.

The organisation of reserves is in progress, and it is hoped they will be valuable in affording local protection without requiring details and detachments from active force.

Among the recommendations contained in the report of the Secretary of War, your attention is specially invited to those in which legislation is suggested on the following subjects, viz.:—

The tenure of office of the general officers in the provisional army, and a proper discrimination in the compensation of the different grades.

The provision required in aid of invalid officers who have resigned in consequence of wounds or sickness contracted while in the service.

The amendment of the law which deprives officers in the field of the privilege of purchasing rations, and thus adds to their embarrassment, instead of conferring the benefit intended.

The organisation of the general staff of the army, in relation to which a special message will shortly be addressed to you, containing the reasons which compelled me to withhold my approval of a bill passed by your predecessors at too late a period of the session to allow time for returning it for their reconsideration.

The necessity for an increase in the allowance now made for the transportation of officers travelling under orders.

The mode of providing officers for the execution of the conscript laws.

The means of securing greater despatch and more regular administration of justice in examining and disposing of the records of cases reported from the martial and military courts in the army.

The recent events of the war are highly creditable to our troops, exhibiting energy and vigilance combined with the habitual gallantry which they have taught us to expect on all occasions. We have been cheered by the important and valuable successes in Florida, Northern Mississippi, Western Tennessee, and Kentucky, Western Louisiana and Eastern North Carolina, reflecting the highest honour on the skill and conduct of our commanders, and on the incomparable soldiers whom it is their privilege to lead. A naval attack on Mobile was so successfully repulsed at the outer works that the attempt was abandoned, and the nine-months' siege of Charleston has been practically suspended, leaving that noble city and its fortresses imperishable monuments to the skill and fortitude of its defenders.

The armies in Northern Georgia and in Northern Virginia still oppose, with unshaken front, a formidable barrier to the progress of the invader; and our generals, armies, and people are animated by cheerful confidence. Let us, then, while resolute in devoting our energies to securing the realisation of the brilliant auspices which encourage us, not forget that our humble and most grateful thanks are due to Him without whose guidance and protecting care all human efforts are of no avail, and to whose interposition are due the manifold successes with which we have been cheered.

Richmond, May 2, 1864. JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE EXODUS FROM LIVERPOOL.—The emigration from the port of Liverpool continues without any sensible abatement, and, as heretofore, the majority of those leaving the Mersey are natives of the sister isle, and their destination the United States. During the past month there sailed to the United States, 'under the Act,' 29 ships, with 13,991 steerage and 348 cabin passengers; to Canada, 4 ships, with 930 steerage and 117 cabin passengers; to Queensland, 1 ship, with 319 steerage and 4 cabin passengers; to New South Wales, 1 ship, with 405 passengers; and to Victoria, 3 ships, with 1,159 steerage and 15 cabin passengers—making a grand total of 16,794 steerage and 544 cabin passengers.

THE SEIZURE OF THE TUSCALOOSA: PROTEST OF CAPTAIN SEMMES.

Confederate States steamer Alabama:
Table Bay, March 22, 1864.

SIR,—I was surprised to learn upon my arrival at this port of the detention by your order of the Confederate States barque Tuscaloosa, a tender to this ship. I take it for granted that you detained her by order of the Home Government, as no other supposition is consistent with my knowledge of the candour of your character. The Tuscaloosa having been formerly received by you as a regularly commissioned tender, and no new facts appearing in the case to change your decision. Under these circumstances I shall not demand of you the restoration of that vessel, with which demand you would not have the power to comply, but will content myself with putting this my protest against this detention on the record of the case, for the future consideration of our respective Governments.

Earl Russell, in reaching the decision which he has communicated to you, must surely have misapprehended the facts, otherwise I cannot conceive him capable of so misapplying the law. The facts are briefly these: 1st, The Tuscaloosa was formerly the enemy's ship Conrad, lawfully captured by me on the high seas, as a recognised belligerent; 2ndly, She was duly commissioned by me as a tender to the Confederate States steamer Alabama, then as now under my command; and 3rdly, She entered English waters not only without intention of violating Her Britannic Majesty's orders of neutrality, but was received with hospitality, and no question was raised as to her right to enter under the circumstances. These were the facts up to the time of Earl Russell's issuing to you his order in the premises. Let us consider then a moment, and see if we can derive from them, or any of them, just ground for the extraordinary decision to which Earl Russell has come.

My right to capture and the legality of the capture will not be denied. Nor will you deny, in your experience as a naval officer, my right to commission this, or any other ship lawfully in my possession, as a tender to my principal ship. Your Admirals do this every day, on distant stations; and the tender from the time of her being put in commission wears a pennant, and is entitled to the immunities and privileges of a ship of war, the right of capture inclusive.

Numerous decisions are to be found in your own prize law to this effect. In other words, this is one of the recognised modes of commissioning a ship of war, which has grown out of the convenience of the thing, and become a sort of naval common law, as indisputable as the written law itself. The only difference between the commission of such a ship and that of a ship commissioned by the sovereign authority at home is that the word 'tender' appears in the former commission, and not in the latter. The Tuscaloosa having then been commissioned by me in accordance with the recognised practice of all civilised nations that have a marine, can any other Government than my own look into her antecedents? Clearly not. The only thing which can be looked at upon her entering a foreign port is her commission. If this be issued by competent authority, you cannot proceed a step further. The ship then becomes a part of the territory of the country to which she belongs, and you can exercise no more jurisdiction over her than over that territory. The self-respect and the independence of nations require this; for it would be a monstrous doctrine to admit that one nation may enquire into the title by which another nation holds her ships of war. And there can be no difference in this respect between tenders and ships originally commissioned. The flag and the pennant fly over them both, and they are both withdrawn from the local jurisdiction by competent commissions. On principle, you might as well have enquired into the antecedents of the Alabama, as of the Tuscaloosa. Indeed, you had a better reason for enquiring into the antecedents of the former than of the latter, it having been alleged that the former escaped from England in violation of your Foreign Enlistment Act. Mr. Adams, the United States Minister, did in fact demand that the Alabama should be seized, but Earl Russell, in flat and most pointed contradiction of his late conduct in the case of the Tuscaloosa, gave him the proper legal reply, to wit, that the Alabama being now a ship of war he was estopped from looking into her antecedents. One illustration will suffice to show you how untenable your position is in this matter. If the Tuscaloosa's commission be admitted to have been issued by competent authority, and in due form (and I do not understand this to be contested except on the ground of her antecedents), she is as much a ship of war as the Narcissus, your flag-ship. Suppose you should visit a French port, and the port admiral should request you to haul down your flag on the ground that you had had no sufficient title to the ship before she was commissioned, or that she was a contract ship and you had not paid for her, and the builder had a lien on her, or that you had captured her from the Russians, and had not had her condemned by a prize court, what would you think of the proceeding? And how does the case supposed differ from the one in hand? In both it is a pretension on the part of a foreign Power to look into the antecedents of a ship of war—neither more nor less in the one case than in the other. I will even put the case stronger. If it be admitted that I had the right to commission a tender, and the fact had been that I had seized a French ship and put her in commission, you could not enquire into the fact. You would have no right to know but that I had the orders of my Government for this seizure. In short, you would have no right to enquire into the matter at all. My ship being regularly commissioned, I am responsible to my Government for my acts, and my Government in the case supposed would be responsible to France, and not to you. If this reasoning be correct—and, with all due submission to his Lordship, I think it is sustained by the plainest principles of the international code—it follows that the condemnation of a prize in a prize court is not the only mode of changing the character of a captured ship. When the sovereign of the captor puts his own commission on board such a ship, this is a condemnation in its most solemn form, and is notice to all the world. On principle, if a ship thus commissioned were recaptured, the belligerent prize court could not restore her to her original owner, but must condemn her as a prize ship of war of the enemy to the captors; for prize courts are international courts, and cannot go behind the pennant and commission of the cruiser.

Further, as to this question of adjudication, your letter to Lieutenant Low, the late commander of the Tuscaloosa, assumes that, as the Tuscaloosa was not condemned, she was therefore the property of the enemy from whom she had been taken. Condemnation is intended for the benefit of neutrals, and to quiet the titles of purchasers, but is never necessary as against the enemy. His right is taken away by force, and not by any legal process, and the possession of his property manu forte is all that is required against him.

Earl Russell having decided to disregard these plain principles of the laws of nations, and to go behind my commission, let us see what he next decides.

His decision is this, that the Tuscaloosa being a prize, and having come into British waters in violation of the Queen's orders of neutrality, she must be restored to her original owner. The ship is not seized and condemned for the violation of any municipal law, such as fraud upon the revenue, &c.—as, indeed, she could not be so seized and condemned without the intervention of a court of law—but by the strong arm of executive power he wrests my prize from me, and very coolly hands her over to the enemy. It is admitted that all prizes, like other merchant ships, are liable to seizure and condemnation for a palpable violation of the municipal law; but that is not this case. The whole thing is done under the international law. Now, there is no principle better established than that neutrals have no right to interfere in any manner between the captor and his prize, except in one particular instance, and that is where the prize has been captured in neutral waters and afterwards comes of her own accord within the neutral jurisdiction. In that case, and in that case alone, the neutral prize court may adjudicate the case, and if they find the allegation of infra terminos proved, they may restore the property to the original owner.

If a lawful prize, contrary to prohibition, come within neutral waters, the most the neutral can do is to order her to depart without interfering in any manner with the captor's possession.

It is admitted that if she obstinately refuses to depart, or conducts herself otherwise in an improper manner, she may be compelled to depart, or may, indeed, be seized and confiscated as a penalty for her offence. But there is no plea of that kind set up here. To show how sacred is the title of mere possession on the part of a captor, permit me to quote from one of your own authorities. On page 42 of the 1st vol. of Phillimore on International Law you will find the following passage:—'In 1654 a treaty was entered into between England and Portugal, by which, among other things, both countries mutually bound themselves not to suffer the ships and goods of the other taken by enemies and carried into the ports of the other to be conveyed away from the original owners or proprietors.'

'Now, I have no scruple in saying observes Lord Stowell in 1798) that this is an article incapable of being carried into literal execution according to the modern understanding of the law of nations; for no neutral country can intervene to wrest from a belligerent prizes lawfully taken. This is perhaps the strongest instance that could be cited of what civilians call the consuetudo abrogatoria.'

This being the nature of my title, the reasons should be very urgent which should justify my being forcibly dispossessed of it. But there are no such reasons apparent. It is not contended that there was any misconduct on the part of the Tuscaloosa, unless her entry into a British port as a Confederate cruiser be deemed misconduct. As stated in the beginning of this letter, she had no intention of violating any order of the Queen. Her error, therefore, if it were an error, is entitled to be considered with gentleness and not with hardship. Her error was the error of yourself and His Excellency the Governor, as well as myself. We all agreed, I believe, that she was a lawfully commissioned ship, and that her commission estopped all further enquiry. In the meantime, she proceeds to sea thus endorsed, as it were, by the Colonial authorities, your Home Government overrules your decision: the Tuscaloosa returns in good faith to your port to seek renewed hospitality under your orders of neutrality. And what happens? An English officer, armed with your order, proceeds on board of her, turns her commander and officers out of her, and assumes possession on the ground that she has violated the Queen's orders; and this without any warning to depart or any other notice whatever. In the name of all open and fair dealing—in the name of frankness, candour, and good faith, I most respectfully enter my protest against such an extreme, uncalled-for, and apparently unfriendly course.

But the most extraordinary part of the proceeding has yet to be stated. You not only divest me of my title to my prize, but you tell me that you are about to hand her over to the enemy! On what principle this can be done I am utterly at a loss to conceive. Although it may be competent to a Government, in an extreme case, to restore to the Exchequer a prize, there is but one possible contingency in which the prize can be restored to the opposite belligerent, and that is the one already mentioned of a capture within neutral jurisdiction. And this is done on the ground of the nullity of the original capture. The prize is pronounced not to have been lawfully made, and this being the case, and the vessel being within the jurisdiction of the neutral whose waters have been violated, there is but one course to pursue. The vessel does not belong to the captor, and as she does not belong to the neutral, as a matter of course she belongs to the opposite belligerent, and must be delivered up to him. But there is no analogy between that case and the one we are considering. My capture cannot be declared a nullity. My title is as good against the enemy as though condemnation had passed. The vessel either belongs to me or to the British Government. If she belongs to me, justice requires that she should be delivered up to me. If she belongs (by way of confiscation) to the British Government, why should that Government make a gratuitous present of her to one of the belligerents rather than the other?

My Government cannot fail, I think, to view this matter in the light in which I have placed it; and it is deeply to be regretted that a weaker people struggling against a stronger for very existence should have so much cause to complain of the unfriendly disposition of a Government from which, if it represents truly the instincts of Englishmen, it had the right to expect at least sympathy and kindness in the place of rigour and harshness.

I have, &c.,

R. SEMMES, Captain.

Rear-Admiral Sir Baldwin Walker, Simon's Town, Cape of Good Hope.

PLANS OF MR. SEWARD.—The Secretary of State is, in in all matters relating to the management of political conventions, a skillful and unscrupulous pilot; he sees the coming danger and looks for a back door, to get out of it. He has done so, I am told, for the last three months, since the Olustee disaster and the failure of Sherman and Thomas. He then laid down his pipes for deserting Mr. Lincoln at the first approach of the storm. 'If bayonets betray us,' said he to one of his friends, 'we must try to mend our position by looking for another leader.' This remark excited a great deal of attention at the time, but like other remarks of the same character, it was lost in the midst of the clang of arms and the clamours of the war party.—New York World.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

MANCHESTER: June 1, 1864.

A BRIEF account of the progress of the Southern Independence Association since my last half-yearly report will testify, I think, sufficiently to the progress of the Confederate cause. To speak generally, there is scarcely a town or populous village, whether in Lancashire or throughout the manufacturing districts of Cheshire, Yorkshire, and Derbyshire, where the American question has not been fully and warmly discussed. The proceedings at many of the meetings were continued in some instances until nearly midnight, the resolutions being carried favourably—in most cases by overwhelming majorities, in many unanimously, and in none (not even at Rochdale) adversely. Nor does this description, large as it is, quite cover the matter, for on many occasions, before the Union and Emancipation Society was entirely beaten from the field, the Southern Independence Association carried the war into the Northern camp, as at Levenshulme, Droylsden, and elsewhere, where a majority of the people voted the Northern chairman out of the chair, and passed Southern resolutions under the presidency of a chairman of their own choosing.

At Oldham, with its 60,000 inhabitants, Southern meetings have been held almost beyond number. This was, I believe, the first town in Lancashire to recognise the importance of the American question, and to stand up for the justice of the Confederate cause. It was here also that the George Griswold contribution was first denounced, in the language of the placards, as not a gift to alleviate the sufferings of the distressed, but a bribe to purchase the sympathies of the mercenary. Here, too, the first Southern Club was formed. At two public meetings of the burgesses and operatives, convened upon requisition to the Mayor, and also at one of the largest open-air demonstrations ever held in the town, resolutions were passed in favour of recognition; and petitions in the same behalf, signed by the Chairman, have been forwarded for presentation to both Houses of Parliament. Any time during the two years this agitation has been in progress, the Union and Emancipation Society sent its lecturers in vain. 'Agents,' recognised or unrecognised, fugitive presidential black Jehus, Chartist barristers, and all the tribe of oratorical hacks, found no occupation in Oldham. Local amateurs, who were moved to eloquence on the attractive subject of 'slavery,' found their talents unappreciated. All they had to say had been said before by abler men, and yet to no purpose. The local journals, the Chronicle and the Standard, are equally Southern, and have done good service in the cause. The Oldham Times, since defunct, had the courage to advocate the Northern party, but could not live in so Southern an atmosphere: and the Oldham Observer, started in the same interest, also perished—a literary exotic.

Public meetings, technically known in the north as 'towns' meetings,' through being convened by public requisition to the respective mayors, and presided over by those functionaries, have also been held at Ashton, with its 65,000 inhabitants; at Burnley, including Habergham, with its 36,000; at Stockport, with a population more than twice as large; at Preston, almost as notably Southern as Oldham; and, I believe, in some other towns. In the populous district of Darwen, the Confederates had a little difficulty at first in resisting and overthrowing the Federal opposition led by a Mr. Eccles Shorrocks, a cotton-spinner of some influence in that locality; and the victory, I remember, was won on a somewhat remarkable occasion, when a Unitarian minister stood up to champion the South, at the cost of every pane of glass, in the local Mechanics' Institution. The windows, however, were easily mended, though the Federal cause has never since been heard of at Darwen. At Blackburn, with a population of some 70,000, and supporting two Southern newspapers, [illegible] petitions have been adopted by large majorities, and are now, I believe, in the hands of Mr. W. H. Brandly, the Conservative M.P. for that borough. Here, too, as at Darwen, the glass was brittle in the windows of the Town-hall, but that was a year ago, before the Union and Emancipation Society had learned to yield with grace. Meetings have also been held and petitions adopted at Bolton, 88,000 inhabitants; at Bury, 80,000; at Wigan, 64,000; at Macclesfield, 50,000; at Bacup, 13,000; and at Hyde, Leigh, Rawtenstall, Warrington, Ratcliffe, Failsworth, Swinton Todmorden, Ramsbottom, Tintwistle, and many other outlying villages and towns more or less densely populated.

At Glossop, Derbyshire, a town of more than 30,000 inhabitants, Southern meetings have been held in great numbers, and Southern resolutions have been carried with the utmost enthusiasm. The following is a copy of the petition to the House of Commons, signed by the Mayor on behalf of the inhabitants in public meeting assembled.

'To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled.

'The humble petition of the inhabitants of Glossop, in the county of Derby, in public meeting assembled.

'Sheweth, That the independence of the several States of North America was acknowledged by treaty with this country in 1783, not with reference to any Federal relations subsisting between them, but as they were free, sovereign, and independent States.

'That the recent change of Federal relations by the Southern States has not altered their treaty rights with this country; therefore, they have a just claim that their Confederacy should be recognised equally with the Union of the North American States.

'That the present war in America is an outrage upon State independence as recognised by this country in 1783, and events having shown that the aggressive Power is unable to subjugate the Southern States, the continuance of the contest would be as vain as it is wicked.

'Your petitioners, therefore, pray your honourable House to take such steps as are necessary to procure the recognition by this country of the Southern Confederacy, and to use such other means of peaceful mediation as in your judgment may best tend to a speedy termination of the war.

'FREDERICK BUCKLEY, Mayor, Chairman.'

At Preston, also, is another Confederate stronghold, and the Southern cause in that borough is, I believe, very considerably indebted, as at Darwen, to the popular advocacy of a minister of the Unitarian Church. The following is a copy of the petition, signed by the Mayor of the town, and forwarded to Sir T. G. Hesketh, Bart., for presentation to Parliament:—

'The humble petition of the gentry, merchants, manufacturers, and other inhabitants of Preston, in public meeting convened by the Mayor at the written request of 279 of said inhabitants,

'Humbly sheweth, That your petitioners are of opinion that the war in America is an injury to the world, and that the present aspects of the conflict afford no hope of its early termination, except by means of the moral influence of Europe.

'They therefore pray your honourable House to use all just and honourable means to procure a cessation of hostilities, with a view to afford an opportunity for the peaceful separation of the States.

'Signed on behalf of the meeting,

'LAWRENCE SPENCER, Mayor.'

At Halifax also, and Bradford, and other towns in Yorkshire, a strong Confederate feeling exists, and has been elicited on more occasions than one—in the former town by Mr. Spence, and in the latter by members of the local branch of the Southern Independence Association, an institution that, by its weight, character, and numbers, ought to convince a man of Mr. Forster's turn for thought that his theory of Parliamentary representation is scarcely exemplified in his own person.

On referring to my notes I find I have mentioned in the foregoing report the names of nearly thirty towns in the manufacturing districts, representing an aggregate of nearly 1,000,000 inhabitants.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS: May 31.

THE successes of the Confederate armies, as reported by the last news, have met with a very fair appreciation in the Paris press. I cannot better explain to your readers the general feeling in France than by translating a few passages from an article on the last seven days' fight from the Patrie of Sunday. It contains some remarks on a fact which, though not new to English readers, is still little understood in France.

'No doubt some unforeseen accident may give a victory to the Federals, and confirm the sanguine expectations of the European advocates of the North who saw in rose-red, not blood-red, the horrible butchery of the first days of the great battle. But this is scarcely probable. It should be remarked, in the first instance, that the despatches for Europe are fabricated in the War Office at Washington, and that, if they do not announce a complete victory of the Federals, it is certain that they have not only gained no success, but that they have been at least very near a defeat. . . . Of all that the Federals claimed what remains? A loss of 40,000 men acknowledged even in their first despatches. . . . The last despatches from Union sources show that Lee holds his ground; that Sigel, instead of cutting off the Confederate retreat, is himself hunted through the valley of Shenandoah; and that Butler acknowledges the "considerable losses" which have forced him back within his lines. Gold is up to an unheard-of price; reinforcements of raw troops are, or are said to be, hurried forward; every regiment of reserve, even the negroes (on the last day), have been sent into action; and after all, a week of fighting and the loss of 40,000 or 50,000 men have resulted in the advance of the Federal army some fifteen or twenty miles, while the Confederates have almost voluntarily abandoned their first line of defence to take up a still more formidable one.'

I do not know that the attention of your readers has been called to an admirable institution which owes its origin to Switzerland: it is that of common hospitals for the battle-field. It was projected eight months ago in a conference held at Geneva, and already fourteen or fifteen European Governments have given their adhesion to the proposals which the conference put forward. These may be summed up in a very few words, but of vast import—the neutralisation of all hospitals, whether field hospitals or others; the neutrality of all who are attached to them, as well as of the wounded; and an identical hospital flag adopted by all countries. It seems that in Denmark this plan has already been put in practice by delegates of the Geneva committee with the happiest result. As war cannot be prevented, the next best thing is to diminish, so far as man's care can, its worst evils, and we may hope that before long the white flag with red cross will wave on both sides of every battle-field. The country which has originated so generous an idea may well claim the right to see her flag consecrated by it.

The most amiable trait I have yet heard cited of the late Duke of Malakhoff, of whom few such are told, was his forgiving a disobedience or misunderstanding of orders in an inferior officer at the siege of Sebastopol, who had allowed the Russians to seek for and bury their dead, because among them was found one man still living. General Grant seems not yet to have heard this anecdote.

The Legislative Assembly was prorogued on the 29th, when M. de Morny made one of those cleverly adroit speeches for which he is celebrated. This session, though a very long one, has been very favourable to the Government, which has made in practice some concessions to the wishes of the minority that tend to strengthen the Government by attracting public sympathy. M. de Morny's tact and urbanity have done still more to moderate the attacks of the opposition.

From yesterday's Moniteur we learn with what impatience the Mexicans await the arrival of their new sovereigns. Preparations on more than a European scale of magnificence are being made for their reception.

Letters from Richmond, dated the 6th, have been received in Paris. From these it appears that Grant's plan of campaign was perfectly known a month before, as stated in the Times correspondence, and ample preparations were made to meet it. The army is stated to have never been better equipped and provisioned than now, and both the authorities and the people of Richmond were sanguine of success. Events have proved that their confidence was well grounded. The writer is attached to the battalion for the defence of Richmond, and he states that the defences of the city are perfect. Though thus well prepared, no one anticipated there that Grant would fare better than his predecessors. 'A louder wail will probably go up from the Yankees after this attempt than the old or new world has ever heard.' President Davis's message was enclosed in this letter, and it will probably appear in to-morrow's Galignani.

YANKEE PRISONERS.—The records at Castle Thunder give strange evidence concerning the remarkably fine spirit of the Yankee army in Virginia. Within the last few weeks nearly a hundred deserters from Grant have passed over the line and come asking asylum in the bosom of the rebellion. For the last few days they have been particularly persevering in getting to Richmond ahead of time, unwilling to wait for Grant and stand the chances of being put to a great deal of unnecessary trouble and in no little danger. It is becoming a customary sight to see squads of five, six, eight, or ten per day, marching up to General Winder's office under guard, but seeming as gay and glad as if they were in the best luck and with the best prospects in the world.—Richmond Enquirer.

CONFEDERATE AFFAIRS.

WE are permitted to publish the following extracts from a letter written by a highly influential resident in Mobile to a friend in Europe:—

Mobile, April 15, 1864.

The Dublagh is in port on her third trip, and sails again to-morrow. I trust to her luck to get a few lines to you. . . . I think the chances are that Mobile will escape to the end of the war. At all events the enemy has delayed so long that the town has been fortified in a manner to defy them. You will see reports of the sinking of our great ironclad ram the Tennessee. Not true. She is ready for action, and you may at any time hear of her giving a good account of herself. Admiral Buchanan pronounces her far more formidable than the Merrimac, and our naval men think the Yankees have nothing equal to her.

Since I last wrote you, indeed since the opening of 1864, Confederate affairs have wonderfully improved. We have had an uninterrupted series of successes. The latest are from the Trans-Mississippi department, where Banks's whole force, with a part of Sherman's army, has been badly beaten by Kirby Smith, Dick Taylor, and 'Old Dad' (Price); and Forrest is now up in Kentucky playing the deuce with the Yankees, and fairly scaring them to death along the Mississippi river.

But it is not of these military affairs that I speak when I notice the favourable change in our affairs. It is in the firm tone of the Government and the people, the courage and energy of Congress in its financial and military legislation, the cheerful acquiescence of the people in the enormous taxes, and in other measures, that I see the sure road out of our troubles. Within six months $700,000,000 of the $900,000,000 issued to carry on the war will be withdrawn from circulation. Is not this a financial feat? A reduction in the price of commodities and of the expenses of Government will be the consequence. It has besides lifted from the minds of the people an incubus which all dreaded would crush us at last. You cannot imagine how buoyant the country feels after making this enormous sacrifice, and with what cheerful alacrity they are hastening to fund in 'four per cents.,' or to exchange old notes for new at the rate of three for two. This is one of the greatest victories of the war. It is a civil victory, and it has saved us. A second is in the glorious voluntary re-enlistment of our veterans in the field. It began in Johnston's army of Tennessee, was caught up like the contagion of a religious revival, and went on until it included every company and every regiment in the armies. This was another civic and great moral victory won by our brave men over themselves, over their longing desires for rest and for home, for escape from the terrible hardships of soldiers' life like theirs. Is it not grand in men who have slept winter and summer for three years without house or tent to cover them, whose rations are scant and hard, their feet often without shoes, and their backs without blankets?

You will be glad to know that after all the frightful havoc of war in the ranks of our young men, the Confederate armies are stronger to-day in numbers than at any former period of the war. As matériel they are veterans, and as for their morale I have given you proof that the loftiest patriotism animates them. They are, too, I am happy to say, better clothed and provided. For the first time, you will not find a shoeless soldier in the army of Tennessee.

I may safely say to you that Government, army, and people have deliberately made up their minds to accept war as 'a permanent institution,' in preference to yielding under all and any circumstances. The enemy, by his own deeds, has taught us this determination and this deep and bitter hatred which words cannot express. We are a hundred times better prepared for war than three years ago. You might not send us another pinch of powder from Europe, and we should not miss it. We have Nitre Bureaux, nitre beds, and powder mills—in Augusta, Georgia, the largest powder mill in America. You in Europe can form no conception of the progress we have been driven by necessity to make in the arts. We weave our soldier's cloth, make the leather for his shoes, our own artillery, wagons and caissons, our own harness and saddle and other equipments. We cast our big guns and the most beautiful brass field-pieces you ever laid your eyes on. I can take you to Columbus, Georgia, and show you a Colt's pistol factory, for which every machine for every part was designed and fashioned on the spot. In the same building is a bayonet factory. Swords, spurs, military bridle bits, and the like are made in every town and village. We have besides our foundries, military arsenals, and navy yards, in which you would be surprised to see what 'the mother of invention' has done for us. Our ordnance yards and depôts contain all that is required for modern warfare. Formerly, you know, we had to depend upon Yankees for so simple a thing as a lucifer match—the Confederate article supplies its place now. In the printing business Southern mills furnish our printing paper, and ink is made at home. There is in a newspaper office in this town a machine invented by one of the foremen for making letter envelopes; it turns out several thousands a day, and of course pays very handsomely. Soon after the blockade many thought that we should 'go up' on the salt question—couldn't salt our meat, and should be starved into subjection: it has turned out like the panic about powder. The salt mines of Virginia, the saline springs of Alabama, and the exhaustless ocean and gulf washing our coast have invited labour and ingenuity, and there is no longer scarcity of salt. I am going with my wife in the shooting season to a friend in Montgomery: one of his inducements to the visit is an ice-house which he built and filled the past winter, and a mint bed close to it. You thought the ice an impossible production in this latitude, no doubt. Indeed we do not brag of our ingenuity in this respect, but Providence has seen fit to send us a very cold winter, and my friend, being a Virginian and used to icehouses, took advantage of it.

THE VIRGINIAN BIBLE SOCIETY.—The annual meeting was lately held in Richmond. The Rev. Mr. Woodbridge was in the chair. The annual report was read by Dr. Doggett, the Secretary of the Society. The report gave well the details of the operations of the Society during the past year. Among other items they have given out 9,000 Bibles, 10,000 Testaments, and 50,000 Gospels to the soldiers east of the Mississippi. In addition to what has been distributed, they have sold 20,000 copies of the Scriptures. These form only a portion of the books purchased in England by Dr. Hoge. The remainder are on the way, and some of them will be on hand very shortly. After the reading of the report, interesting addresses were delivered by the Rev. Drs. Edwards, Hoge, and Granberry. The old officers were then unanimously re-elected for the ensuing year. Eighty-eight thousand copies of the different books have been received from the British and Foreign Bible Society, and of that number 87,000 have been distributed.

THE ENGLISH MEMORIAL TO 'STONEWALL JACKSON.'

THE subjoined letter from Governor Smith of Virginia has been forwarded to us for publication:

State of Virginia, Executive Department:
Richmond, April 25, 1864.

To the Honourable James M. Mason:

I was most agreeably surprised a few days ago by the receipt of yours of the 17th ultimo, informing me that a number of distinguished gentlemen of England had undertaken to have executed a marble statue of General Thomas J. ('Stonewall') Jackson; and requesting that you may be authorised to say that, 'so far as it may rest with Virginia, the statue shall occupy a position worthy of it and the occasion.' In reply, it gives me pleasure to assure you that the most appropriate spot in our beautiful grounds shall be selected for the proposed token of a great nation's appreciation of our illustrious son.

This expression of sympathy, while we yet mourn over our great loss, touches me deeply, and will, I know, reach the heart of every true Virginian. And as Governor of Virginia, and speaking for her and in her name, I ask you to tender our sincere acknowledgments to the distinguished gentlemen who have so kindly and happily conceived this handsome and grateful tribute to the memory of one of our best and bravest, and at the same time one of the truest and greatest of his race. Noble must have been the man who could have so suddenly impressed himself upon the sentiments of mankind, and generous the people whose sensibilities have prompted them to commemorate his name.

I am, Sir, most respectfully and truly yours,
WILLIAM SMITH.

THE 'SCOTIA' AND THE FEDERAL POLICE.—We have already stated that the Cunard steamer Scotia, while lying in the stream at New York, about to sail for Liverpool, was boarded by Federal police, searched throughout, and the passengers and owners plundered of copies of two New York journals which had fallen under the ban of the Washington executive. It was soon known in the city that this outrage had been committed, and intense excitement prevailed. The fact that a British mail steamer had been searched for political documents was a subject of considerable anxiety amongst the more discreet New Yorkers; but to the thoughtless part of the community it was regarded as a piece of daring braggadocio. Everybody knew of the occurrence, and the general knowledge was of course communicated to the men-of-war in the harbour. The French admiral immediately went on board the Scotia, and enquired the full particulars of the police visitation. They were of course explained by Captain Judkins, the commander of the vessel, and were embodied by the admiral in a despatch to his Government. This despatch was brought by the Scotia, and by this time has, no doubt, been discussed by the Emperor Napoleon and his Cabinet. The French admiral was prompt and attentive to his duties, although the vessel did not belong to his country. But where were the British officers? They made no enquiries as to the insult offered to the British flag, and British interests were left to the protection of merchant seamen and the French admiral. The English Government, we all know, can now do nothing without the countenance and co-operation of Louis Napoleon; but things have come to a pretty pass when our flag in foreign waters must rely for protection upon French men-of-war.—Liverpool Courier.

LIBERTY IN THE SOUTH.—The Richmond Examiner, a journal which cannot be charged with any undue leaning to the Confederate Government, observes:—'One point of contrast between these Confederate States and the invading Power has been highly gratifying to ourselves, and has given us as favourable a reputation with the rest of the world as the gallantry of our soldiers in the field—it is the contrast between the slavish abandonment by our enemies of their rights as citizens in the insane crusade against another people, and the jealous assertion by Confederates of those same rights, even in the agonies of a struggle for the very existence of their States. We have, as all nations, many weak-minded and conceited persons in public office, who would probably assume arbitrary powers if they dared; but they have been made to know with certainty, that the least step beyond the clear limit of law would be promptly and sternly checked by the public will; and, if persisted in, would be punished by the nation at all risk, even that of its own ruin. So well aware have been such persons of this jealous vigilance in the Confederacy, that, amid all the just indignation which some of these functionaries have excited by their folly and meanness within the circle of their lawful discretion, it has been impossible to catch them beyond it. In despite of the careful and constant falsifications of the enemy about the "iron rule" and "despotic tyranny" of the Confederate authorities (all contradiction of which statements they hoped was blockaded in), foreign nations are informed of that remarkable contrast. What is more important, we know it ourselves; and it forms one of the many good reasons why we are daily thankful to be delivered from association with such a people. Here no public meeting has been controlled or "adjourned" by military officers; here no citizen has been handed his voting-paper by a sergeant of dragoons, and has voted at the point of the bayonet; here no newspaper has been suppressed by a provost-marshal, nor denied circulation through the public post-office; neither has any editor been thrown in chains, nor clergyman set to sweeping the streets. But all those proceedings have been of ordinary occurrence in the country of our enemies, and that within their military lines.'

KIDNAPPING BRITISH SUBJECTS.—The Quebec Daily News of May 12 says:—'We learn that an official communication has reached the Government adverting to a scheme concocted to entice Canadians to the United States. It is believed that there are agents in this Province endeavouring to hire men to work at a patent brick factory, but the real design is to entrap Canadians over the line, and then force them to enlist in the Federal army. Hundreds are wanted, and if these are secured, thousands more will be required for some other bogus speculations. We assume the Government will take prompt action, as far as possible, to checkmate these speculators in humanity. The pretence of wanting only 300 men is too flimsy not to be penetrated. If there were a score of agents in the Province, each would require that number. We caution the credulous against any who come here offering high wages for labourers or artisans in the United States. . . . . There is no want of labour in Canada for those who are disposed to work. Indeed there is some apprehension among the agriculturists, that farm servants will be hard to procure. We strongly caution the public against those agents of President Lincoln, whether they offer high wages to engage for a patent brick factory, for a railroad, or any other bogus enterprise. Canadians are wanted to fight, bleed, die; that is the object for which they procure men.

THE FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE UNITED STATES.

THE money article of the Deutsche Monden of Frankfort gives the following sensible and comprehensive summary of the financial condition of the United States:—

We are to-day in a position to make a general and explanatory statement with regard to the Federal finances—statements for which many people are interested to exchange the best American or South German stock.

The expenses paid by the Federal Government from the beginning of the war up to March 1, 1864, are stated to $2,128,309,200; to these we must add the expenses from the latter date to the end of the financial year, ending 30 June, estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury at $1,000,000,000 total for the three years of war, $3,128,941,100. The expenditure of 1861 is calculated at $474,815,000, making up a grand total of $4,479,500,100 on the debit side of the Union account. On the credit side we may place the sum of $519,613,155 for the receipts of the years 1862-3-4-5, balance against the Union, $3,960,213,05?

We must further remember that the States have advanced large sums since the commencement of the war, and that there are outstanding claims for compensation to a enormous amount, the two together cannot be stated at less than $150,000,000. Add this to the debit as above calculated, and we find that the grand total of debt is more than four thousand million dollars.

Now what is the value of the property within the Union which is to be charged with this debt? By the assessment of 1860 the value of the whole real and personal property in the United States was fixed at $12,084,000,000; but from this we must deduct at least one-third for the value of that within the Confederate States, so that the actual security for the Federal debt is in round numbers $8,000,000,000—or, in other words, the capital of the Union amounts to only double its debt.

We will now examine what are the resources for the payment of the interest on this debt, and for the supply of the ordinary annual expenditure. The former, at 6 per cent., will be about $240,600,000; the latter, after the termination of the war, may be moderately estimated at $201,000,000: total annual expenses, $441,600,000. The average receipts, on the other hand, of the nineteen States which compose the present Union (omitting from the account the two small border States of Maryland and Delaware), are only $264,431,862, according to the calculation made in the well-known work of Mr. Hunt published at New York, and based on the statistics of the years 1850 and 1860. It follows that the annual interest on the public debt of the United States far exceeds one-half their whole revenue, and that the whole annual expenses of the Government will exceed the aggregate receipts by well-nigh one million dollars. If there is any eloquence in figures, any impressiveness in a bare recital of facts, we may hope that this statement will open the eyes of those who still blindly trust in the power of the United States to liquidate this tremendous debt. Yet our calculation is only correct on the supposition that the present campaign will bring about a termination of the war: should hostilities be continued, we may form but a faint conception of the figure to which the debt will attain through the shameful, reckless, ruinous expenditure. Let no one accuse us of exaggeration: it is an established fact that the whole expenditure from the year 1789 to 1861, including the cost of the wars with England and Mexico, amounted to $1,403,790,786, so that the sum spent between 1861 and 1865 will surpass the expenses of the 70 years preceding by $2,976,065,408.

We have invented nothing: we have simply placed ourselves and our readers face to face with the facts and figures as stated by Mr. Voorhees, member of Congress for the State of Indiana, in the House of Representatives, on the 5th of March last—facts which are undisputed, figures which yet await contradiction.

MURDER AND INCENDIARISM.—The New Orleans True Delta, a 'loyal Union' paper, published the following narrative on April 29:—'Mr. D. Murphy, who arrived here last night on the steamer General Banks, furnishes us the particulars of a most brutal murder that was committed early on Sunday morning, 24th inst., about seven miles below Donaldsonville, by four negroes, on the persons of Mr. John McCormick and his brother-in-law Patrick Kelly, a boy fifteen years of age, all employed on the plantation of Mr. de Visser. Our informant states that the negroes broke into the house of Mr. McCormick about one o'clock, while all the inmates were asleep, and before they could arouse themselves to a full realisation of the presence of the murderers, they were overpowered and killed in their beds, as above stated. The murderers then attacked Mrs. McCormick (who, during the killing of her husband and young Kelly, had had time to partly dress herself) and cut and stabbed her until they supposed life extinct, when the fiends fastened all the doors, and while one of the number dressed himself in Mr. McCormick's clothes, the others made a brief search for such articles as they could conveniently carry off, and then fired the premises and left. Fortunately, before the fire had gained much headway, Mrs. McCormick recovered sufficient strength to reach a bed in which two children, aged six and four years, were asleep, and managed to put them out of a window, and then made her own escape. The three took shelter in an adjacent corn-crib, where they remained until about eight o'clock that morning, when they were found, taken to the residence of the owner of an adjoining plantation, medical aid immediately procured, Mrs. McCormick's wounds dressed, and everything done to relieve her sufferings. Mr. Murphy states that Mrs. McCormick's wounds are of a serious nature—two fearful gashes in the head, inflicted by an axe, exposing the brain, also three stabs in the left side, supposed to have been inflicted by a cane-knife. After having her wounds dressed and partaking of some little nourishment, Mrs. McCormick related the particulars of the horrible tragedy that had been enacted, when a number of men residing in the neighbourhood started in pursuit of the murderers. One (he who had donned Mr. McCormick's clothes) they found an attentive listener in church, and secured him; another was caught on Monday, and the other two on Tuesday morning.'

GENERAL WADSWORTH, who was killed in the battle of the 5th, was the Republican candidate for Governor of New York in opposition to Governor Seymour.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES left London this morning for Cambridge. His Royal Highness will this day take the degree of Doctor of Laws. Splendid festivities have been prepared for the reception of the illustrious guests.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

Mr. J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund, begs to acknowledge the receipt of the following additional Contribution:—

THURSDAY, JUNE 2, 1864.

The Foreign Office and the Richmond Government.

WE have to chronicle a second abortive attempt on the part of the Foreign Office to communicate with the Confederate Government. It will be remembered that the Petrel, having on board the despatch with which Mr. CRAWFORD, HER MAJESTY'S Consul-General in Havanah, was charged, was peremptorily refused admission into the port of Charleston by the commander of the Federal Blockading Squadron. She thereupon returned to Bermuda, and reported her failure to the Admiral of the station, who immediately transmitted the despatches to Lord LYONS. The latter made a formal request for permission to forward them through the lines, which was refused; and Lord LYONS was moreover informed by Mr. SEWARD that 'it would not be agreeable to the Government of the United States' for HER MAJESTY'S Government 'to hold any intercourse whatever' with the Confederates. After this rebuff, which Lord LYONS appears to have received with his usual meekness, there remained nothing for him to do but to return the despatches to the Foreign Office, where they will henceforth remain as the record of the most ridiculous diplomatic failure of even Earl RUSSELL'S Administration. So little, however, did the FOREIGN SECRETARY anticipate such a result, that, as late as the 2nd of April, additional instructions were sent out to Mr. CRAWFORD relative to his mission to Richmond. These additional instructions, it may be supposed, were rendered necessary by the discovery that the 'Mallory Report' was a forgery. We are now impatiently waiting to see whether the farce is to have a third act.

The Eight Days' Fighting in Virginia.

THE various accounts received during the last seven days throw very little additional light on the general result of the recent engagements in the Wilderness and Spottsylvania, but they furnish us with very comprehensive details of the movements of the two armies, and enable us to form a tolerably clear conception of the attack and defence of Generals GRANT and LEE. In the main we have very little to correct in our last week's review of the military situation, but there are some points on which explanation is necessary. In the first place it seems to be beyond a doubt that on the 5th and 6th ult. the Confederate army was the assailing force, and that on both days it achieved considerable if not decisive successes. The general notion of GRANT'S plan of campaign, and probably the correct one, is that its object was to bring LEE out of his impregnable entrenchments on Mine End Creek, and compel him to fight in the open. With this view the advance of the Federal army was made rather in a south-easterly direction, the intention being to secure Fredericksburg and push along the direct road to Richmond, and at the same time to threaten LEE with the interposition of a powerful Federal force between his army and Richmond. LEE'S headquarters were at Orange Court House. If he struck a blow at all, it was clear that it would fall upon the Federal right. Accordingly, the right wing was very strongly supported, and every arrangement was made with a view to a possible attack from the Confederates in the direction of Orange Court House. LEE'S position on the 4th seems to have been at Mine End River. It had considerable advantages. It stopped an advance upon Richmond at its weakest point, the western defences, by the entrenchments at Mine River; it drove the Federals along the direct road, where a series of fortified lines awaited them; it gave LEE a most favourable point from whence to turn the enemy's right wing, and get between it and the Rapidan. On the 4th, LEE had made up his mind to strike a blow to arrest the Federal advance, and on the 5th the two armies were simultaneously put in motion. Their advanced columns came into collision about noon. The general results of the engagement of the 5th were decidedly favourable to the Confederate army, which captured, by the admission of the Federals, upwards of 1,000 prisoners and two guns, and at every point of attack drove back the enemy a considerable distance. The next morning the attack was renewed on both sides; but in the meantime the Federals had been strengthened by BURNSIDE'S corps of 30,000 men, which was brought up to the support of the Federal right, and had thrown up strong earthworks along the whole line, which, at more than one period during the fight of the 6th, saved their army. SEDGWICK'S corps, the right wing, was the first to be attacked, though his men were under orders for attack a quarter of an hour later than the commencement of the action. The battle raged furiously on the right from five till ten, but without decided advantage on either side. About the same time, according to the Federal accounts, HANCOCK, on the left, moved out of his entrenchment and drove the Confederates two miles, taking a few prisoners. Reinforced by LONGSTREET, the Confederate right, in its turn, charged upon the Federals and drove them back with heavy loss upon their breastworks. Again and again the line of battle ebbed and flowed through the tangled brakes, until about noon, when the Confederates massed a heavy force upon the Federal left, and, with a furious onslaught, rolled it back in confusion some two or three miles. It was here that General WADSWORTH fell, vainly striving to rally his division. The Federal left disposed of, the centre, under General WARREN, became the chief object of attack, and here again the Federals were compelled to give ground in confusion, the corps being only saved from utter rout by a brilliant movement of Colonel CARROLL'S brigade, which checked the Confederate advance. Finally, towards dark a desperate onslaught was directed against the right under SEDGWICK. So impetuous was the charge that two brigades, with their generals, were at once taken prisoners. The whole division was swept away, and a terrible disaster seemed imminent; but the abattis and entrenchments constructed on the Thursday night saved the army, and the Confederates withdrew. They had 'driven' the enemy at every point, but not defeated him. On the other hand, GRANT'S advance was checked, and the only real movement of his army had been a retrograde one. Thus closed the battles of the 5th and 6th, fought out almost entirely with musketry, and with terrible losses to both armies, the North, however, suffering by far the more severely.

On the 7th and 8th General GRANT seems to have been puzzled. To assault the Confederate entrenchments was madness. He was not the man to retreat, even if he could have done so. He seems to have determined to move rapidly on in a south-easterly direction, making Fredericksburg his base and Spottsylvania Court House his aim. The day was passed by both armies in marching for this point, and during the day they came frequently into collision, the Confederates throughout having the best of it. The end of it was that the latter were found to be occupying in force a tremendously strong position at Spottsylvania Court House. The early part of Monday was spent in bringing up artillery and placing it. In the afternoon a general advance was made at all points, and everywhere the Federals were repulsed with heavy loss. On Tuesday the Confederate lines had assumed somewhat the shape of a horseshoe, and the Federal army was entrenched in front of them from right to left. The Confederate position, naturally a strong one, had been very extensively fortified; and LEE confidently awaited attack behind his intrenchments. The attack was made and sustained with great gallantry, but it failed at all points; charge after charge was made, but in vain; the assaulting columns melted away beneath the withering fire long before they reached the intrenchments, and now and then the Confederates assumed the offensive, and inflicted terrible losses on the assailants. At the close of the engagement an energetic advance of HANCOCK'S corps captured the Confederate rifle pits in front, some guns, and 1,000 prisoners, but they were immediately recaptured, and the Federals driven back with loss. Night fell upon another field of horrors, and left the Confederates everywhere successful. The 9th was a day of comparative rest for both sides. GRANT and LEE were busy in bringing up supplies, and it is said that LEE requested a brief truce for the burial of the dead, and that GRANT refused. An artillery duel and heavy skirmishing took place towards the evening. By this time the Federal losses, moderately estimated, had amounted to 35,000 men—many placed them as high as 45,000 to 50,000. But the carnage of the preceding days was to be outdone on the 12th. Early in the morning of that day, favoured by a dense fog, HANCOCK precipitated his division upon the Confederate line, and, taking two brigades by surprise, carried the rifle pits, and captured the brigades, with their commanders and cannon, almost without firing a shot. Three thousand men and eighteen cannon were the trophies of the fight. Encouraged by this success, the Federals pressed boldly on along the whole line, but were fearfully punished; and when night came the Federals had not advanced a quarter of a mile, yet the losses on the 12th far exceeded those of the 10th. On the 13th there was no battle. It was reported that LEE had retreated, and great was the rejoicing in New York and Washington; but the report proved untrue. Skirmishers sent forward found out that LEE was on his old ground, and, most fortunately for GRANT'S reputation, heavy rains came on, which satisfactorily accounted for his inaction. The very latest news from the North leaves the two armies in the same position; GRANT cannot turn the Confederate position; he is not strong enough to force it. But it is said by Mr. STANTON that he will try, and the more essays he makes the more effectively will he serve the Confederate cause.

It is, therefore, a great error to describe LEE'S march upon Spottsylvania as a retreat. In one respect it is an advance, because it brings LEE across the direct road to Richmond, instead of leaving him in search of an enemy never likely to come at Mine End Run. And at Spottsylvania, the only dangers to LEE were, that his communications might be cut, as they were, temporarily, by General SHERIDAN, and that the two expeditions of SIGEL and BUTLER would compel him to fall back upon Richmond. SHERIDAN'S cavalry force, traversing the country between his camp and Richmond, effected some damage, but it was speedily repaired, and SHERIDAN driven into BUTLER'S lines on the James River. SIGEL and BUTLER have been badly defeated. Nothing but hard fighting then will force LEE from his present position. It is rumoured and credited, that he has been joined by BEAUREGARD with a very considerable force, and reports of severe reverses have already reached Washington. But the mot d'ordre is success immediate and overwhelming, and GRANT'S triumph is treated as a certainty by the supporters of the Administration. Under any circumstances another severe battle must soon be fought, and any day may bring us intelligence of it. We can hardly conceive it possible that after seven days of fighting, after their unsuccessful assaults, and after the grave losses of trusted leaders, the Northern army can have sufficiently recovered from its depression to be ready to resume the attack. But if General GRANT again assaults the Confederate lines, he will undoubtedly be beaten again, as he was on the 10th and 12th of last month.

J. E. B. Stuart.

SINCE the death of STONEWALL JACKSON, the Confederacy has sustained no heavier loss than has befallen her in the untimely close of the brilliant career of Major-General JAMES E. B. STUART. No two men could have been more opposite types of the soldier—JACKSON, the earnest, devoted patriot, taking up arms as a last resort, clinging, even on the eve of the most terrible battles, to the hope of peace, struggling between the dictates of duty towards the land of his birth and the impulses of a nature averse to strife, but terrible in the field, and leading on his troops with that fiery zeal which made the soldiers of the Commonwealth invincible; STUART, the gallant cavalier, a warrior by instinct, of that fine metal of which were made Prince

RUPERT'S horsemen, who in their pride of loyalty made even CROMWELL'S Ironsides recoil from their furious onslaught. Both born leaders of men, and inspiring their followers with the same confidence and devotion, they trod the same path, fought the same fight, and have shared the same fate, struck down in the front of the battle at the moment of victory, with the cheers of triumph ringing in their ears a fitting requiem. This terrible war demands cruel sacrifices. The noblest and the best freely offer up their lives to it. Let us hope that as STONEWALL JACKSON'S memory is illustrated for ever by the glorious victory of Chancellorsville, so the death of this young Virginian hero will hereafter record another and even a more decisive triumph, and that the final despair of the North will date from the fierce struggle now disfiguring the valleys and the woodlands of Spottsylvania.

We have said that JAMES E. B. STUART was a warrior by instinct, and his whole life shows it. He was born a soldier. From his youth he was noted for a daring enthusiasm which gave promise of what the man would be; and his genius soon showed itself, even in the limited sphere afforded by the wilds of New Mexico. It was in 1854 that young STUART received his commission in the United States' army as second lieutenant in a mounted rifle corps. A year later he was transferred to the 1st Regular Cavalry, with General JOHNSTON, now commanding the Confederate army in Georgia, as his Lieutenant-Colonel, and SUMNER, who died lately in the Federal service, as Colonel. Under him, now fighting with tribes of hostile Indians, now beating up groups of marauding banditti, STUART laid the foundation of that reputation as a dashing cavalry officer which he has since established on the plains of his native State. And amongst the officers of that famous regiment there is many a tradition of STUART'S bold riding and dashing charges. When the present war broke out, he ceased to hold a commission in the United States' army, notwithstanding the offer of a captaincy by Mr. LINCOLN'S Cabinet, and was one of the first officers appointed to the command of a Virginian cavalry regiment. At the battle of Bull Run he was placed at the head of the small cavalry force cooperating with JOHNSTON; and in the desultory fighting which took place in Virginia after that battle he at once established that superiority of the Confederate cavalry over their opponents, which, despite heavy odds and many obvious disadvantages, has never been doubtful in Virginia. His first great exploit, however, and the one which brought him at once into note as one of the best cavalry leaders of the day, was his famous ride round M'CLELLAN'S army in the Peninsula in the month of June 1862. With a force of about 600 sabres and two pieces of flying artillery, he sallied out from the Confederate lines at Richmond, reached the Pamunky, destroying supplies, making captures, and creating consternation wherever he went; clearing all obstacles, charging wherever an enemy presented himself, and finally crossing the Chickahominy at Bottom's Bridge, after having fairly ridden round M'CLELLAN'S enormous army, and ascertained all that was necessary for the execution of that brilliant movement which resulted in the defeat of M'CLELLAN and his ultimate withdrawal from the Peninsula. Once again STUART was the herald of disaster to the army of the Potomac, in the month of August 1862, when General POPE was in command. With a comparatively small force he made a dash upon the right flank of the enemy, penetrating to the headquarters of General POPE, capturing all his papers, his dress uniform, several of the officers of his staff, and destroying a vast amount of military stores. On this occasion, as in the Peninsula, his bold raid was but the precursor of STONEWALL JACKSON'S attack. In both cases it was STUART who led the way and JACKSON who struck the blow, and it may be doubted whether the dashing cavalry raid or the brilliant infantry attack had more to do with the successful result. Later in the same year STUART performed a still greater feat. Whilst M'CLELLAN was pursuing LEE southward after the battle of Antietam Creek, STUART, with 2,000 picked troopers and half a dozen light guns, stole round the right wing of the Federals, crossed the Potomac a little north of Williamsport, entered Maryland, passed rapidly through Mercersburg and Chambersburg, and finally recrossed the Potomac about 15 miles from Washington, far to the left of M'CLELLAN'S army, with the loss of one killed and seven wounded. The results of his raid were the capture of a number of prisoners, the destruction of vast stores of supplies and arms, and the transfer to Virginia of two or three thousand valuable horses. By this time, however, the Yankees had taken a lesson from STUART'S successes, and had raised a considerable cavalry force. Well mounted and equipped, the Federal troops made up in numbers what they wanted in the qualities of good cavalry soldiers; and henceforth the work of STUART was more confined to the ordinary duties of cavalry in European wars—to the protection of the flanks of the main army. In the years 1863 and 1864, he had plenty to do. By degrees the Federals had got together a considerable force, and BUFORD, KILPATRICK, and PLEASANTON were commanders not to be despised. Still, on all occasions, STUART, with inferior forces, held his own, and often inflicted considerable damage on the invaders. During the winter of 1863 and the early months of the present year, he had been engaged in organising his force for the campaign of 1864, and it is understood that it had attained a remarkable degree of efficiency. In the few cavalry encounters that have taken place between LEE'S and GRANT'S armies, the Confederate cavalry, always inferior in numbers, has invariably come off triumphant, and it is to General STUART it owes its superiority. A skirmish near Richmond with General SHERIDAN'S raiding column has unfortunately cost STUART his life, and the Confederacy her best cavalry officer. But it is satisfactory to know that on this last occasion, as before, STUART'S horse was victorious, and that though a stray shot struck their young leader to the ground, it was amid the cheers which told of the enemy's repulse and flight.

He is dead at the early age of thirty-three, perhaps the first cavalry officer of his day; but he has lived long enough to have given a marked character to Confederate strategy, and to have organised a cavalry service which has over and over again been the bulwark of the Confederacy. FORREST, MORGAN, VAN DORN, older men, were pupils in his school; and amongst the heroes of the war his name will worthily take its place beside those of LEE and STONEWALL JACKSON. Personally J. E. B. STUART will be perhaps more widely lamented than any Confederate general who has fallen. His noble features and manly figure, his easy carriage and fine seat, his never-failing spirits, his personal gallantry, his daring enthusiasm, his unfailing devotion, endeared him to his men and all who knew him. They will hear no more the ringing 'Charge' that made every man of them grip his saddle more closely, and clench his hand more firmly on his swordhilt. They will never see again the gleaming blade that so often led them safely through the thickest of the fight. But his memory will be one more prize to the chivalry of the South, and his loss will be avenged. But somewhere in Virginia there is a home that will know this fearless soldier no more, and there will be sorrow that cannot be comforted. GOD grant that the days of peace be not far distant, and that the blood of this Virginian hero, sprung from a race of kings, and in his death worthily redeeming the splendid memories of an ancient dynasty, has not been poured out in vain!

The Presidential Message.

IN another column our readers will find the Message by which President DAVIS inaugurates the first sitting of the third Congress of the Confederate States. There is some significance in this mere formula; suggestive, as it is, of regular government and unbroken constitutional procedure in the midst of a gigantic war, and in a country which is not recognised as independent. In no country in the world, during the last four years, has the machinery of government worked with more perfect regularity, with less interruption, disorder, or confusion, than in the Confederate States of America. While we refuse to recognise the existence of any government in that country; while Lord RUSSELL treats it diplomatically as subject to the authority of Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. SEWARD, and speaks of it in Parliament with a phrase of deprecation, as 'so-styled;' it has a Parliament of its own, which has held its sessions, been prorogued and dissolved at regular intervals, and been regularly re-elected, as if in the midst of profound peace. Everything wears the air of complete organisation and accomplished national independence. In February, 1861, the constituent Congress of the Confederate States met at Montgomery. In February, 1862, the permanent Government of the Confederacy was installed, and the first regular Congress assembled. This Congress has passed through its term of two years, and its successor has now assembled, to receive in its turn from the chief of the Executive Government an account of the position and prospects of the country. And that account is offered by the PRESIDENT in few words, but in language worthy of the occasion, breathing that calm and inflexible resolution which has characterised all the State-papers of the South, free alike from exultation and from despondency, from repining under misfortune and from angry resentment of injuries; a Message worthy in every sentence of a great statesman, conscious that he addresses on a great occasion the representatives of a proud, high-spirited, and unflinching people. Every utterance of the man who at so solemn a crisis has been charged with the destinies of a gallant nation is of interest to all the world; and every Message of the Southern President is received in Europe with an attentive scrutiny, which sufficiently proves how deeply concerned the Old World feels itself to be in the issues of the struggle which now convulses the New.

The subject which occupies the thoughts of all the South is, of course, the first to which Mr. DAVIS addresses himself. Of the glorious success with which Providence had crowned the Confederate arms he speaks with gratitude, but with that quietness which is natural while as yet a mightier struggle impends. Of the savage cruelties inflicted by the enemy on helpless non-combatant, he speaks, as it becomes him to speak, with bitter indignation, but at the same time with a calmness and self-command which only truly great men can assume when speaking of subjects which stir them to the quick. The mere recapitulation of the crimes committed carries with it the condemnation of the offenders in the face of mankind. 'Plunder and devastation of the property of non-combatants, destruction of private dwellings, and even of edifices consecrated to the worship of God, expeditions organised for the sole purpose of sacking cities, consigning them to the flames, killing the unarmed inhabitants, and inflicting horrible outrages on women and children'—these are acts which the Yankees cannot deny or palliate, and which require no terms of moral condemnation from him who describes them. It is not needful to waste words of scorn and execration on those who are guilty of such outrages as these—outrages which, as the PRESIDENT justly remarks, can contribute to no object which their perpetrators would dare to avow, and have not the least effect upon the ultimate issue of the war. In perfect consistency with the spirit which prompts such atrocities as these has been the conduct of the Federals in regard to the exchange of prisoners. They will not observe the terms of the cartel; from time to time they send in prisoners for exchange, when it suits them to do so, but they will make no regular exchanges, and leave thousands of prisoners languishing in Richmond, for the sake of keeping thousands of Confederates to perish of cold and home-sickness in Fort Johnson and other dungeons during the desolate and trying winters of the North. The Federal Government understands its interest too well to give man for man—Confederate Volunteers for Yankee mercenaries; and, moreover, while it cares little for the sufferings of its own hired soldiers, it is fully aware of the advantage of holding in durance thousands of the flower of the Southern people, whose absence is felt and mourned throughout their country. This is but one of the disadvantages under which a nation labours which has to spend the blood of its best and noblest in resisting the mercenary hordes of a foreign despotism. As in exchanges, so in the field; no advantage but is dearly purchased, so long as the gentlemen of the South are matched against German and Irish immigrants, purchased at so many dollars a-head for the slaughter, whose lives are of no account in the eyes of their government or their generals beyond the cost of replacing them.

The treatment of the Confederacy by foreign Powers is a topic on which the PRESIDENT may justly speak with bitterness. Never, certainly, was recognition refused to a government which had proved its ability regularly to administer the affairs of a great country, to keep more than a quarter of a million of men in the field, to beat its enemies in a dozen pitched battles, and to preserve both order and liberty throughout a territory as large as half Europe in the midst of a war for national existence. And this moral claim is not the only one which the Confederacy can prefer. It includes four States which the European powers have distinctly recognised as sovereign and independent, and which have never abdicated those titles, and several other States which have for years held an equal rank and position as their Confederates. The refusal of recognition, therefore, is a double slight. Not only does it wilfully ignore the de facto independence of the Confederacy, but it sets aside the status of the States as originally independent Powers, and endorses the claim of the Federal Government to deal with sovereign communities as with subject provinces. It is natural that such a slight should be described by the PRESIDENT as an exertion of moral influence by the European Powers on behalf of Northern aggression. So long as we refuse to recognise the South, the law of nations being what it is, we virtually say to the North: 'We recognise first the possibility of your conquering the Southern States; and secondly, the fact that these States are your revolted subjects.' For, if the Southern States were not revolted subjects, the fact that the North was attempting to reduce them to submission would be no reason for non-recognition. As there is not the slightest excuse for regarding the Southern States as being, or as ever having been, subject to the North, a course of conduct which implies that we do so regard them fully justifies both the dignified remonstrance of their chief magistrate and the louder resentment of the people.

However keenly he may feel the sufferings inflicted on the South by the lawless barbarism of the enemy, and the injustice done her by the timidity or partiality of Europe, there is nothing despondent or querulous in the tone of President DAVIS's message. A tone of undoubting self-reliance and unflinching resolution runs through the whole of it. It is not the message of a statesman who feels himself face to face with terrible and overwhelming peril, and who, if his spirit rise to meet the danger, speaks in a tone indicative of excited feelings and high-wrought anxieties. There is in it no trace either of exaltation or of despondency. The PRESIDENT speaks as anticipating a long and severe trial, a protracted and a great war; but he speaks as if there were no need of reassurance as to its final issue. He addresses the representatives of the people in full confidence that no words of encouragement or exhortation are necessary to keep up their spirits; with an implicit trust in the courage and resolution of the nation too complete to find its way into words. The absence of all exultation over the recent successes in Louisiana, Tennessee, North Carolina, and at Charleston, and of all anticipations of triumph in Virginia and Georgia, evinces not the lack but the abundance of confidence. Boastful relations of the past, boastful predictions of the future, are signs of misgiving in him who utters them or in those whom he addresses; the quiet and dignified reserve of the Presidential message is the natural tone of a courage which assumes final success as a matter of certainty, but, at the same time, so far from underrating the foe, is prepared for a long and trying conflict.

KING'S COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE:
June 1, 1864.

A HEARTRENDING INCIDENT.—Miss Anna Pickens, the daughter of Governor Pickens, while ministering to the wounded in the hospitals of Charleston, came in contact with a wounded officer, Lieutenant Andrew De Rochelle. The young people fell in love, and after a short courtship it was arranged that they should be married on the 22nd of last month. 'Lieutenant De Rochelle was on duty at Fort Sumter in the morning, and it was determined that the ceremony should take place at the residence of General Bonham in the evening. At the moment the episcopal clergyman was asking the bride if she was ready, a shell fell upon the roof of the building, penetrated to the room where the company assembled, burst, and wounded nine persons, and among the rest Miss Pickens. We cannot describe the scene that followed. Order was reestablished, and the wounded were removed, all except the bride, who lay motionless upon the carpet. Her betrothed, kneeling and bending over her, was weeping bitterly, and trying to staunch the blood that welled from a terrible wound under her left breast. A surgeon declared that Miss Pickens had not longer than two hours to live. When the wounded girl recovered her consciousness, she asked to know her fate, and when they hesitated to tell her—"Andrew," she said, "I beg you to tell me the truth. If I must die, I can die worthy of you." The young soldier's tears were his answer, and Miss Anne, summoning all her strength, attempted to smile. Governor Pickens was almost without consciousness, and Mrs. Pickens looked upon her child with the dry and haggard eye of one whose reason totters. Lieutenant De Rochelle was the first to speak, "Anna," he cried, "I will die soon, too; but I would have you die my wife; there is yet time to unite us.' The young girl did not reply, she was too weak. A slight flush rose for an instant to her pale cheek; it could be seen that joy and pain were struggling in her spirit for the mastery Lying upon a sofa, her bridal dress all stained with blood, her hair dishevelled, she had never been more beautiful. Helpless as she was, Lieutenant De Rochelle took her hand, and requested the Rev. Mr. Dickenson to proceed with the ceremony. When it was time for the dying girl to say yes, her lips parted several times, but she could not articulate. At last the word was spoken, and a slight foam rested upon her lips. The dying agony was near. The minister sobbed as he proceeded with the ceremony. An hour afterwards all was over, and the bridal chamber was the chamber of death. Lieutenant De Rochelle has sworn to perish in battle against the Yankees, and we are sure he will keep his oath.'—The Charleston Mercury.

LETTERS FROM RICHMOND.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

RICHMOND: April 25, 1864.

THE TOWN OF PLYMOUTH, NORTH CAROLINA—AN ACCOUNT OF ITS CAPTURE THE LOSSES BY LAND AND BY WATER—THE BOOTY—PROMOTION OF GENERAL HOKE—THE ADVANTAGES TO THE SOUTH FROM THE CAPTURE OF PLYMOUTH—THE EARLY REPORTS ABOUT THE DEFEAT OF BANKS—THE YANKEE PREPARATIONS FOR THE CAMPAIGN AGAINST RICHMOND—THE FRENCH TOBACCO AND B. BUTLER—REMOVAL OF THE TREASURY CLERKS TO COLUMBIA, SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE brilliant success of our arms, both on land and water, in the capture of Plymouth in North Carolina, furnishes another sad proof to the enemy that the subjugation of the South is a never-ending task. The Yankee foothold, wherever obtained in the Confederate States, is planted upon a surface under which the hidden fires of the 'rebellion' are ever glowing with intensest heat. The enemy have had some melancholy experience very recently of the suppositos cineri doloso in the south and west, and now they find that North Carolina is too hot to hold them. Plymouth, the scene of their latest disaster, is a small town situated on the southern bank of the Roanoke River, eight miles from its entrance into Albemarle Sound. It was an unimportant village before the war, the county seat of Washington County, driving a small trade in shingles and herrings, and having a population of about one thousand souls. The Yankees made it a point d'appui for their operations in North Carolina waters, which they commanded with their gunboats, and concentrated there large amounts of quartermaster's and commissary's stores and munitions of war. They were safe from all danger, as they supposed, on the water, and they had thrown up the most formidable fortifications, mounted with the heaviest ordnance, by which all assault on the land side was rendered impracticable for harm. And so the Yankees slept securely at Plymouth, and fished, and miscegenated, whites and blacks, without a thought of 'rebel' interference. Anything more slumberous than the stillness of the Carolina pine-forests or the quietude of the land-locked Sound could scarcely be imagined. Day followed day, and only the echoes of target practice came back from the depths of the surrounding woods, only the paddles of their transport steamers disturbed the ripples of the bay. At length, one Sunday afternoon, suddenly there emerged from the belt of pines to the south of the town a band of Confederates, easily distinguishable in their brickdust uniforms as 'rebels,' evidently bent on possessing themselves of Plymouth. This Sunday was the 17th of April, and the Confederate force thus suddenly appearing, and capturing or driving in the Federal pickets, was made up of Hoke's old brigade, commanded by Colonel Mercer of the 21st Georgia regiment; Ransom's brigade, commanded by General Ransom in person; and Kemper's brigade, well-known for its splendid conduct at Gettysburg, commanded by Colonel Terry. The whole expedition was under command of Brigadier-General Hoke, a native North Carolinian. The Yankees at Plymouth, commanded by General Wessels, gave themselves small concern at this hostile manifestation. They were behind strong earthworks, they had ponderous artillery and abundant ammunition, and lying off the town were two gunboats whose guns swept the approaches from the land. Our troops arrived before Plymouth about four o'clock in the afternoon, but, as they were greatly fatigued by a long march overland from Tarboro', they did little more that day than feel the works of the enemy preparatory to the attack on the morrow. During the whole of Monday, the 18th, our artillery and sharpshooters were engaged with the Yankee gunboats and forts, and towards dusk of the evening Fort Sanderson, an important detached fieldwork, was assaulted and carried at the point of the bayonet after an obstinate resistance, the losses being considerable on both sides. The taking of this fort enabled our troops to advance close up to the works on the west side of the town, where they remained Monday night. At daybreak of Tuesday the Confederate ironclad steamer Albemarle, Commander Cook, came down the Roanoke River, and attacked the enemy's gunboats and batteries in front of Plymouth with immense effect. An attempt was made to board her with Federal launches, and these were handsomely driven off. The Yankees also tried to lure on the Albemarle to dash herself against a sunken chain stretched across the space that divided their two vessels. Eluding this trap, Commander Cook steamed directly at the larger of the two, struck her amidships, and sank her in a few minutes. The other gunboat he battered with his Brooke gun so seriously that she ran down the river, and, it is believed, sank upon reaching the open waters of the Sound. Meanwhile, General Hoke had demanded the surrender of Plymouth, and received from General Wessels a prompt refusal.

Some skirmishing took place, and a heavy cannonade was kept up on Tuesday, and during the night General Hoke withdrew the larger part of his force by a circuitous and difficult route to the eastern or opposite side of the town. At dawn on Wednesday, all the Yankee defences in this quarter were carried by storm; and the Confederates, entering the streets of Plymouth, drove the Yankees before them to the point they had themselves quitted a few hours before, and where some of their comrades still remained to make the fugitives prisoners. The Albemarle was now pouring a tremendous fire into the fortifications, taking them in reverse and disabling the guns; and there was but one work—what might be called the citadel of the town—which still held out against the assailants. Before moving upon it, General Hoke made a demand for its surrender, which being refused, in like manner with the previous demand for the capitulation of the post, he ordered a charge; whereupon the Yankees, in parties of eight or ten, ran out from the fort into our lines, throwing down their arms, and in a few minutes' time the Federal flag was hauled down, and General Wessels surrendered the entire garrison, consisting of four regiments of infantry, one squadron of cavalry, a battalion of artillery, and two or three companies of disloyal or deserting North Carolinians. Our loss in killed and wounded in the fights before the town was much greater than that of the enemy, in the proportion of three to one, the casualties in General Hoke's command having been 300, whereas not more than 100 of the garrison were shot down. On the water the accounts were reversed. Commander Wood suffered a very trifling loss in disabled men (none are reported as killed), while it is said that out of 140 men on the Yankee gunboat which went down, only 28 reached the shore. The disparity of killed and wounded in the land attack is due to the fact that the Yankees fought behind thick walls of earth, and also to the alarming disadvantage the Confederates had to undergo in moving over an open space that had been marked and staked off for practising at targets, where the exact range for each gun was known beforehand. Among the killed on our side there was but one field officer, the gallant Colonel Mercer, of the 21st Georgia Regiment, who fell while leading a charge on one of the most obstinate of the fortifications.

The fruits of the capture of Plymouth were immense. Twenty-five hundred white and three hundred negro prisoners fell into our hands. We took a Brigadier-General and many officers of lower grade. Twenty-five pieces of ordnance were surrendered with the works. Among the stores taken were more than one thousand barrels of flour, one million pounds of bacon, and one thousand tons of anthracite coal. A fine side-wheel transport river steamer, uninjured by the cannonade, was made a prize. So highly did President Davis esteem the services of General Hoke, in his successful conduct of the expedition, that he made him a Major-General upon the receipt of the welcome intelligence that Plymouth was ours. The fact of the promotion was transmitted by telegraph to General Hoke by order of the President.

The advantages that we may reasonably expect to flow from the fall of Plymouth are very great. The whole coast of North Carolina is so interconnected, within the reefs that edge the Atlantic, that, unless the enemy can hold every point on the sounds and rivers, their security at any one is greatly diminished, and it is quite possible that they may be forced to evacuate Washington, if not Newbern, in a few days. It is understood that an expedition for the reduction of the latter place has been undertaken, and the public is on the qui vive as I write to hear of its results. Possibly the news may reach you before this letter arrives in London.

Our information from the Trans-Mississippi department is most unsatisfactory, and any résumé I might attempt of it would necessarily be made up of wild telegrams from the demented correspondents of Mr. Thrasher's association, and of Yankee rumours and statements, translated from the Chicago to the Dalton dialect, or coming by flag of truce from New York, a source of intelligence splendide mendax; so that, perhaps, I might profitably leave it to your own correspondents in New Orleans and New York to supply your readers with the news from that active and interesting quarter. It would seem, however, that Banks was undeniably whipped on the 8th instant at Mansfield with immense loss—eight thousand men, it is said (including two thousand prisoners), thirty-five guns, and two hundred wagons. In this engagement the Confederates were commanded by Generals Magruder, Holmes, and Dick Taylor; all under General Kirby Smith. The telegram informed us that, after this defeat, Banks retreated towards Natchez (meaning Nagitoches) and was closely pursued by Dick Taylor; and the Chicago authority, taking up the history of the campaign just at this point, stated that on the 9th a battle was fought at Pleasant Hill, where the Confederates were repulsed with a loss of two thousand men. We must wait for official despatches to get at the truth, but looking at these statements from a geographical point of view, the defeat of the Confederates would appear to have been a repulse not of the main body, but of their pursuing cavalry. Pleasant Hill is hardly less than twenty-five miles this side of Mansfield (which is situated about midway between Shreveport and Nagitoches); and though Banks may have accomplished this distance in flight within twenty-four hours, supposing him to move as rapidly as he used to move when Stonewall Jackson was after him, it is hardly probable that the whole force of Kirby Smith could have overtaken him and given battle at that point, compelled, as they must have been, to march along bad roads, encumbered with broken wagons, disabled gun-carriages, dead horses and mules, and all the rubbish that a routed army would leave behind them in disorderly retreat. It seems far more likely that the cavalry under Dick Taylor, coming up with the flying columns at Pleasant Hill, were driven back, and that Banks thus made good his escape to Nagitoches. We shall know all about it after a while. Time will also confirm or contradict the assertion (telegraphic through Thrasher—good name for a chronicler of victories) that we have captured fourteen Yankee gunboats aground above Red River Falls.

The purposes of the enemy against Richmond appear to be developing themselves. A large force is landing at Yorktown, and it is no longer doubtful that a column will be brought up the Peninsula. Grant is reported as having gone to Chattanooga, leaving Meade to engage General Lee, to hold him in check, or to meet his attack, as the case may be. No considerable body of Meade's army has yet attempted the passage of the Rapidan, but several brigades have been moved nearer Fredericksburg, and the entire command has been brought together within narrower limits—a fact which has given rise to the rumour that heavy reinforcements from the west had appeared in our front. The Examiner makes the statement with confidence that all the Yankee regiments brought from the west have been sent to Burnside at Annapolis. The roads are drying rapidly, the forests are putting forth their bravery of green, the birds pipe upon the swaying branches. All these sights and sounds of spring, which in other lands recall only the most delightsome associations, remind us that the time comes for carnage, and only a few weeks can pass before the great conflict will be joined.

About the French tobacco—seven thousand hogsheads of it. I mentioned in my last letter that French steamers and merchantmen were lying at City Point, which had come to carry off this tobacco to Havre, Bordeaux, Marseilles, or wherever else the Emperor should determine. The flotilla has gone without the tobacco, or, to speak more accurately, with just 120 hogsheads of it. Yesterday there came to City Point, by flag-of-truce-boat from Butler at Fortress Monroe, a messenger to say that, the time agreed upon for the departure of the vessels having passed, they could no longer be permitted to remain in the river. What this means, or to what complications, if any, it will lead, we know not. As for the tobacco, it is clear that M. Drouyn de Lhuys may not put it into his pipe and smoke it.

A ridiculous hoax, originating with the Mobile Tribune, is published in all our journals, purporting to be a correspondence between Lord Lyons, representing the British Government, and Mr. Burton N. Harrison, Private Secretary to the President, speaking for His Excellency, in which British neutrality in general and the rams in particular are discussed at some length. The whole affair was an absurd 'April fool,' unworthy of the Mobile Tribune 'or any other man.'

The female employées of the Treasury Department, whose business it is to sign Mr. Memminger's notes, are to leave Richmond to-morrow by a special train of cars for Columbia, South Carolina. Much comment has been submitted upon this removal, which, in many instances, must occasion great hardship to the clerks (who are ladies of refinement and culture, fugitives from their homes, or the wives and daughters of soldiers slain in battle), and which a pleasant leader in the Examiner declares to be in happy accord with Mr. Memminger's finance or General Bragg's strategy. The reasons that dictated it were most probably the question of food in the apital, and the convenience of having the notes signed in the me town in which they are engraved.

The weather is very beautiful at last. There was a pretty remony of a flag presentation this afternoon in the Capitol rounds. The flag was the offering of the ladies of the Treaary Department, on the eve of their departure, to the Battalion f Clerks under command of Colonel M'Anerny. Mr. Meminger presented it in a speech exceedingly graceful and ppropriate.

Enclosed I send you the reply of Governor Smith to the etter of Hon. James M. Mason communicating the fact of the English testimonial to Stonewall Jackson.*

April 18, 1864.

ICHMOND AND NEW YORK - THE CONDITION OF THE LATTER CITY—THE CAPTURE OF FORT PILLOW—SUCH A PROCEEDING NOT IN THE YANKEE 'PROGRAMME OF SUBJUGATION'—THE FEDERAL STEAMER 'MINNESOTA' CRIPPLED BY THE TORPEDO - A YANKEE PLUNDERING EXPEDITION—THE CAPTURE OF A SPY—LOCAL ITEMS—A BATTLE EXPECTED WITH MEADE'S ARMY.

N that very striking letter of the Southern correspondent of he London Times, in which he placed in effective contrast the arnestness and shabbiness of Richmond with the splendour nd frivolity of New York, the English reader must have been mpressed with the indications, so clearly perceived and so orcibly presented, of an approaching collapse in the affairs of ur fast and furious enemies. New York is, doubtless, at this noment the most glittering and godless city on earth. Never as money been so abundant there, never has money been avished in such reckless profusion for all that ministers to the gratification of the senses. Two or three gentlemen, the consular representatives of continental Governments, who came to his city directly from New York by the last flag-of-truce boat, gave us very lively descriptions of the folly and extravagance hat rule the hour. As the movement down the facile descent of Avernus is an ever-accelerated velocity, the prodigality and ostentation must be even greater than when Mr. Lawley rubbed his lazed eyes on Broadway three months ago. In the intervening hree months many hundreds of men have probably grown rich by frauds upon the Government, and their wives and daughters nake just so many additions to the superbly dressed women every day buying silks, diamonds, buhl, statuettes, &c., in the fashionable thoroughfares. The nouveaux riches are making the most of their ill-gotten gains. As Dr. Johnson said of the nabobs of his day, 'Their equipages shine like meteors, and their palaces rise like exhalations.' From magnificence to magnificence the shoddy contractor goes with a rapid pace, even as society hurries from worldliness to vice, and from vice to crime. New ideas have been uttered within these three months, have found wide acceptance, and been seized upon as the basis of a novel philosophy as abhorrent as it is licentious. For any correct picture of the depravity which pervades the whole social fabric of New York, we must turn to the sixteenth chapter of Ezekiel or the sixth satire of Juvenal. The 'personal' column of the Herald, and the exposition in pamphlet form of MISCEGENESIS, as commended and practised by the Yankees, are only hints of the universal corruption. As the end draweth nigh, the multitude seems to become more and more demented. Play runs higher, the orgies are carried further into the night, the delirium rages among a greater number, the segreto ad esser felice is caught at with a wilder rapture, as the hour of doom is just about to sound. It was always so. You have seen that famous picture of Couture's in the Luxembourg, of course—I mean the Décadence de Rome. Well, it was while these very rites of Venus and Bacchus were being celebrated that the Roman highway shook beneath the tread of Alaric's advancing armies. So the feast of Belshazzar went on while Cyrus was thundering at the gates of Babylon, and so the Carnival was established en permanence on the Boulevards, in the salon, and in the theatre, when the Reign of Terror was about to drench Paris with blood. History is ever repeating itself. The Romans ran to consult the entrails of birds as to the future of the empire, the Yankees ask their spiritual mediums when the 'rebellion' is to be 'crushed out;' the worst licentiousness of Babylon was not more disgusting than the embraces of the Yankee and the negro; the Parisians set up a lorette in Notre Dame as the Goddess of Reason, and New England elevates to the pulpit of the new philosophy Miss Anna Dickinson. Meanwhile gold has gone up to 179 on Wall Street, and yet the Yankees will not believe in a Nemesis.

What has caused the sudden rise in gold in New York in spite of all the tricks of Chase to keep it down? The disaster at Shreveport had much to do with it, and following closely upon the unwelcome details of Banks's discomfiture came the intelligence of the capture and destruction of Fort Pillow, which General Forrest carried by direct assault on the 11th instant. This fortification was thirty-five miles above Memphis on the Mississippi River, and had been erected by the Confederates to command the navigation of the stream. It was originally a strong work, but had been greatly enlarged and made almost impregnable by the Yankees. It was garrisoned by 300 whites and 400 negroes, most of whom were slain in the fight which ended in its capture. One hundred prisoners only were brought away. Many of the garrison threw themselves into the Mississippi and perished in its waters. Naturally enough the Yankees are disturbed at these vigorous and unlooked-for measures of General Forrest. It is not at all in their programme of subjugation that after a vast extent of territory shall have been 'reclaimed to the Union,' and the Confederate armies shall have withdrawn their lines far to the southward, suddenly a small body of Confederate cavalry shall sweep through that territory, and smite the invaders hip and thigh. After all, it does not seem that the territory has been conquered as completely as it might have been. Time was that when the brains were out the man would die, and when a country had been subjugated, it would be quiet. To what purpose shall the Yankees 'reclaim' acre by acre the soil of the 'rebellion,' if it will not stay reclaimed, and 'rebel' leaders shall be on the rampage, in this absurd way, in the very regions of redemption? So gold goes up, first five per cent. and then three more, at the news; and although Chase opportunely appears with a story, true or false, of an English loan to the alarming extent of 300,000*l.* (about enough to pay half the expenses of the Yankee Government for a single day), and thus brings it down four per cent., it rallies, and closes at our last dates at 77.

You will have seen in the Yankee papers some notice of a slight injury to the United States steamer Minnesota by a 'rebel' torpedo. The vessel was jarred a little, that was all. There is a pretty fairy tale of the Germans, in which Thor is represented as coming down with his terrible hammer in a tremendous blow upon the forehead of the giant Earth, who lay sleeping one day, and the giant only waked from his slumbers, and asked, 'Was it a leaf that stirred?' The Yankees would have you believe that the Minnesota was no more injured by the explosion of sixty pounds of powder under her bows than the integrity of the earth was destroyed by Thor's hammer. The injury, however, was so severe that the Minnesota will never be worth anything again. All her machinery was blown into fragments, and it required two steamers to tow her into Norfolk. What annoys the Yankees more than all else in this bold attempt at the destruction of one of their finest steam frigates is that they are utterly at a loss to conjecture where the rebel torpedo came from. Whether it fell down from the great Artis-avis (or Bird of Art, a new Confederate projet for navigating the air, the invention of a certain visionary Davidson), or was brought in from sea past Fortress Monroe, or was sent out from either of those thoroughly subjugated cities, Norfolk and Portsmouth, or, yet again, had performed that very long voyage from Drewry's Bluff, they cannot well make out. All they positively know is that the torpedo was somehow or other exploded close to the steamer, and that the steamer was lifted by it inconveniently out of water.

* This reply is published in another column.

Information was received yesterday of the landing of a considerable force of the enemy on Thursday last, the 14th instant, upon the south side of James River, at several points in the county of Isle of Wight, and it was supposed to be the first of Burnside's expedition, which has been fitting out for some weeks at Annapolis. Further intelligence assures us that this force was not connected at all with Burnside, and that its object was nothing more than pillage and destruction. After marauding for two or three days through the section of country lying between Suffolk and the Blackwater, the Yankees took to their boats and went back to Fortress Monroe. This party of plunderers was made up of the 23rd and 24th Massachusetts regiments (the latter recently from the Yankee army before Charleston), a Michigan regiment, a Wisconsin regiment, and a New Jersey battery. The 23rd Massachusetts met with a spirited resistance in Wren's Field, near Smithfield, at the hands of a handful of Confederates, not above 35 in number, under command of Captain Causey. Five or six of the Yankees were killed, and eighteen wounded; and they were so decidedly checked in their purpose that they turned aside from a mill which it had evidently been their intention to burn, and went howling into Smithfield, where they broke into private dwellings and robbed unprotected families after their wonted manner.

An arrest was made on Saturday morning last near Tappahannock, in Essex County, of a certain Signor Lugo, who for many weeks past has been sojourning at the Ballard House in this city. On his person were found carefully drawn maps and charts of Charleston harbour and its fortifications, and of the James River with the exact positions of the submerged torpedoes laid down. Lugo was a Venetian, but spoke tolerable English; his appearance was that of a quiet, amiable, well-bred man, and he had imposed on many persons in high official position here. He bore with him passes from the Secretary of War and the City Provost-Marshal, and he had also a document with 'Confederate States of America, War Department,' at the top, and the genuine signature of Mr. Seddon at the bottom, all the intermediate writing having been erased by some chemical process. This he doubtless intended to use hereafter as occasion should arise. He has a competent acquaintance with the physical sciences, and spent much of his time of mornings in the State Library, pretending to investigate questions of natural philosophy. He also claimed to have invented some highly improved explosive in the nature of a torpedo which he desired the Government to purchase, and it was through conversations on this subject with Government officers that he was enabled to find out where the torpedoes had been placed in James River. Lugo was doubtless in the pay of Seward, and had been sent to Richmond by him to make the drawings which were found upon him. He is much the most dangerous spy that has been arrested in our lines since the beginning of the war, and will most probably be hanged.

Three men of the highest character and of various accomplishments have died in the Confederacy since the date of my last letter—Messrs. Wm. M. Blackford and Richard K. Crallé of Virginia, and Ex-Governor R. F. W. Alston of South Carolina. Mr. Blackford was at one time United States Minister Resident at Bogota in South America. Mr. Crallé was the private secretary and literary executor of John C. Calhoun, whose published works he edited. Mr. Alston had filled many offices of honour and trust in his native State, Governor, Representative, Senator, and reflected credit on all. The three men were equally devoted to the cause of the Confederacy, and had hoped to see its independence finally established.

No prisoners have been returned to us from the North within the week, but several hundreds have been sent off from this city, and a flag-of-truce boat has arrived at City Point, where also are French steamers and merchantmen that have come to take off the tobacco belonging to the French Government. One of these vessels brought a large quantity of furniture and supplies for M. Paul, the French Consul residing in Richmond, who has just returned after several months' absence. From the Northern papers brought by the flag-of-truce boat, we derive some startling foreign intelligence. Among other things the London Correspondent of the New York Tribune is good enough to inform us that the Royal Family of England is angrily divided against itself on the Danish question; that the Queen and Prince of Wales are constantly wrangling; and that, 'not to put too fine a point on it' (I quote the correspondent's own elegant language), 'it is said that they quarrel like cat and dog.'

We have a rumour to-day that Meade is falling back on the Rapidan. The indications are that a battle will be fought in that quarter before May 10. I should be disposed to think it would occur even sooner, but for the desperate condition of the roads. The weather is yet cold for the season; yesterday there was a white frost, but the rains have ceased.

HEAVY RAINS IN THE BEGINNING OF APRIL—THE FAST-DAY IN RICHMOND—THE CONFEDERATE STATES AND MEXICO—THE REAFFIRMATION OF THE MONROE DOCTRINE BY THE FEDERAL HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—HENRY WINTER DAVIS—MR. SEWARD DARE NOT DISREGARD THE VOTE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THE opening of the Spring campaign seems likely to be indefinitely postponed 'on account of the inclemency of the weather.' In my last letter, I spoke of the rainy season through which we had been passing, but the previous floods were as nothing compared with what we have since experienced. The night before last the water tumbled down out of the black sky by the hogsheadful. Probably the quantity that fell, estimated by the rain-gauge, has never been exceeded in the same space of time even in the tropics. Yesterday morning there was a sprinkle of blue overhead and a sprinkle of sunshine on the wet earth, but in the afternoon the heavens were again darkened, and the rain came down without intermission from 1 P.M. until midnight. To-day huge masses of vapour hang above us, and threaten a continuance of the deluge. All the streams that flow from the Alleghanies are in angry freshet. The James River is higher than it has been for fifty years. The flat lands of Chesterfield County opposite the City are entirely submerged, and present the appearance of a vast lake. The water is so deep in several streets in the lower part of Richmond, that locomotion is only practicable in boats. Of course immense damage has been done to the crops, mills, bridges, dams, throughout Virginia. Fortunately, the three bridges which connect Richmond with the south side are all so high above the usual bed of the river as to be out of danger. One of these, the bridge of the Petersburg Railway, more than three thousand feet in length, which is thrown across the rapids or falls of the river one mile above navigation, and full eighty feet above the raging waters, but the county bridge, affording the highway for pedestrians and vehicles, would be reached and inevitably carried off if the inundation should rise twenty inches higher. Such a further rise is not considered a possible event, and, therefore, no apprehension is felt on the subject. On Belle Isle, the level plain recently occupied by the tents of the Yankee prisoners is flooded, and great inconvenience might have been occasioned had not the last thousand of these guests of the Government been sent to Georgia more than a fortnight ago. Perhaps the most serious immediate injury wrought by the freshet will be the destruction in many places of the James River Canal, extending from Richmond, via Lynchburg, to Buchanan, in the County of Botetourt, a distance of two hundred miles—a line of inland water communication which is of the greatest importance to us at this moment for the transportation of produce and supplies from the interior counties to the capital. This canal runs along the margin of the James River throughout its entire extent, and it is hardly possible but that its embankments have been washed away at various points of the line. At this critical juncture of the war, when labourers, white and black, are so few, and so much work is to be done on the public defences and in the Government shops, it will be exceedingly difficult to procure the hands for the necessary repairs, and the scarcity of forage, fuel, and provisions will be greater in this city than ever. When to this destruction of the canal we add the drowning out of corn and wheat crops on many hundreds of thousands of acres overflowed, as the work of the inundation, and consider the unavoidable delay that will occur to farming operations as the result of the sodden condition of the earth, we cannot but regard the last four weeks of rain as the most disastrous season that has been known in Virginia in the quarter of a century. We can only hope that with the subsidence of the floods there will be a cessation of the rains, but the new moon which peeped out for a few minutes three nights ago, a fair shining silver crescent, had both its horns up, and this is held to indicate wet weather till it begins to wane. May the sign be falsified in the present instance, is the prayer of all.

The Presidential Fast-day of Friday last, the 8th instant, was most becomingly and devoutly observed throughout the Confederacy. In this city there prevailed an impressive Sabbath stillness. It was like a Sunday in Edinburgh. A brief interlude of sunny weather which permitted of dry pavements favoured the assembling of the population at the different houses of worship, where sermons appropriate to the occasion were delivered to large and reverent congregations. In the episcopal churches the psalms and collects for Good Friday were read. One striking departure from ordinary usage marked the Fast-day in Richmond. In the evening, the New Richmond Theatre was opened for religious exercises, and from the boards where low comedy nightly addresses itself to the not over-refined tastes of our play-going public, the Rev. Dr. Burrows, of the Baptist Church, preached an earnest practical discourse on the lessons of the war. In lieu of the accustomed playbill, with which the occupants of the galleries were used to wipe their faces in the passion and perspiration of the hour, printed slips of the hymns to be sung were distributed among the audience. The novelty of a sermon from the stage, and curiosity to see the interior of the building, attracted an immense multitude, and hundreds went away who were unable to obtain admission.

The recent news from Europe, of the entire absorption of the public mind in the affairs of Denmark, of Maximilian's intended departure (day after to-morrow) for Mexico, and of the utter indifference manifested everywhere as to the issue of the American war, has created no sort of sensation among our people. We read the editorial of the Times, recording the decree of fate that the American war will be indefinitely protracted, with neither surprise nor vexation. We learn that Seward pledges M. Drouyn de Lhuys, through Mr. Dayton, that the United States will recognise the Empire of Maximilian (with the probable understanding that Maximilian shall not recognise the Confederate States), without the least discomposure. It does, indeed, strike us as un peu fort that a Government yet in embryo should undertake to ignore by special agreement a Government which has maintained itself through three years of war conducted on a scale of magnitude for mischief without a precedent in modern times. We may think that Maximilian in his Imperial capacity is just a little bit of an upstart, and that our recognition of him is of more importance, perhaps, to the future of Mexico than his recognition of us to the future of the Confederate States. But we smile at all this. Our fortunes are not to be decided by diplomacy on the banks of the Seine.

It is somewhat worthy of note, however, and M. Drouyn de Lhuys may put the same in his pipe and smoke it, that at the very moment Mr. Dayton has been amusing himself and the French people with a promise for the recognition of Maximilian's Empire by the United States, the House of Representatives has been reaffirming the Monroe doctrine by a unanimous vote. Nay, the House declared, nemine contradicente, that the United States would not acknowledge a monarchical government on the American continent. The resolution was reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs by a man whose words and actions always mean something—Henry Winter Davis of Maryland. When Seward comes into antagonism with this man, he will find he has met his master. Full of all the learning of the schools, possessed of a wonderful sway over masses of men through a magnetic eloquence which attracts to him even those who reject his opinions, young, ardent, handsome, with an imperial will, a towering ambition, a keen insight into character, and few scruples as to the means he employs to accomplish his purposes, Henry Winter Davis is at this moment one of the most dangerous men in America. To him is largely due the folly of the Northern people in inaugurating this infamous war. Marylander by birth, Virginian by education, he went all over, the North, during the Presidential campaign of 1860, telling the excited thousands who listened with delight to his splendid declamation, that the menace of the South with regard to secession was nothing more than gasconade. In the 35th Congress, he had more entirely the attention of the Lower House, floor and galleries, than any other member of it, Alexander H. Stephens of Georgia alone perhaps excepted. In Baltimore, though all the better elements of the population combined against him, he was all-powerful as the Wilkes of the mob, Prince Prettyman of the Plug Uglies, 'bully boy with the glass eye' of the political clubs and secret societies of that lawless city. But he had manifested his power not only among his rowdy constituents or on the floor of the Representatives. He had taken a high position in the Church in Maryland, in that religious organisation which conforms most nearly to the Church of England—the Protestant Episcopal—and had thus become prominent in the general conventions of this body of Christians under the old Union. Pamphlets of his on polemics had excited much discussion, and he had prosecuted Bishop Doane, of New Jersey, when that prelate was tried by the House of Bishops for certain unbishoplike conduct. In the Supreme Court of the United States he had also acquired some reputation as a lawyer. But law and theology were subordinated by him to the noble game of politics, and it so happens that his favourite political tenet has been from the beginning this very Monroe doctrine of non-interference by foreign Powers with American affairs. Twelve years ago he wrote a remarkable book with the rather startling title of 'The War of Ormuzd and Ahriman,' which undertook to show that there was an inevitable and irreconcilable antagonism between Russia and the United States (these peoples have since been fraternising, you know, in the most delightful manner) —Russia being represented as the Principle of Darkness, and the United States as the Principle (angels and ministers of grace!) of Light! The argument was of the most violent rouge in its treatment of European topics, and the rhetoric was somewhat screechy, if I may be allowed the expression, but the Monroe doctrine came out strongly in the end as the cardinal dogma of Young America. Now it also so happens, in the present confusion of parties in the United States, when Republicans and Democrats are so divided among themselves and so intermingled with each other, that Henry Winter Davis is the warm partisan of Chase for the next Presidency, proposing to be Chase's Secretary of State, and to surround himself with the glory of terminating the 'rebellion.' The recent resolution introduced by him in the House of Representatives may therefore be regarded as a trump card for securing Chase the Black Republican nomination. He will probably not surrender his long-cherished idea at the moment that he can make use of it for his own political advancement. And while the treaty-making power, by which Seward must recognise, if at all, the Empire of Maximilian, is in the hands of the President and Senate, they will hardly dare to exercise it in opposition to the views of a large majority of the people, indeed of the whole people, as expressed on the floor of the Lower House of Congress.

There is but little war news. Two thin army corps have been sent to the army of Meade—the same that were taken from him some months ago to reinforce Rosecrans, then sorely in want of men—and Burnside is busily organising his piebald forces at Annapolis. The Yankees have been fighting sham battles at Culpepper Court House, and in front of Joe Johnston in Northern Georgia, by way of accustoming horses and men to the sound of the guns and the smoke of conflict, being not very confident of their new recruits. Negro regiments have been committing great outrages in the valley of Virginia, and some prominent citizens of Winchester have been carried off prisoners to Washington. General Maury telegraphs from Mobile that Farragut is preparing to make another attack upon the fortifications of that place, and sends a copy of an official report from the Surgeon-General of the army of Banks admitting a Confederate victory at Shreveport. The Confederates had captured a transport, and with torpedoes destroyed a steamer (the Essex) in Red River. After several days of inactivity, the Yankee batteries have opened again on Fort Sumter, knocking up the brickdust, and sometimes cutting off the flagstaff—voilà tout.

Hon. David M. Currin, M.C., from Memphis, Tennessee, has recently died in this State. In him the councils of the Confederacy lose a valuable man.

THE SPIRIT OF THE CONFEDERATE SOLDIERS—VISIT OF GOVERNOR VANCE TO GENERAL LEE'S ARMY—NOBLE BENEVOLENCE OF THE 12TH MISSISSIPPI REGIMENT—RELIGION IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY—THE DAHLGREN MEMORANDUM-BOOK CONFEDERATE FINANCES, ETC., ETC.

NEVER did spring open more unpropitiously. Indeed the spring can hardly be said to have opened at all. A fortnight ago the silly apricots burst into bloom prematurely upon very slight provocation, and were untimely nipped. Some venturous violets and hasty hyacinths have appeared in our gardens only to be covered up with snow, or blown from their stalks by the rude north wind. For a week past we have not seen the sun. Day after day deluge has succeeded drizzle, until the day before yesterday the clouds poured out upon us for five hours such a fall of snow as has not been seen during many winters. Two or three flakes were enough to whiten the top of a hat, and those flakes were so multitudinous that one could not see an object fifty yards distant. When the earth had been covered to the depth of three or four inches, there came a rapid thaw, and this again was followed by a flood of rain, as if the full urns of all the pluvian deities had been emptied of their water. The James River has been ten or twelve feet above its banks, has subsided, and is again in inundation. Much damage has been done to the growing crops of wheat and corn upon the low grounds which were overflowed. You may well suppose that this excess of moisture has brought the roads to their worst possible condition. It is said by officers from General Lee's lines that active hostilities could not be resumed by either army in less than three weeks from the present moment, even if the sun should come out in all his glory, and a dry season follow directly upon our stormy Easter. But the weather signs are adverse still. To-day the wind is north-east, the sky again threatens snow, and we are most of us in the temper of Mr. Jarndyce in his lowest depression of meteorological moodiness. It is in the army alone that one may see a gaiety which no inclemency of the weather can affect—a buoyancy of spirits above the barometer.

As the army is the hope, so it is the pride of our people. And most justly indeed. Half-fed, ragged, without adequate shelter from the wintry blast, drawing pay in a wretchedly depreciated currency, the greater part of them far from their homes, our brave troops have never murmured at the hardness of their lot, never known an hour of despondence as to the ultimate triumph of our cause. A visit to the front never fails to encourage the civilian. In going from camp to camp he must run the gauntlet of their chaff, and he will be derided for every garment he wears, very possibly for his horsemanship, and for his general appearance of non-combatant: for the boys are merciless in their personal criticisms, but there is no malice in their mirth, and if they are particularly severe on 'a biled shirt,' as they invariably call tidy linen from the hands of the laundress, and insist vociferously that the stranger must 'come out of that stove-pipe' (meaning his hat), it is because they associate these articles of dress, rightfully or wrongfully, with a disposition to shirk the military service in remaining in civil employment at home. Their enthusiasm is excited to the highest pitch at the sight of any eminent man who has shared the perils of their previous campaigns, and done good service against the Yankees, even though he may have left the army for other honourable positions: and the colonel or general who has come down to the ranks (by reason of non-election or want of a command), and with good grace accepted the post of 'high private,' with all its privations and hardships, cannot move about among them without being cheered. Unselfish themselves, they have a generous admiration for unselfishness, and they respond with ready and active sympathy to any appeal of charity or of patriotism. Governor Vance, of North Carolina, has recently made a visit to the army of General Lee, and addressed the regiments of his State upon the condition of the country and the prospects of the campaign. As a general proposition, the army is not fond of stump-oratory. Action and not words is best suited to their temper. But the North Carolinians received Governor Vance with pride and pleasure. All along the extended line of the Rapidan, he spoke to eager and animated, though very tattered and hungry audiences, who manifested their satisfaction in such shouts of applause as one can only hear in the army.

An incident related to me by the Rev. Beverly T. Lacy, who was the chaplain of our lamented hero Stonewall Jackson, will suffice to show how tender are the hearts that beat under the beggarly brown jackets of the rank and file. Two weeks ago he was preaching at the camp of the 12th Mississippi regiment. It had somehow reached the ears of this corps that the poor of Richmond were suffering sorely for the necessaries of life. After sermon in the morning, there having been a large and most respectable congregation, a meeting was held to consider in what manner the regiment could contribute to relieve the distress among the poor of Richmond. It was a puzzling question enough. Silver and gold had they none; Confederate money was scanty with them; food and raiment might not be provided by men who lived on half-rations and walked barefoot, many of them, over the snow. The Mississippians were in worse plight, perhaps, than any other boys in General Lee's army. The troops from States not so remote had received from home boxes of provisions and clothing to eke out the inadequate Commissary and Quartermaster's stores supplied them by the Government. But the Mississippians were twelve hundred miles from home, and home with the larger portion of them had either been devastated by the enemy or yet remained in the enemy's hands. In their impecunious and utterly resourceless condition, their undertaking to help the poor of Richmond seemed very much as if the editors of the Yankee journals and the members of the Lincoln Cabinet should convene to concert measures for the suppression of lying, or the young ladies and gentlemen of the Argyll Rooms should resolve themselves into a meeting in furtherance of the objects of the Evangelical Society. There was but one mode in which the Mississippians could make a contribution, and to this they resorted. They determined to commute their rations one day in every week, and apply the proceeds to the relief of the destitute in the capital! Noble fellows! When we think of this weekly fast, thus voluntarily imposed, in the cause of humanity, we recall that widow's mite which was more acceptable in the eye of the Eternal Pity than all the gifts that were cast by the rich men into the treasury. The 12th Mississippi has signalised itself on many a hard-fought field of battle, from the day of the first struggle at Manassas to the night which closed in blood over Cemetery Hill at Gettysburg, but all its glory is mean in comparison with that reflected from this act of Christian benevolence.

It gives me pleasure to say that, upon further enquiry into the facts, it was found that this weekly abstinence was altogether unnecessary, and the 12th Mississippi will draw its rations (half-rations, and meagre enough at best) regularly as heretofore.

From the same gentleman to whom I am indebted for this interesting incident, I learn some facts which show with what energy and success missionary labours have been prosecuted in the army of General Lee. There are in that army eighty-five regular chaplains of various denominations, and, scattered through the various corps, there are not less than thirty-seven comfortable chapels, of logs or pine boarding, in which religious services are conducted every Sunday. The general commanding never fails to attend public worship, accompanied by his staff, upon the Lord's day, at the chapel nearest his headquarters. During the winter, while the army was inactive in encampment, not a day passed of good weather on which some religious exercises were not held in these chapels. Mr. Lacy went with the army into Pennsylvania, and he says that the most careless person could not but be affected by the circumstance that, whenever a bivouac was ordered for the night, little groups of soldiers would collect together for prayer. Of such men was composed the host that marched to invade the enemy's country. It was remarked, also, that the praying soldier was always the fighting soldier. They had, many of them, been taught tactics by Jackson, and if they had not been drilled into devotion by him, the silent influence of his example had wrought the one great change in their lives. The large circulation of religious literature among the Confederate troops has been productive of the happiest results. The congregation of St. Paul's Episcopal Church in this city has alone sent ten thousand copies of an abridgement of the Book of Common Prayer to the tents on the Rapidan. If this letter should fall under the notice of the Earl of Shaftesbury, it will gratify him to know that the Bibles and Testaments voted to the Rev. M. D. Hoge for the 'rebel' soldiery have been so usefully bestowed. Bread cast upon the waters sometimes returns before many days.

General Fitzhugh Lee has recently deposited in the War Department the private memorandum-book of Ulric Dahlgren, taken from his person by Lieutenant Pollard at the same time with the memorable and infamous 'orders' which have been so widely published. If any doubt whatever existed as to the genuineness of these 'orders,' the memorandum-book would remove it for ever. This precious vade mecum of the Yankee colonel is specially explicit and satisfactory upon those very points as to which the Yankee journals affect to entertain great suspicion in considering the former documents. The sacking and burning of Richmond is more fully set forth, as a work to be done thoroughly. Not the public buildings only were to be fired: every house was to be set a-blazing. 'You must encourage the prisoners,' he says, in a little private mem. for the eye, doubtless, of his next in command—'you must encourage the prisoners' (those liberated from Belle Isle) 'to destroy the city; make one vast flame of it!' The prisoners might be tempted to defer their work of conflagration for such plunder as they might find in the dwellings of rich citizens, silver-plate, diamonds, gold watches, old cobwebby bottles of inestimable Madeira formerly in the cellar of Chief Justice Marshall, and any other little valuables that were worthy of their attention—they might linger too long, perhaps, in glutting their bestial desires, so it were wise to enjoin a proper degree of expedition in making 'one vast flame' of the city. As to the assassination of the President and Cabinet, Ulric is perfectly intelligible in his memorandum-book. He says: 'Jeff. Davis and Cabinet must be killed on the spot.' There was to be no delay at all. Wherever one of Dahlgren's troopers overtook a fugitive Secretary, within doors or without, he was to put the 'rebel' counsellor to death. If the President could but be seen, he was to be shot at, and the Yankees were not to desist until there was an end of 'Jeff. Davis.' We have not heard as yet what impression the news of the Kilpatrick raid, and the exposure of the purposes with which it was undertaken, has made upon the English mind; but I venture to commend the Dahlgren memorandum-book to the thoughtful reading and meditation of that meek member of the fraternity of peace-lovers (not peace-makers—they are a very different set), Mr. John Bright, and would like very much to ask him what he thinks of his Yankee brethren now.

You will perceive from the monetary articles of the daily press that the funding of Treasury notes under the Currency Bill of the late Congress was closed on April 1, in accordance with law, with results somewhat exceeding the expectations of the Secretary of the Treasury himself. From returns already received, we are justified in computing the total amount funded at $230,000,000. When we reckon the immediate conversion of the interest-bearing $100 notes from currency into bonds of the Confederate States, the deduction of 33 per cent. from the value of all notes above the denomination of five dollars which were not funded, the lost and expatriated notes, and the enormous amount in tens, twenties, and fifties which must be soon paid into the Treasury in taxes, we cannot but conclude that the circulation of the country will have been brought down in a few weeks from nine hundred to two hundred millions of dollars. The salutary effect of this enormous reduction cannot be doubted.

Commissioner Ould has just returned from Fortress Monroe, whither he went upon business connected with the exchange of prisoners. He gives us the gratifying assurance that the exchange will be shortly resumed, though we are not informed which Government has yielded the point of Butler's reception as Commissioner.

We have General Forrest's official report of the occupation of Paducah in Kentucky. The movement was entirely successful. General Forrest drove the enemy to their forts and gunboats, held the town for ten hours, captured many stores, and lost only twenty-five men in killed and wounded. The Yankees lost fifty in killed and wounded, and five hundred prisoners. This account differs very materially from that given in the Northern papers.

General Patton Anderson telegraphs from Florida that a Yankee steamer has been destroyed by a torpedo, fifteen miles above Jacksonville, opposite the mouth of Doctor's Lake. This took place on the evening of April 1.

Honourable William W. Crump, of this city, has been appointed Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and has entered upon the discharge of his duties of his office.

Commander William L. Maury, late of the steamer Georgia, C.S.N., surprised his friends yesterday morning by suddenly 'turning up' at home. He arrived in Wilmington in the Vance last Friday from Bermuda.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA: May 7, 1864.

BANKS'S CONVENTION IN NEW ORLEANS—THE QUESTION OF SLAVERY—MILITARY AFFAIRS—CRITICAL POSITION OF BANKS'S ARMY—CONFEDERATE MOVEMENTS.

THE so-called Free State Convention, of the assembling of which you have been advised, has now been in session in this city twenty-five days. It derived its being from the military power, and, being intended to aid in the work of 'restoration,' is of course composed exclusively of loyal-unconditional-Union men, as the extreme Federal or Radical party style themselves. A large proportion—perhaps a majority—of the members are Northern men who have settled here since the occupation of the city by the Union forces. The main business of the Convention is officially declared to be 'the revision and amendment of the Constitution of Louisiana.' Such is the official declaration, which means that the Convention shall so revise the State Constitution as to strike therefrom every section and clause recognising and guaranteeing the system of African slavery, and shall attach to the said Constitution an amendment prohibiting the 'peculiar institution' in Louisiana for ever, and with this understanding each member was elected. And yet this Convention makes but slow progress in the work of revising and amending. The speeches of some of the members show an unlooked-for hesitation about grappling with the main question. A majority of them confess that the question is more difficult of solution than they had dreamed of in their philanthropic zeal, and a few are bold enough to declare that there are too many material and social interests involved in the system of slavery for it to be swept away radically and immediately by a mere scratch of the pen. And the fact that the Convention has been in session twenty-five days without reaching any definite result, shows the perplexity in which members find themselves. They have had under debate for some three weeks the reports of the Committee on Education—a majority and minority report: the first proposing an amendment to the Constitution so as to make it obligatory upon the State Legislature to provide for the education of the emancipated negroes; the second, or minority report, leaving the matter optional with the Legislature. The debate upon these reports brought up the question of slavery in all its relations; and, as the views of the member may possess some interest for the honest and thoroughgoing Abolitionists of England, I have secured for publication the speech of one of the ablest speakers as taken down by an authorised reporter. Mr. Abell said: With the lights of history before him, he had to confess that if slavery be an evil, which he would not stay to discuss now, it had become not only a necessary evil, but a blessing to both races. The system had been sanctioned in all ages, had been guaranteed and protected by the framers of the Constitution, and approved by some of the wisest statesmen the world had ever known. For these reasons, whatever may be his sentimental feelings upon the abstract question of slavery, he felt called upon to combat the assumption that slavery is abolished in Louisiana. The assumption of the majority that slavery is abolished in the State had no foundation in fact. He might admit that under martial law slavery is inoperative, but the rights of slaveowners still existed, and when peace was declared, and the civil law resumed its sway, these rights must and will be recognised. Every lawyer knows that while a right may be in abeyance the title is nevertheless good, and this he held to be the case with regard to slavery in this State. It would be absurd to legislate upon slavery outside the Union lines. Mr. Abell contended that the negroes were by instinct vicious and lazy, and if immediately emancipated and turned loose would crowd into the cities like the locusts of Egypt, fill prisons and dens of crime, and die of want and disease. Taken from their kind and thoughtful owners, a prey to the rapacity of speculators, instead of the sleek, contented, and happy slaves, we would encounter (as we are now doing in this city) hungry, ragged, miserable wretches, burdens upon society, and victims of an ignorant, false, sentimental philanthropy. Freedom and inequality are incompatible. He would ask, was there a member of the Convention willing to admit the negro as his equal? Not one. Even the negro worshippers of the North were unwilling to concede social or political equality to the negro. General Banks himself, with wise foresight, had decreed a system of forced labour for the negro, fixed the rate of wages which he should receive, and officers were now busily engaged in forcing the negroes to work on plantations. Much sentimental sympathy has been wasted upon the slave, and a great cry has been raised against his cruel master. He was free to admit there were cruel masters. But there were also cruel husbands and cruel parents. If slaves have been whipped to death, wives have often been choked to death by their husbands, and children murdered by unnatural parents, but these abuses did not justify the abolition of marital or parental relations. In their sympathy for the African, gentlemen had forgotten the sufferings of the whites. He asserted what he knew to be the case when he declared that of all labouring classes the slave was the best fed, the best clothed, the most cared for, and the most contented of any on the face of God's earth. Go to New York or to any of the large cities of the free States, and witness the misery, suffering, and want of the labouring classes, and compare their condition with that of the fat and contented negro slave of past years. Since the temporary suspension of slavery in Louisiana every one was familiar with the miserable and degraded condition of the negroes. He was told that recently white families had begged of a member of the Convention the crumbs that fell from his table. Who ever saw or heard of such a thing in the sunny South before the temporary prostration of slavery? His sympathies were first for those of his own race and colour. And, for the reasons he had now given, he would to-day raise his voice against the outrage now attempted to be perpetrated upon the white people of Louisiana.

I am told that the speech of Mr. Abell, of which I have given but the substance, made a deep impression upon the Convention, and converted a number of the members to his views.

General Banks's army is still in jeopardy in Western Louisiana. The Confederates, who are now said to be fully equal to the Federal strength, are very boldly aggressive. They have all but shut up the Union forces within Alexandria, and their cavalry, mounted infantry, and flying artillery are operating along Red River from its mouth up to Alexandria. Within the week they have captured and destroyed five transports laden with troops and stores, as we learn through Federal sources. Eight gunboats and a number of transports remain above the falls, the river being too low for them to get over, and it is generally thought that they will also be destroyed or captured. All the forces that could be spared from other points in the Department have been despatched to Alexandria, but still General Banks finds it extremely difficult to extricate himself from his cul de sac. It is reported (in fact the official organ here acknowledges there was some fighting) that since Sunday last the Union forces twice attacked the Confederates outside of Alexandria, and were each time severely repulsed. In the second fight the Federals are said to have lost 6,000 men and a number of guns. The Mobile ram, Tennessee, is reported over Dog River Bar, and ready for a dash upon Farragut's squadron. Another engagement was fought between Clinton and Baton Rouge on the 3rd instant, in which the Federals were badly defeated. No particulars are given save the death of a few officers. There are rumours of an impending attack upon this city by the fleet at Mobile under Admiral Buchanan and the army of General Polk, the main body of which is said to be at Ponchatoula on the New Orleans and Jackson railroad. Confederate forces are also in front of Port Hudson, with the supposed design of seizing that stronghold, and thus closing the river to all navigation, especially to the return of Banks's army from Red River, if indeed it should be so fortunate as to escape capture. Letters have been received here, stating that General Fremont has been appointed to this department.

LETTER FROM NASSAU.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

NASSAU: May 9, 1864.

REVIVAL OF BUSINESS—UNUSUAL ACTIVITY DURING THE 'DARK MOON'—NEW BLOCKADE-RUNNERS—ARRIVALS AND DEPARTURES—ONLY ONE EXPEDITION OUT OF TWENTY-TWO UNSUCCESSFUL—THE REMOVAL OF GOVERNOR BAYLEY—AN ATTEMPT TO LEVY A DUTY ON COTTON—AN IMPORT DUTY IMPOSED ON MERCHANDISE—THE FEDERAL GUNBOAT 'GALENA'—NEWS FROM THE SOUTH—THE PREPARATIONS FOR THE CAMPAIGN IN VIRGINIA.

SINCE my last of the 9th ult. the business revival therein foreshadowed has become a reality. Although the restrictive laws recently enacted by the Confederate Congress remain in force, it is now understood that they will not be so construed as to prevent the smaller class of steamships continuing in the trade on a profitable footing. Accordingly, the present 'dark moon' has witnessed an unusual activity among both merchants and shippers, and business is apparently in a more flourishing condition than ever heretofore.

Since forwarding the last table of blockade statistics (March 11) the following additions have been made to the phantom commerce: S.s. Young Republic and General Whiting (from Havana), Greyhound (Liverpool), Tristram Shandy (Glasgow); and the Letter B. (England) is expected to-morrow, being already reported. Against these additions there is but one loss to record—the Alliance, captured off Savanah, an event that surprised no one, she being almost worthless, and having changed hands three times before finding an owner sufficiently venturesome to risk her in the trade. The arrivals and departures from the Confederacy since March 11 are as follows:—

ARRIVALS.—March 15, s.s. Alice, Wilmington; 16, Hansa, Wilmington; 21, schr. Petrel, Charleston; April 5, s.s. Coquette, Wilmington; Syren, Wilmington; 16, A. D. Vance, Wilmington; 18, Lucy, Wilmington; Annie, Wilmington; 28, Will o' the Wisp, Wilmington; 30, Edith, Wilmington; Syren, Wilmington. May 7, Lucy, Wilmington.

DEPARTURES.—April 6, s.s. Alliance, Savanah; Mars, Charleston; 9, Syren, Wilmington; Will o' the Wisp, Wilmington; Greyhound, Wilmington; 21, A. D. Vance, Wilmington; 25, Young Republic, Wilmington; 25, Lucy, Wilmington; May 2, Will o' the Wisp, Wilmington; Annie, Wilmington; 5, Syren, Wilmington; 6, Tristram Shandy, Wilmington; 7, Fannie, Wilmington; Alice, Wilmington.

All of the above sailing previous to 5th instant have safely arrived, with the solitary exception of the Alliance (captured), thus showing in two months twenty-one successful evasions of the blockade to one unsuccessful. We have remaining twelve screw-steamers in port, the majority of which leave this week.

The principal topic of local interest is the recent removal of Governor Bayley from office, it is supposed on account of his views upon the American question conflicting so strongly with those of His Grace of Newcastle, as evidenced in the correspondence lately forwarded you. Be this as it may, the letter of dismissal was couched in the same spiteful and pointed terms that characterised the correspondence alluded to; and, as if to make it more marked, it lacked the poor courtesy of even naming his successor, a matter of which we are all in doubt at present. An attempt was made in the House of Assembly last month to tax all cotton received here 75 cents per bale, a tax which, in view of the present heavy receipts, would have proved very onerous. The measure was sturdily opposed by the mercantile influence in that body, and its absurdity in view of the pressing necessities of English manufactures so plainly demonstrated as to defeat it on the third reading. A duty has, however, been levied upon all descriptions of merchandise landed in bond of ½ per cent. ad valorem. Did these legislators consult their true interests, they would lose no time in declaring the ports of this colony free, similar to that of St. Thomas, now the most flourishing of all the West India Islands.

Our harbour was honoured about twelve days ago with the presence of the Federal gunboat Galena. Having entered in distress, she was allowed to remain for three days, during which time the officers were entertained by the Governor and the Staff of the 1st W. I. Regiment; despite these courtesies they complained bitterly at the ridicule and jeers their appearance in the streets evoked from the populace.

By the screw-steamer Lucy, we yesterday received news from the Confederacy to the evening of the 4th inst., by which all the late reported Southern successes are confirmed. The news from the Trans-Mississippi department is somewhat confused, but still sufficiently plain for us to glean the fact that Kirby Smith has had two engagements with the enemy since that of Pleasant Hill, in both of which he has met with splendid success. In the last he is said to have driven Banks's army across Red River towards Natchez, the only available point left to them for transportation back to New Orleans—their Red River flotilla (forty in all), in which the advance was made, having been locked in above the flats by the sudden fall of water, and where their destruction is being rapidly accomplished by the Confederates, thirteen having been destroyed up to last accounts.

General Price is also stated to have gained a victory in Arkansas over Steele, capturing four thousand men, but the report lacks confirmation. It is very evident, however, that Generals Smith, Magruder, Taylor, and Price are rapidly concentrating their forces, making in the aggregate a very large army, and intend opening an aggressive campaign against the Federals in that section, destined to distract more of their attention from operations in Virginia and Georgia than they have latterly dreamed of. Wirt Adams has succeeded in cooping them up in Vicksburg, that country being now clear of the Vandals. From General Johnston's army we hear only of the 'busy note of preparation.' Some skirmishing is reported in his front, but this he understands as only a feint to cover Grant's grand movement on Richmond. He will most probably remain quiescent until the door is opened for him by General Lee, the entire prospective campaign now hinging upon his operations. I learn from Captain Duguide, s.s. Lucy, that, late on the day of her leaving Wilmington, a telegram was received from Richmond stating that the grand contest in Virginia had already opened, Grant attacking Lee's right and left simultaneously at Fredericksburg and Raccoon Ford. Military critics regard it, however, as a feint, it being generally understood that Grant's real plan of campaign is almost identical with that followed by McClellan in his failure, and of which General Scott is the originator and unswerving supporter. It is whispered that Richmond is equally well posted with Washington with regard to all matters connected with the Federal campaign and the Government, and the utmost confidence pervades all classes.

Much has been written and said about the new concentrative policy with which the Federals are inaugurating the campaign. So far it has been productive to them of reverses only, by withdrawing their troops from the points on the seaboard where they had secured a foothold when pursuing the 'Anaconda policy.' The Confederates have been enabled to achieve many important successes, and it yet remains to be seen whether they are to be the gainers elsewhere. As it is, it seems as though the Southern leader had borrowed a leaf from their book, and had so far profited by it that the monster army Grant leads onward to Richmond is destined to meet a monster to cope with. Private information assures me that the troops in Lower Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina have all moved forward under the gallant Beauregard to the defence of Richmond, he himself remaining with a few brigades in siege of Newbern to cover the movements of the main army. General Johnston has already spared a corps d'armée, and it is said that even the Palladin Polk will appear in the fifth act with his veterans. In view of these immense preparations you will at once comprehend the magnitude and importance of the Virginia battle, now, perhaps, progressing. It is destined, in the writer's humble opinion, to be not only the most important in our history, but almost the decisive action in event of Southern success, of which none here doubt. One fact is plain, that the Federals will never be able again to marshal such a formidable force upon Southern territory as is now converging against that most coveted and most heroic city of Richmond. This they themselves freely acknowledge. If victory does perch upon the 'star-emblazoned cross,' the fallacy of subjugation must be once and for ever exploded.

HAMILTON, BERMUDA: April 27, 1864.

ALL'S well with us here at present. I hope to have some Southern news for you to-day from St. George's, but with the exception of the loss of one of our traders, the Chapman, that was wrecked off St. George's, there is nothing fresh. Two of the coloured men kidnapped from our vessel in New York have returned; the first coloured man and the white man cannot be found. Newly-arrived emigrants daily meet the same fate, and it is impossible to trace them, as the authorities are as unscrupulous as the kidnappers they employ. The double screw-steamer Atalanta came into St. George's from England in eleven days—these are the sort of craft for blockade-running!

May 3.—The blockade-runner Index arrived yesterday with news from Wilmington, and 770 bales cotton and 340 boxes tobacco; she reports the Siren as arrived, and the A. D. Vance and Edith about to leave for Nassau. Plymouth, N. C., has been taken by General Hoke and Commander Cook, with 2,500 prisoners, including 400 negroes and a brigadier, 30 pieces of artillery, 100,000 lbs. meat, 1,000 barrels flour, full garrison outfit, two gunboats sunk, another disabled, and a steamer taken, with a loss of only 300 Confederates, but General Miller is amongst the killed. This news is confirmed by the Yankee papers. The Federal loss is very great on Red River, and that good little river has suddenly fallen, leaving 10 Federal gunboats and transports, to be taken by the Confederates at their leisure.

Ships Loading.

At Liverpool.—The Agnes Louisa (steamer), The Mary James, The Young Marquis, The Ariosto, for Nassau. The Oleander, for Bermuda. The Grenadian (steamer), for West Indies; Leech, Harrison & Forwood.

At London.—The Crocodile, The Elinor, for Nassau; J. Worley. The Trio, for Bermuda. The Floride (steamer), for Cuba and Vera Cruz; Stringer, Pembroke & Co.

A steel paddle-wheel steamer, built for Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm & Co., intended for the American and Nassau trade, was launched from the yard of Messrs. Jones, Quiggin & Co. at Liverpool. She is the largest steel merchant ship yet built, being 1,800 tons burthen. She is 281 feet long, 36 feet broad, and 16 feet depth of hold. Mrs. Lockwood, wife of Captain Lockwood, the intended commander, christened the vessel the Colonel Lamb. This is the name of a Confederate officer, and President Davis's health was afterwards drunk at the luncheon.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

Wednesday Evening.

As was fully anticipated, the Bank of England Directors, at their weekly meeting on Thursday last, reduced the rate of discount from 8 to 7 per cent. Since then, money in all commercial circles has been much easier; the demand for discount both at the Bank and in the open market has not been at all pressing, and as there is now an almost entire subsidence of speculation, with nothing pressing to keep up rates, an impression prevails in many quarters that the Bank may possibly make a further reduction to-morrow, particularly as the brokers are freely discounting good paper at from 6¼ to 6½ per cent. and have plenty of capital in hand. The Joint Stock Banks also continue well supplied, and are working their resources at 6¼ to 6½ per cent. On the Stock Exchange money during the week has not been in great demand, and the terms for loans from day to day have varied from 4½ to 5 per cent. To-day, however, there has been rather more enquiry for accommodation, and the terms have temporarily advanced to 6 per cent.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The generally improved aspect of the money market has given a stimulus to business in almost every department of the Stock Exchange. In the English funded securities a rather extensive business has been transacted: but although there is not any quotable alteration in prices as compared with last week, still quotations remain remarkably firm, with a tendency to further improvement. The closing price of Consols this evening was 91⅝ to 91¾ for money, and 90¼ to 90⅜ ex. div. for the account. Exchequer bills have slightly improved, the March issue being 12*s.* to 7*s.* discount, and the June do. 6*s.* to 1*s.* discount. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has notified that the bills falling due on the 11th inst., which have hitherto borne interest at 3 per cent., will be renewed at 3½ per cent. There has been a good business transacted in the foreign stock market, but the dealings have to some extent been curtailed by the usual half-monthly settlement. Peruvian Stock has shown some fluctuations, in consequence of the announcement of the differences between Spain and Peru. At one time the stock fell between 2 and 3 per cent., but it has now mostly recovered, and closes firm at the advance. Greek has also been largely dealt in, and leaves off at 25¼ to 25¾, being an improvement of 1½ per cent. Mexican is not quite so firm, the present quotation being 44⅛ to 44⅜. Spanish are firm, the Passives at 31⅞ to 31⅜, and the Certificates at 11⅛ to 11¼. Turkish Six per Cents. of 1854 have improved ½ per cent., the last quotation being 89½ to 90½, but those of 1862 are unaltered, closing at 70½ to 71½.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been inactive this week, but the stock is well sustained in value. The still indecisive situation of the contending armies in Virginia deters operators. The next news is looked for with intense interest. The closing quotation to-day is 64 to 66.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Business in American Government and Railway Securities has during the greater part of the week been entirely neglected. On one or two days a few transactions took place, but they were entirely of an unimportant character, and prices, though not presenting any material alteration, exhibit a downward tendency. The continued favourable advices with regard to the Confederate successes in Virginia have for a time put almost an entire stop to the operations of the dealers, and nothing whatever is done of a speculative character. The only dealings recorded have been in Virginia State Six per Cents., at 33½. Atlantic and Great Western Railway (Pennsylvania section), 72½; Erie Shares, $100, all paid, 56, 57 and 56; ditto ditto Seven per Cent. Preference, 51½; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, 28, 27 and 27½.

NASSAU.

Our Nassau correspondent, under date May 9, says freights were at 30*l.* per tonnage measurement, and prices in the Confederacy offer a good margin. He also sends the following prices current:—Acids, nitric, $23 to $25. Alcohol, $1.00. Beef, mess, $14.00. Bi-carb. soda, 4*c.* to 4½*c.* Bale rope, Manilla, 12*c.* to 13*c.*; ditto, Kentucky, 12*c.* Borax, 23*c.* to 25*c.* Coffee, Rio Jan. and Java, 18*c.* to 20*c.* Cotton cards, Whittemore, No. 10, $13 to $14; English, No. 10, $11 to $12; Card clothing, 4 36, $2.50 per square foot. Calf skins, French, $30 to $35. Candles, stearine, 23*c.* to 24*c.*; adamantine, 22*c.* to 23*c.* Copperas, 2½*c.* to 3½*c.* Cotton, 42*c.* to 43*c.* Gunny cloth, 13*c.* Flour, superfine, $8.50. Hams, sugar-cured, 15*c.* to 20*c.* Liquorice, paste, 18*c.* to 20*c.*; ditto, sticks, 25*c.* Logwood, extract of, 15*c.* Lard, leaf, 15*c.* to 16*c.* Molasses, per gal., 22*c.* to 24*c.* Nails, cut, $5 to $5.50. Oils, olive, Marseilles, and Nice, $4.50 to $5.00; lard, per gal., $1.50; sperm, $2.50 to $2.75; Kerosene, 60*c.* to 65*c.* Pepper, black, 14*c.* to 15*c.* Potatoes, per barrel, $3 to $3.50. Percussion caps, musket, per thousand, $1 to $1.25; pistol, per thousand, 28*c.* to 45*c.* Quinine, sulph., $2.25. Sardines, half tins, $2.75 to $3; ditto, quarter tins, $2 to $2.10. Sugar, crushed, 14*c.* to 15*c.*; ditto, Havana brown, 8*c.* to 8½*c.* Turpentine, $1.75 to $2. Tobacco, 25*c.* to 35*c.* Whiskey Bourbon, $1.00 to $1.50.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has been issued of the Italian Land Company, the capital of which is to be 1,500,000*l.* in 30,000 shares of 50*l.* each, 1*l.* to be paid on application, and 4*l.* on allotment. In the opinion of the directors, a large field is presented for the investment of capital, and large returns are anticipated. The rate of interest which such advances will afford in Italy is so much greater than in this country that loans repayable by annual instalments spread over twenty or twenty-five years, will prove exceedingly lucrative. The directors propose to make purchases from the various large tracts of Crown land, to be be selected from the domains of the Government. The land will be selected in the localities most favourable for rapid improvement, or in contiguity with the new lines of railway, and on or near to the sea coast where agricultural and other operations are carried on. The project is brought out under the auspices of the International Financial Society and the Anglo-Italian Bank, both of which institutions can give it a large amount of support.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Business in the British Railway Share Market has not been particularly brisk during the week, the dealers having for two or three days been chiefly occupied with the half-monthly settlement; nevertheless the transactions have been to a fair extent, and the general tenor of prices is towards a further improvement, but the fluctuations have been inconsiderable. To-day the market has had a better appearance, with more buoyancy in prices. The only variations as compared with last week are an advance of 1 per cent. in West Cornwall; of ½ to ¾ per cent. in Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, North Eastern (York), and of ½ per cent. in London and North Western. On the other hand there has been a fall of about 2 per cent. in North London. In Foreign Railway Shares there has not been so much doing, but prices remain steady. Shares in undertakings connected with the British possessions have been more extensively dealt in, at generally improved quotations, particularly for Indian descriptions.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The transactions in specie and bullion continue of a very favourable character, and add materially to the improved aspect of monetary affairs. The amount of gold sent into the Bank during the week has been 272,000*l.*, whilst there has been nothing withdrawn to send out of the country. The arrivals of specie have again been large, amounting to 620,920*l.*, of which 422,800*l.* was from the West Indies and the Pacific, and 198,120*l.* from New York. The Oneida, from the Brazils, is announced on its way from Lisbon, but has only on board 5,583*l.* The specie taken out by the Ettrick on the 27th ult., was 59,490*l.*, of which 37,040*l.* was in gold for Bombay, and 22,450*l.* in silver. The market for silver remains very quiet. The small quantity by the last West India steamer has been sold at 61*d.* per oz. Mexican dollars are very quiet at previous quotations. The gold ships known to be on their way from the Australian colonies will bring gold to the value of 381,000*l.*

Liverpool, Wednesday, June 1.—Business in our cotton market during the week has been rather limited, and without any material alteration in values. American cotton has been more in demand, and the late slight reduction in quotations has been entirely recovered. The sales this week have amounted to only 38,000 bales, of which 12,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present period have been 1,081,900 bales, and to the same period in 1863 they were only 885,450 bales. There have been imported this year 931,752 bales against 567,314 bales in the corresponding period of last year. The exports during the present year have been 191,856 bales, and in 1863 they were 177,923 bales. The quantity taken for consumption this year has been 679,800 bales, and to the same period last year 466,000 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 293,310 bales, whilst in 1863 the quantity was 119,710 bales. The present computed stocks are 341,330 bales; last year they were 315,850 bales. The quotations this afternoon were, for American descriptions, 25½*d.* to 28½*d.*; Pernambuco, &c., 29*d.*; Egyptian, 28¼*d.* to 36*d.*; Surats, 12*d.* to 23½*d.*; and China, 19¼*d.*

The markets at Manchester continue very inanimate, and there seems but little disposition on the part of purchasers to transact business, in the present very unsettled and indecisive state of affairs in America. The question is causing immense excitement just now, and every succeeding mail is looked for with the greatest anxiety. Very little indeed continues to be done in shipping yarns, and to effect sales spinners would have to accept lower terms, which they are not at all disposed to do, as the majority of them are well supplied with contracts. For home-trade yarns the market is equally quiet, and prices are nominally unchanged. There is very little change to notice in the state of the cloth market; business remains exceedingly flat, but manufacturers are standing out for previous prices, and, in some instances, refusing to make any abatement, though it is quite certain that, in most cases where bargains have been effected, they have been on easier terms than would have been accepted last week. For India there does not appear to be any business offering. The markets close very flat for both cloths and yarns.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. Ashbridge, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by Henry Hotze, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. Brewer, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and Daniel Hubbard, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

BY AUTHORITY.

ACTS OF THE FOURTH SESSION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA, 1863–1864.

AN ACT TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE.

WHEREAS, the Confederate States are engaged in a war, upon the successful issue of which depend the integrity of their social system, the form of their civilisation, the security of life and property within their limits, as well as their existence as sovereign and independent States: And whereas, the condition of the contest demands that they should call into requisition whatever resources of men and money they have for the support of their cause, to faithfully administer the same: Therefore, as a part of the system of the public defence:—

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the exportation of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses, and rice, from the Confederate States, and from all places in the occupation of their troops, is prohibited, except under such uniform regulations as shall be made by the President of the Confederate States.

SEC. 2. That if any person, or persons, shall put, place, or load on board any ship, steamboat, or vessel, or any other water craft, or into any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for conveyance or transportation beyond the Confederate States, or into any portion of said States occupied by the enemy, any of the articles mentioned in the first section of this act, or shall collect the same for the purpose of being conveyed or transported, contrary to the prohibition aforesaid, within the Confederate States, or beyond them, the said articles, and the ship, boat, or other water craft, wagon, carriage, or other vehicle, with the slaves and animals that may be employed or collected for the purpose of aiding therein, shall be forfeited, and all persons, their aiders and abettors, on conviction of being interested or concerned in the enterprise, shall be deemed to be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and punishable by such fine or imprisonment, or both, as the court may impose.

SEC. 3. That it shall not be lawful to put on board any ship, boat, vessel, or other water craft, or upon any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for transportation or conveyance as aforesaid, any of the articles aforesaid, unless a permit be previously obtained from some officer of the Confederate States specially authorised to grant the same, particularly describing the articles thus to be laden, and the ship, boat, vessel, water craft, wagon, carriage, cart, or other vehicle, on which the same is to be transported, and until bond shall be given that the same shall be conveyed and transported to the place of destination under such conditions and regulations, and for such objects, as shall be prescribed by the President under the first section of this act.

SEC. 4. That the collectors of all the districts of the Confederate States, and such other officers as may be designated by the President of the Confederate States, shall have power and authority to take into their custody any of the articles before mentioned found on any ship, boat, or other water craft, when there is reason to believe that they are intended for exportation, or when in vessels, carts, or wagons, or any other carriage or vehicle whatsoever, or in any manner, apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or towards the territory of the Confederate States in the occupation of the United States, or the vicinity thereof, or towards a place whence such articles are intended to be exported, and not to permit the same to be removed until bond shall be given, with satisfactory sureties, that no violation of this act, and the regulations under the same, is intended.

SEC. 5. That the powers granted by this act to the revenue and other officers of the Confederate States under this act to allow or refuse exportation of the articles before mentioned, or for the seizure or detention of any of the said articles, shall be exercised in conformity with such instructions as the President may give through the Departments of War and of the Treasury, which instructions may impose conditions as to the destination and sale of the same, and the investment of the proceeds of the same, or a portion thereof, in military or other supplies for the public service, which instructions such officers shall be bound to obey; and if any action or suit shall be brought against any such officer or officers, or their agents, he or they may plead the general issue, and upon proof of a compliance with the provisions of this act, or with the regulations and instructions of the President, he or they shall be absolved from all responsibility therefor; and any person aggrieved by any of the acts of any of the officers or agents aforesaid, may file his petition before the district court of the district in which such officer or agent resides, and after due notice to him, and to the district attorney, the said court may proceed summarily to hear and determine thereupon as law and justice may require; and the judgment of the said court and the reasons therefor shall be filed among the records of the court, and in case any release shall be granted, the judge may impose such conditions as to giving bond and security as may, in his opinion, be necessary to secure this act from violation, and, in case of refusal, may impose double or treble costs upon the petitioner if circumstances warrant: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account.

SEC. 6. That exclusive jurisdiction is conferred upon the district courts of the Confederate States of all suits or actions that may arise under this act in behalf of the Confederate States, its officers and agents, for the recovery of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures imposed in the same, by indictment, information, or action, according to the practice of the court, and the distribution of the penalties and fines shall be made under and according to the laws now in force for violation of the revenue acts, and all laws for the mitigation and remittance of penalties and forfeitures shall be applied in similar cases.

SEC. 7. That it shall be lawful for the President, or such officers as he may designate, to employ any portion of the military or naval force of the Confederacy or of the militia, to prevent the illegal departure of any ship, vessel, or other water craft, for detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody the same, or any wagon, cart, or other vehicle heretofore mentioned, their teams and drivers, and their products aforesaid, and to suppress and disperse any assembly of persons who may resist the execution of this act, or oppose the fulfilment, by the officers, of the duties imposed by the same.

SEC. 8. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

APPROVED, February 6, 1864.

REGULATIONS TO CARRY INTO EFFECT THE ACT 'TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE,' APPROVED, FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

I. AS TO THE SEA.

1. The owners of any vessel intending to sail from a Confederate port with a cargo consisting in whole or part of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses or rice, shall, before the landing on board of any such articles, file with the collector of the port from which the vessel is to sail, a copy of her register, with a declaration of the names of the owners and officers thereof, the place of their birth and of their reside ce for the preceding year, together with the port or place to which the said vessel proposes to sail. The said declaration shall also set forth the quantity and value, in Confederate currency, of the cargo proposed to be taken out, as also the consent of the said owners, that one-half of the tonnage of the said vessel may be employed by the Confederate Government for its own use, both on the outward and homeward voyage, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned. The collector shall submit a statement as to the owners and officers to the military commandant of the port, and if he shall not object to their loyalty, or to the sailing of the vessel, for reasons of military necessity, the collector shall grant a permit for the lading of the said vessel, one-half for account of the owners and one-half for account of the Confederate States.

2. Before the said lading shall be completed, the owners of the vessel shall execute to the Confederate States a bond in double the value of the vessel, with security deemed adequate by the collector, conditioned that she will pursue the voyage designated, and that she will return with reasonable dispatch to a Confederate port, after her outward cargo shall be discharged with a cargo, consisting one half of articles not prohibited by the laws of the Confederate Government, and the other half of such articles as the Government shall offer for shipment from such port, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned.

3. Each shipper of any portion of the cargo proposed to be laden on board the said vessel, shall, before the lading thereof, make application to the collector for a permit to lade the same, which application shall declare the articles to be shipped, and the quantity and value thereof in Confederate currency, the port of destination, and the name of the consignee. A permit shall then be granted by the collector if the application is deemed satisfactory. The lading shall be had under the inspection of a revenue officer, who shall be charged with the duty of seeing that the goods laden conform to the permit.

4. Before the completion of the lading on board or the granting a clearance, each shipper of any portion of the cargo shall execute and deliver to the collector a bond to the Confederate States, in double the value of his shipment in Confederate money, with security deemed adequate by the collector, with condition that at least one half the net proceeds of said shipment shall be invested in goods or articles not prohibited by law, and said goods or articles shall be shipped by the same or some other vessel to the Confederate States within sixty days from the unlading of said cargo; or that the said half of the net proceeds shall be paid in coin or sterling exchange to the proper agent of the Confederate States, to be reimbursed to the shipper by the delivery to him of cotton at the port of departure in the Confederate States, at the rate of ten pence sterling per pound for middling uplands.

5. The freight to be paid by the Confederate States on all cotton and tobacco shipped from a Confederate port shall be five pence sterling per pound, payable on delivery at the port of destination, in coin or sterling exchange. Return freight shall be at the rate of 25*l.* per ton, payable on its delivery in a Confederate port, in cotton at ten pence sterling per pound for middling uplands, and at a proportionate price for cotton of other qualities. In calculating the ton of freight by weight, 2,240 pounds shall be allowed; by measure, forty cubic feet shall be allowed.

6. If the outward bound vessel shall consent, at the request of the Government, to take two-thirds of her cargo for account of the Confederate States, the outward freight shall be six pence sterling per pound, and whenever the Government is not prepared to fill up any portion of the tonnage reserved for its use at the time at which any vessel may be made ready to sail, her owners may fill up the same on their own account: but no vessel shall, without consent of the Government, sail on her outward voyage until one-third of her cargo shall be laden for the use of the Government.

7. The rates of freight for articles other than cotton and tobacco shall be adjusted at the same relative rate and payable in the same way.

8. The Government reserves the right to limit or prohibit the shipment of rosin, turpentine, or any manufacture thereof, whenever deemed dangerous to its own shipment.

9. Upon the completion of the lading of the vessel, and before receiving her clearance, there shall be delivered to the collector, in addition to the usual manifest, another setting forth the names, ages, and description of her officers and crew, and of every passenger intending to sail in her. The said last-mentioned manifest shall be delivered to the commandant of the port, who shall thereupon cause the entire vessel to be searched, and if satisfied that the parties on board are persons who may safely be permitted to leave the Confederacy, and that the passengers have the proper passports, he shall certify the same on the manifest and return the same to the collector, whereupon, and not before, a clearance shall be granted to the vessel, and he shall be permitted to sail.

10. The owners of each vessel, and of each portion of a cargo sailing from a Confederate port, shall be allowed to take up their respective bonds, by producing to the collector the certificate of the proper agent of the Confederate Government at the port of delivery, setting forth the particulars, showing that the said party has complied with the obligations of the said bond so far as the same was practicable, and the collector, upon being duly satisfied, shall be authorised to surrender the said bonds.

11. Nothing in these regulations shall be so construed as to conflict with the proviso of the law, which declares 'that nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account;' nor shall a bond be required of a State in any case.

12. The penalties of all bonds executed in conformity with these regulations, shall be recoverable in full on proof of breach of the conditions of the bond, and without proof of any damage suffered by the Confederate States in consequence of such breach, and all bonds shall be executed in such form as to give effect to this regulation.

13. Vessels sent into the Confederacy for the purpose of exporting cotton received in payment of any Confederate bond or obligation shall be subject to these regulations only so far as relates to such portion of the tonnage, if any, as may remain vacant after the lading of the cotton received in payment as aforesaid.

14. The regulations for overland commerce with neutral countries will be issued separately, within a few days.

Approved.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, C. S. A.
RICHMOND, March 16, 1864.

THE following additional regulations are established to carry out the act to impose regulations upon the foreign commerce of the Confederate States, and to provide for the public defence, approved February 6, 1864:

The bond required by the second article of the regulations shall be in one half the value of the vessel; and that required by the fourth article shall be in the single value of the shipment; and the security which the Collector may accept may be either personal security, or a mortgage of the vessel, or a transfer of the Bills of Lading, or of cotton, tobacco, or Confederate securities.

2. Whenever any vessel shall bring into the Confederate States an entire cargo for account of the Confederate States, the owners of the said vessel, and the shippers of her cargo, shall be relieved from the bonds previously given to invest and bring in one-half the net proceeds of her outward cargo, and the certificate of the agent of the Treasury Department at the port of lading, that such cargo was duly shipped in pursuance of the regulations, shall authorise the collector to cancel and surrender the said bonds.

Approved, March 16, 1864.

AN ACT TO PROHIBIT THE IMPORTATION OF LUXURIES, OR OF ARTICLES NOT NECESSARIES OR OF COMMON USE.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That from and after the first day of March next it shall not be lawful to import into the Confederate States any brandy, wines, or other spirits, or any other article specified in schedule A of an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue from commodities imported from foreign countries,' approved May 21, 1861, or any goods, wares, or merchandise, enumerated in schedule B of said act, except the following articles:—All things for medical purposes, camphor refined, pickles, molasses, pepper, pimento, cloves, nutmegs, cinnamon, and all other spices; soap, Castille, Windsor, and all other toilet soaps; sugar of all kinds; syrup of sugar; galloons, laces, knots, stars, tassels, tresses and wings of gold and silver, or imitations thereof, intended for uniforms of officers in the military and naval service.

SEC. 2. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles enumerated in schedule C of said act: Beer, ale, and porter; muffs and tippets, and all other manufactures of fur, or of which fur shall be a component part, except caps and hats; carpets, carpetings, hearth rugs, bedsides, and other portions of carpetage, of any kind or description; carriages and parts of carriages; cider and other beverages not containing alcohol; clocks and parts of clocks; cotton laces, cotton insertings, cotton trimmings, or laces of thread and other material; coral, manufactured; dolls and toys of all kinds; fire crackers, sky rockets, Roman candles and all other similar articles used in pyrotechnics; furniture, cabinet and household; glass, coloured, stained, or painted; India matting of all sorts; jet and manufactures of jet, and imitations thereof; jewellery, or imitations thereof; manufactures and articles of marble, marble paving tiles, slabs, or blocks, and all other marble; matting, China or other floor matting and mats made of flags, jute, or grass; paper hangings, paper for walls, and paper for screens or fire boards; paving and roofing tiles and bricks, and roofing slates and fire bricks; thread lacings and insertings; velvets of all kinds.

SEC. 3. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles, enumerated in schedule D of said act: Angola, Thibet, and other goats' hair, or mohair, unmanufactured; bananas, cocoa nuts, plantains, and oranges; cabinets of coins, medals, gems, and collections of antiquities; diamonds, mosaics, gems, pearls, rubies, and other precious stones and imitations thereof, set in gold or silver or other metals; engravings, bound or unbound; rattans and reeds; paintings and stationery; leaf and unmanufactured tobacco and cigars; or the following articles enumerated in schedule E. Diamonds, cameos, mosaics, pearls, gems, rubies, and other precious stones and imitations thereof, when not set.

SEC. 4. None of the manufactures of metal, designed as either household or personal ornaments, shall be admitted; and in order to confine importations to the rules of necessity and of common use, the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the maximum foreign prices at which and within which importations of goods manufactured wholly or partly of cotton, flax, wool, or of silk, and designed for wearing apparel, and not herein prohibited, may be made, and beyond which importations thereof shall not be made: Provided, That articles herein allowed to be imported shall not be impressed by the Government or its agents after they have reached the Confederate States: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any importation for the use or account of the Confederate States, or either of them: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to any articles which have been or shall be shipped, without knowledge of the passage of this act, before the first day of March next, but which shall arrive in a Confederate port after that day.

SEC. 5. That whenever any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, after the first day of March next, be imported into the Confederate States, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or shall, after said first day of March next, be put on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, with the intention of importing the same into the Confederate States, all such articles, as well as all other articles on board the same ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, belonging to the owner of such prohibited articles, shall be forfeited, and the owner thereof shall, moreover, forfeit and pay double the value of such articles.

SEC. 6. If any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, nevertheless, be on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, arriving after said first day of March next in the Confederate States, and shall be omitted in the manifest, report, or entry of the master, or the person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, or shall be omitted in the entry of the goods owned by the owner, or consigned to the consignee of such articles, or shall be imported or landed, or attempted to be imported or landed, without a permit, the same penalties, fines, and forfeitures shall be incurred, and may be recovered, as in the case of similar omission or omissions, landing, importation, or attempt to land or import, in relation to articles liable to duties on their importation into the Confederate States.

SEC. 7. Every collector, naval officer, surveyor, or other officer of the customs, shall have the like power and authority to seize goods, wares, and merchandise imported contrary to the intent and meaning of this act, to keep the same in custody until it shall have been ascertained whether the same have been forfeited or not, and to enter any ship or vessel, dwelling-house, store, building, or other place, for the purpose of searching for and seizing any such goods, wares, and merchandise subject to duty; and if any person or persons shall conceal or buy any goods, wares, or merchandise, knowing them to be liable to seizure by this act, such person or persons shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a sum double the amount or value of the goods, wares, and merchandise so concealed or purchased.

SEC. 8. The following additional oath or affirmation shall be taken by masters or persons having charge or command of any ship or vessel arriving at any port of the Confederate States after said first day of March next, viz.: 'I further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board [insert the denomination and name of the vessel] any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, or merchandise on board of the said vessel, or which shall have been imported in the same, I will immediately, and without delay, make due report thereof to the collector of the port of this district.'

SEC. 9. After said first day of March next, importers, consignors, or agents, at the time of entering goods into the Confederate States, shall take the following additional oath, viz.: 'I also swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, amongst the said goods, wares, or merchandise, imported or consigned as aforesaid, any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover any such goods, wares, or merchandise among the said goods, wares, and merchandise so imported or consigned as aforesaid, I will immediately and without delay report the same to the collector of this district.'

SEC. 10. All penalties and forfeitures arising under this act may be sued for and recovered, and shall be distributed and accounted for, in the manner prescribed by the act entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage;' and such penalties and forfeitures, mitigated or remitted, in like manner and under the like conditions, regulations, and restrictions as are prescribed, authorised, and directed by the act entitled 'An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned.'

SEC. 11. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

Approved, February 6, 1864.

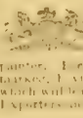
HUBBUCK'S PATENT WHITE ZINC PAINT.



THE most durable and beautiful paint known, is cheaper than White Lead, and is proved to be superior for all purposes to the pernicious Lead Paint, and equally adapted for all climates. It whitens as unaffected by bilge water, boiling sugar, or noxious gases. It is free from any poisonous ingredient and acted in all respects to the use of the painter. Each Cask of Pure White Zinc is Stamped 'HUBBUCK'S, LONDON PATENT.' Interior Zinc Paint, so largely used in Foreign Markets, the Patentees call particular Attention to their Purple Brown Paint, which will be found to be extensively used in French or Colonial Ports, of those who have imitated their Mark. Both Exporters and Retailers are liable to Penalties.

AMERICA.

UP to May 28 even Mr. Stanton's reports of the situation in Virginia did not inspire the sanguine New Yorkers with confidence of an approaching Federal triumph, for gold has been going up and greenbacks have been going down. On the 18th Grant made an unsuccessful attack on the Confederate lines at Spottsylvania, at a cost of eighteen hundred killed and wounded. On the evening of the 19th General Ewell was in Grant's rear, and, before he could be driven off, killed and wounded 700 Federals, and, says Mr. Stanton, took 300 prisoners. We must wait patiently for Southern accounts before we can learn what was the actual loss Ewell inflicted on the enemy, and what damage he did to the Federal supply trains. At all events, the repulse on the 18th, and the rear attack on the 19th, seem to have convinced Grant that he could not get to Richmond viâ Spottsylvania, and so on the 20th he made a change, which was described as a flanking movement. Strange to say, the 'outflanked' army was reported, five days later, to be confronting the invader behind some strong fortifications, south of the North Anna River. Supposing Mr. Stanton's narrative to be correct, Grant was, on the 26th, a few miles nearer Richmond, but he was no nearer to defeating Lee's army. Wall Street did not appreciate the great 'flanking movement,' and gold rose from 82 to 85 per cent. premium. On the 27th, Mr. Stanton greatly alarmed the speculators who had been discounting a victory. He notified that important operations had taken place on the 26th, that the movement was progressing, and that it would be developed in twenty-four hours; but in the meantime the news could not be made public. Gold advanced to 86¼ premium. The 28th dawned, and still there was no news from Grant. Rumour, the inevitable substitute for news, reported, amongst other things, that Grant was going to try quite another road to Richmond, and had gone to the Peninsula. At the close of the day gold was quoted at 88 per cent. premium.

About Butler there is rather more definite information. Whenever he has come out of his entrenchments he has learned how much more difficult it is to make war on men than on women and children, and that it is easier to steal spoons and trinkets than to make any impression on Confederate works. On the 16th, 'under cover of a fog,' Butler was surprised, and had a general and regiment captured, and lost in killed and wounded some 2,500. Mr. Stanton says he is safe; but the people of the North are rather uneasy, and lend a ready ear to reports of a disaster to Butler, and think it ominous that the Confederates are firing on his supply boats.

Another item from Virginia is the destruction of the bridges and blockhouses from Union Mills to the Rapidan, by General Mosby, which, so says the telegram, he was enabled to do by the withdrawal of the Federal outposts around Washington. It is also announced that the Federals have abandoned their depôt at Fredericksburg and Acquia Creek.

Altogether, we are not surprised that gold has gone up. The New York money market is not, or certainly has not always been, a reliable gauge of the progress of the war. Mr. Chase being prodigal of his means, and not caring a cent. for the day of reckoning, has often managed to keep gold down, when in a fair market it would have advanced, but we may be quite sure that when in spite of Mr. Chase's dodges gold goes up and greenbacks go down, the public opinion is that Mr. Stanton's dignified assurances of 'Union victories' and of a reinforcement for Grant of '25,000 veterans,' are not reliable, and are utterly worthless even for stock-jobbing purposes.

WE have Confederate accounts and Confederate newspapers to the date of the opening of the present campaign in Virginia. Grant did not surprise his enemy. He kept his plans concealed from the Northern press, but they were as well known in Richmond as they were to Mr. Lincoln. The only discrepancy is that the Confederates appear to exaggerate the force that Grant could bring against them; but they have a persistent habit of overrating the strength of their opponents, and of always preparing for an arduous encounter instead of revelling in anticipated victories. The Confederates were confident, but not in the Yankee fashion. Instead of the invading army being decried, it is, so far as its numbers and equipments are concerned, lavishly extolled, and the Government is implored—angrily implored—to do its duty and to make ready for a conflict with the mighty army of the enemy. To the middle of the month we know from Lee's despatches and orders that the Confederates had been successful, and we presume that ten days later they had equal cause for hope and thankfulness. If Lee's army was not at first sufficient to cope with Grant's army—an assumption not warranted by the results of the six days' battles—the Northern commander, whilst waiting eight days for reinforcements, gave the Confederates ample time to reinforce their army, if they deemed such an increase of strength necessary. It is said that Hoke's brigade has joined Lee, and Hoke's brigade is but a small part of the troops that in eight days could be brought up to reinforce the army confronting Grant. The final result of the present struggle in Virginia we shall not presume to indicate; but we are justified in saying that until the present moment all the news that has reached Europe must satisfy the most ardent and sanguine Confederate.

THE Richmond papers describe the defeat of Sigel as very complete. The Sentinel says: 'General Breckenridge's victory at Newmarket was even greater and more complete than at first announced. He captured six pieces of artillery and nearly 1,000 stand of small arms. The loss of the enemy in killed, wounded, and prisoners, is heavy. General Sigel ran thirty miles without stopping, abandoning his hospitals and destroying a portion of his train.'

GENERAL SHERMAN has been 'pursuing' General Johnston, and the Federal authorities announced that a great battle was to be fought at Atlanta, but the affair did not come off. According to Southern accounts, which we elsewhere publish, the Federals were worsted in the skirmishing that preceded the 'pursuit.' The last we hear is that Sherman is 'outflanking' Johnston, but that the Confederate commander will not fight, and will send his troops to Virginia. Why does not Sherman compel a 'fleeing and outflanked' enemy to capitulate or fight?

GENERAL BANKS has returned to New Orleans, and it is hoped that the remnant of the army he led forth on a grand cotton expedition will likewise effect its escape. Admiral Porter is enabled to inform the Navy Department, under date Mouth of Red River, May 16, that he has floated, or hopes to float, his remaining gunboats over the falls.

IT is stated that the Federals are evacuating Texas; and, if so, they will not give up much territory, for Texas has proved a very tough morsel, and the Federals have never been able to hold much ground in that State.

THE World and the Journal of Commerce, influential and respectable newspapers published in New York—both advocates of the war, and both opposed to the re-election of Mr. Lincoln—were, on May 18, suppressed by military force, and without warning, by the Federal Government. The following is an outline of an affair which for a time diverted public attention from the campaign in Virginia.

Between three and four o'clock in the morning of May 18, when the editors had left their offices, and the daily newspapers were making ready for press, a document purporting to be a proclamation by Mr. Lincoln, calling out 400,000 additional troops, was delivered at all the newspaper offices except that of the Tribune. The World and the Journal of Commerce published it—it is understood that the Herald had printed it in part of its edition—and as soon as it was ascertained to be a forgery, the proprietors of these journals made every effort to prevent any ill effects, and to discover the author of the hoax. They published an 'extra,' issued bulletins, offered a reward for finding the offender, and sent telegrams throughout the Union, so that in many cases the contradiction was the first that was known about the bogus proclamation. They also waited upon General Dix, who appeared satisfied with what had been done. In the evening, under orders from Washington, parties of soldiers occupied the offices of the two papers, and forthwith stopped the business. Orders had also been given for the arrest of the editors, but they were revoked. The World gives anything but a flattering account of the conduct of the soldiery. When the night-clerk, unaware of what had taken place, came to the office, a pistol was held to his head by one of the soldiers. The same rough treatment was applied to the carriers who came in the morning for their parcels of papers. 'As the first one'—we are quoting from the World—'walked sleepily along, he did not notice anything strange till actually at the door of the office. Coming suddenly upon a soldier he asked, "What is the matter?" "That's what's the matter," replied one, drawing his revolver; "what do you want?" "I want my ticket," replied the carrier. "I'll give you a ticket out of this," said the soldier, aiming his revolver at the carrier's head. The other carriers and news-agents were similarly turned away, and nobody was allowed to enter the building.' The soldiers also made free with the editorial property. In the editorial rooms of the World, 'two overcoats, with the varied contents of their pockets, were missing, together with some small articles of office furniture.'

The editors of the suppressed journals immediately published a protest against these proceedings, explaining the circumstances under which the forged document appeared in their columns, and detailing the efforts they had made to trace its author. In conclusion they observed: 'We protest against the suppression of our journals for the misfortune of being deceived by a forgery not less ingenious nor plausible than the forged report of the Confederate Secretary of War, which Secretary Seward made the basis of diplomatic action.' Certainly the activity of the Federal Government in this case is in marked contrast to their conduct respecting the Mallory Report forgery and the 'gentleman of New York' who confessed to its perpetration. After three days the guards were withdrawn from the offices, and the World and the Journal of Commerce were at liberty to resume publication. We ought also to remark that the operatives, of the Independent Telegraph Line were arrested and subsequently released; but the Government still controls the working of the wires.

Mr. Joseph Howard, who confesses to the forgery, and has been sent to Fort Lafayette, is the son of a deacon of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's church, and himself a conspicuous member thereof, and was at one time private secretary to Mr. Beecher. We cannot better describe this person than by quoting the following from a letter addressed by the editor of the World to Mr. Lincoln:—

> Joseph Howard, Junior, who has confessed his crime, was a Republican politician and Loyal Leaguer, of Brooklyn. Consider, sir, at whose feet he was taught his political education, and in whose cause he spent his political breath. Mr. Howard has been from his very childhood an intimate friend of the Republican clergyman, Henry Ward Beecher, and a member of his church. He has listened year in and year out to the droppings of the Plymouth sanctuary. The stump speeches which there follow prayer and precede the benediction he for years reported in the journal which is your devoted organ in this city. For years he was the city editor of that journal, the New York Times; for a long time he was the Washington correspondent of the chief Abolition newspaper of the country, the New York Tribune; he has been a frequent contributor to the columns of the Independent; he journeyed with you from Springfield to Washington; he represents himself a favoured visitor at the White House since your residence there. By a curious felicity the stylus with which his amanuensis copied on tissue paper the proclamation and signed your name was abstracted from the editorial rooms of the Tribune. The party principles upon which you were pledged to administer the government have been the daily meat and drink of this forger. He has denounced as faithfully as you the party by whose defeat you rose to power. He has been the noisy champion of an exclusive loyalty; he has preached in club-houses and at street corners those politics which stigmatise constitutional opposition to the Administration as disloyalty to the Government.

For a while the boldness of Mr. Lincoln's act seems to have subdued all opposition. The Governor of the State did nothing, and the protests of the newspapers, with one exception, were rather feeble. The Daily News declared that 'denunciation, bold, emphatic, and to the point, is the treatment that that sort of despotism deserves,' and next day proclaimed it the duty of the people, if expostulation was disregarded, to use 'what other means the God of Freedom has left men to vindicate their liberties,' and also called upon Governor Seymour to 'summon the military power of the State to meet unjustifiable force by legislative force.' Nor does it appear that these appeals were altogether in vain. Moved by them and by the popular excitement, Governor Seymour has taken action and ordered the indictment of every person concerned in the illegal proceedings. Our New York correspondent notices this affair and its political effects.

IT must not be supposed that the suppression of the World and the Journal of Commerce was an exceptional act, and that otherwise the press of the United States is free from the attacks of military despotism. For example, the Baltimore Transcript has just been suspended by the Government for stating that 70,000 men had been rendered incapable of military service by the campaign in Virginia. Ex-Governor Medary, the editor of the Crisis, published in Columbus, Ohio, has been arrested, but the authorities decline to say on what charge.

THE Federal House of Representatives has, as might have been expected, sided with Mr. Lincoln rather than with the cause of freedom. On May 23, Mr. Pruyn, of New York, asked, but did not obtain, leave to introduce a resolution denouncing the act of the Government in relation to such suppression, as unwarranted in itself, dangerous to the cause of the Union, in violation of the Constitution, subversive of the principles of civil liberty, and as such deserving of censure by the House. Subsequently, even permission to print his remarks in connection with the subject was refused; and the Committee on Judiciary was instructed to enquire what legislation is necessary to punish the forgery and publication of official documents, and also what action is necessary to punish those who, through the press or otherwise, give information, aid, and comfort to the rebels. These Congressional proceedings are very significant.

IT appears that the forged proclamation merely anticipated the intention of the Government, for on May 18 Mr. Stanton wrote to General Dix, that 'in order to provide against any inopportune reduction, when the service of the hundred-days men goes out, a draft to fill up their place and all other reductions will be ordered to take place on July 1.'

DON JOSE ARGUELLES, a Spaniard, and sometime Lieutenant-Governor of a district in Cuba, has added to the complications between New York and the Federal Government. It appears that Arguelles, in his official capacity, had something to do with seizing an expedition of African negroes, and received a large sum of money for so doing from his Government. Not content with his reward, he sold 141 of the negroes into slavery, pocketed the money, and went to New York. Such, at least, is the charge preferred against him. What could the Spanish authorities do to bring the offender to justice? There is no extradition treaty between the United States and Spain under which Arguelles could be claimed; and it is a fixed principle of international law, and, we may add, a vaunted principle of the United States, that the right of asylum is sacred and conclusive against any demand, unless there is an express treaty stipulation. Being in this fix, the Spanish authorities applied to Mr. Seward, and Mr. Seward, who does not care for law, informed the Spanish Minister that if an officer were sent to New York proper steps should be taken to deliver up Arguelles, and he was handcuffed and shipped off. After being arrested by Mr. Seward's order, such a stir was made that Mr. Seward consented for the present not to deliver him up to the Spanish authorities. Meantime the Grand Jury of New York has indicted the officer who arrested Arguelles for kidnapping. Our New York correspondent gives an account of this affair.

GENERAL WASHBURNE, commanding the Federal forces at Memphis, issued an order on May 14, in which he complains of trade being carried on with the 'rebels.' He says: 'The abuses existing on the Mississippi River render the interference of the military power imperative. Boats are cleared almost daily from Memphis with clearances for any landing-place they may choose, and that without any further restriction than a clause in their clearance that they will not violate the law of the United States. Boats thus cleared, loaded heavily with a variety of merchandise, proceed down the river, sometimes landing on the shore, sometimes rounding to and anchoring out, and communicating with the shore with small boats. They open trade with all classes of people except loyal ones. Some boats, I am assured, have been out forty or fifty days from their clearances from Memphis, replenishing their supplies from time to time from other boats proceeding up or down the river, running into every creek, bayou, and lagoon where Confederate trade can be carried on.' If this statement is true, we can readily explain why trade is carried on 'with all classes of people except loyal ones.' There are no 'loyal' people to trade with. He directs that henceforth 'no boat shall land between Cairo and the mouth of White River, except where there is a garrison of United States troops.' This is a striking comment on the Yankee assurance that the Mississippi is open to trade.

A CASE which occupied the United States Criminal Court for five days, enlightened the public as to the way in which the public Treasury is plundered. A person named Kohnstamm was charged with and found guilty of presenting false claims to a disbursing officer for the enlistment of recruits. In the course of the trial, the following instances of fraud were made out:—

	Amount due from the Government.	Amount obtained from the Government.
Schober's ,,	203	1,666
Hertzel's ,,	300	1,516

In the course of the summing up, Judge Nelson said to the jury: 'You have seen—we all have seen in this case frauds that were appalling. Indeed, if we were to judge from the evidence in this case, we should come to the conclusion—we must come to it—that this disbursing office of the Government was kept here, not for the purpose of receiving and paying honest and genuine claims, but for the purpose of paying false and fraudulent ones.'

MR. SEWARD, in answer to a requisition, has notified the Federal House of Representatives that he has informed the French Government that the Monroe doctrine resolution truly represented the sentiments of the American people, but that at present the President did not contemplate any change from the policy hitherto pursued. Meantime the Lincoln Government is indefatigable, through its organs in the press and other agencies, in preparing the public mind for a war with Mexico at the first opportunity. Frequent collisions at Matamoras between the French inhabitants and the Mexicans, and a Frenchman being hanged by Cortinas, are some of the fruits of the present policy of the Lincoln Government.

ENGLAND.

THE HON. W. STUART, Secretary to the English Legation at Washington, has been appointed Secretary of Embassy at Constantinople; and Mr. Adams, Second Secretary to the Embassy at Paris, is appointed Secretary of Legation at Washington, in the room of Mr. Stuart.

THE iron screw steam-brig Harriet Pinckney arrived at Plymouth on Monday from Bermuda. She brought 70,000*l.* in specie, and a large cargo of cotton and tobacco.

THE University of Cambridge has covered itself with glory. It was impossible for human energy and loyal liberality to welcome with a more splendid reception the illustrious guests who last week honoured the ancient corporations of Cambridge by their presence. The occasion or the pretext for the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales was, that His Royal Highness should take his degree of Doctor of Laws, to which he seemed entitled not merely by rank, but also by residence as a student of Trinity College. On Thursday last, then, the Prince and Princess of Wales arrived at Cambridge from London, accompanied by the Duke of Cambridge, Earl Spencer, Lord Alfred Hervey, Lord Harris, the Countess of Morton, and General Knollys. At the station they were received by the Earl of Hardwicke, the Lord-Lieutenant of the county. The University Volunteer Corps formed the guard of honour, and the Duke of Manchester's Volunteer Horse, a superb regiment, superbly mounted, escorted the royal party to the lodge in Trinity College. At the College all the members of that noble society had assembled, and the royal carriage passed under the great gateway of Henry VIII., through which none but crowned heads had ever before passed in state. Immediately afterwards the Princess distributed the prizes won in the shooting competition, to the successful members of the University Corps. At three o'clock the royal party went to the Senate House, already crowded to excess with ladies and members of the Senate on the floor, and the uproarious undergraduate in the galleries. These last had already cheered and groaned, according to their taste, at the mention of every man of mark in the political or religious world. They had applauded the Queen with terrific vehemence, cheered for Lord Palmerston, the King of Denmark, 'the South,' the Prince of Wales, the Princess and the baby, and had lustily groaned at the name of Earl Russell and 'Gladstone and Democracy.' The ovation awaited to their Royal Highnesses on their arrival was most enthusiastic. The Prince of Wales, after an introductory speech in the most elegant Latin and most complimentary terms from the Public Orator, took his degree of Doctor of Laws. In the evening the Vice-Chancellor entertained the royal party in the Hall of St. Peter's College. After dinner the Amateur Dramatic Society performed at their hijau theatre the most ludicrous of farces and the most extravagant of burlesques—not the least wonderful feature in the performance being the success with which the female characters were sustained by male actors. From the theatre their Royal Highnesses went to the Fitzwilliam Museum to a ball. Here upwards of 1,200 ladies and gentlemen were present, and the dancing in the magnificent rooms at the Museum was kept up till far into the morning—the Princess herself staying till two o'clock. On Friday the first part of the programme was a service in the splendid Chapel of King's College; next a congregation in the Senate House, where were more political cries and a still more enthusiastic reception of their Royal Highnesses. At this congregation, also, honorary degrees were conferred on Earl Granville, Earl Carnarvon, Lord Eversley, Lord Palmerston, Lord Leigh, Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Sir W. Page Wood, Sir Charles Eastlake, the Dean of Westminster, Mr. Beresford Hope, Dr. Watson, Professor Hollman, and Professor Wheatstone. After the congregation the royal party proceeded to King's College, where a splendid déjeuner was served in the hall for 250 persons. Then there was a boat procession, then a flower show, next a dinner in Trinity Lodge, then another performance at the Amateur Dramatic Club, and lastly a ball of the utmost magnificence at Trinity College. Their Royal Highnesses left on Saturday after having visited Madingley Hall, where the Prince resided during his studentship. In addition to the visitors already mentioned, we may give the names of the following noblemen and gentlemen who visited the University during the festivities:—The Duke of Devonshire, Chancellor of the University; the Duke of Manchester, the Marquis of Carmarthen, the Marquis Camden, Earl Powis, Lord Hartington, the Bishops of Lichfield and Ely, Lord Rollo, Mr. Walpole, M.P., Mr. Selwyn, M.P., Mr. Macaulay, M.P., Mr. G. Eustis, C.S.A., Colonel Macdonald, and the Provost of Eton.

THE noble school of Eton kept high holiday on Saturda last according to custom. After four years of bad luck i point of weather, the festival once more, under a brigh sun and genial atmosphere, seemed to win the smiles o fortune. At noon the recitations of select passages fro authors ancient and modern were delivered in the Upp School before a numerous assembly. At three o'cloc the Rifle Volunteer Corps of the school paraded in th beautiful playing fields before the delighted eyes of som hundreds of ladies. An hour later the College entertaine a distinguished party in the Grand Hall, while unbounde hospitality was displayed in the private houses of the Master Later in the day the whole company proceeded to th banks of the Thames, and either embarked on board boa or lined the meadows bordering the stream. At seve o'clock the fleet passed in grand procession—the Monarch ten-oar boat, the Victory, Prince of Wales, Britannia Dreadnought, Thetis, St. George, and Defiance, all eight oar boats, together with the eight-oar boat of the College admirably manned, forming an attractive spectacle. Th crews wore the smartest uniforms, while the coxswains according to their grade, affected the attire of admirals captains, lieutenants, and midshipmen. Arrived at Ol Surley Hall, three miles up the river, the crews enjoye their customary al fresco supper, and then rowed bac to Windsor Bridge. An excellent display of firework induced the visitors to linger till ten o'clock at night and made them forget their journey of twenty miles t London. Indeed, a more beautiful sight cannot easily b imagined. Dense masses of people lined the banks of th river on foot and in carriages. The rafts of the boat houses, Windsor bridge, and the neighbouring housetop were crowded. Hundreds of boats lay moored in th stream. The fleet, while the fireworks lit up the dark ness, passed again and again in procession, the crew hoisting their oars and cheering, while the bells of Wind sor Castle rang out boldly, and the band of the Scot Fusilier Guards performed with more than its ordinar skill. Among the more distinguished visitors were th Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, th Duke of Beaufort, the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke o Marlborough, the Marquis of Bristol, Lord Burleigh, Si S. Northcote, Mr. Vansittart, Mr. Borrett, the Duchess o Beaufort, the Duchess of Marlborough, Lady Northcote Mrs. Tait, Mrs. Montagu Butler, Miss Scappa, and Mrs Cracrofts-Amcotts.

THE thoroughbred yearlings reared at Her Majesty's pad docks at Hampton Court, were sold by auction on Satur day last. The animals offered for competition were of the stock of the three brothers, Stockwell, Rataplan, and King Tom, the wonderful trio destined to perpetuate the memory of the Irish Birdcatcher and Pocahontas, and also of the stock of St. Albans and of Orlando. St. Albans is himself the son of Stockwell, and was the winner of the Chester Cup and the St. Leger. Orlando, the son of Touchstone, won the Derby in 1844. There were in all twenty-four yearlings, and they were sold for the sum of 6,525*l.* The highest price was obtained for a filly by Stockwell, out of Bravery, who was knocked down for 1,250*l.* A colt by Orlando, out of Distaffina, was sold for 830*l.* It may be remarked that Bravery is a daughter of Queen Mary, the dam of Blink Bonny, and grandam of Blair Athol.

THE romantic and notorious case of Yelverton and Longworth (or Yelverton) came on for hearing before the House of Lords on Friday last on appeal from the Court of Sessions of Scotland. The learned Lords present were the Lord Chancellor, Lords Brougham, Wensleydale, Chelmsford, and Kingsdown. Mr. Rolt, Q.C., with whom were Sir Hugh Cairns and Mr. Anderson, appeared for the appellant; and the Attorney-General, the Lord Advocate, the Queen's Advocate, Mr. Whiteside, and Mr. Pope Hennessy for the respondent. In 1852 Miss Maria Theresa Longworth, while making the passage from Boulogne to London, made the acquaintance of the Hon. Major William Charles Yelverton, the youngest son of Viscount Avonmore. Both parties were then about twenty-seven years of age. On their arrival in London that day, Major Yelverton, by invitation, passed some hours at the lodgings of Miss Longworth. Shortly afterwards Major Yelverton went to Malta. Ten months elapsed, and then, in the spring of 1853, Miss Longworth wrote the appellant a letter requesting him to forward a communication to her brother. Upon this a correspondence ensued between the parties, which lasted until the autumn of 1855. At that date Major Yelverton was in the Crimea, and in the same year Miss Longworth went to Galata, and became an inmate of the French hospital as a sister of mercy. The appellant there called on her. Soon afterwards Miss Longworth visited Lady Straubenzee, and again met the appellant. In 1857 the parties met at Edinburgh, and at that time it is alleged that a ceremony sufficient, according to the law of Scotland, to constitute marriage took place. They again parted, but met subsequently at Waterford, and at a place called Rostrevor they were married according to the forms of the Roman Catholic Church—the religion of the lady. After this the parties lived together as man and wife until, in 1858, the appellant married a Mrs. Forbes. It was decided in the Irish courts that the Irish marriage was valid. It was further decided in the Court of Sessions in Scotland that the Scotch marriage was valid. The present appeal was brought to reverse the latter decision. The argument is not yet concluded.

A TERRIFIC accident occurred on the South-Western Railway on Tuesday evening. An enormous crowd of people, at the close of the day's racing on Ascot Heath, had filled the succession of trains which were despatched with all possible speed on the return journey to London. The trains were of course long, and therefore unmanageable. At Egham a train arrived at a quarter to eight o'clock in the evening, and the officials proceeded to collect the tickets. The delay was somewhat greater than usual. The train following next in succession, from some unexplained reason, ran into that which was stationary, and crushed the guard's break and two second-class carriages. Five passengers were killed and about twenty-two injured. The second train was entirely uninjured.

A BILL for enabling companies to issue mortgage debentures is now before Parliament. The measure is to be available to all companies established under 'The Companies Act, 1862,' with 10,000*l.* paid up, the shares being not less than 50*l.* each, with not less than 10 per cent. or more than 50 per cent. paid upon them, where the object of the company is to make advances on real estate or upon statutable charges secured by real estate. The claim of each debenture is to be without priority of date. The principal is to be payable at a fixed date, not exceeding ten years. The debentures issued are to be registered in the office of land registry. Quarterly returns are to be furnished to the Registrar, who is in turn to grant a quarterly certificate. No company is to issue mortgage debentures to an extent exceeding the amount of its securities, or more than ten times the amount of its uncalled share capital.

THE REV. WILLIAM ADOLPHUS CARTER, M.A., Lower Master of Eton College, has been appointed a Fellow of that society, in the room of the late Rev. J. F. Plumptre, M.A. The Rev. Francis E. Durnford has been appointed Lower Master. Mr. Carter was formerly a Fellow of King's College, and had held the position of Lower Master for seven years. He had previously been an Assistant Master at Eton for eighteen years.

SIR JOHN WATSON GORDON, President of the Royal Scottish Academy and Member of the Royal Academy, died last week. He succeeded Sir W. Allan as President in 1850. In that year he was appointed Limner to Her Majesty for Scotland, and was knighted.

THE RIGHT HON. ROBERT LOWE, M.P., has been elected a Trustee of the British Museum, in the room of the late Sir G. Cornewall Lewis.

NEW ZEALAND.

The news from the seat of war in New Zealand is not favourable to our arms. It appears that, according to the latest advices, two engagements had occurred at Maungatawhiri and Tarachi. At the former place the natives were defeated, but at the latter the English troops suffered a reverse. Our loss amounted to 80 killed and wounded. At an earlier date, March 31, Brigadier-General Carey attacked the native position at Arahan, seven miles from le Aramuse. For two days the enemy held out, and then retreated. Their loss was 101 killed and 33 prisoners; our loss was 58 killed and wounded. Colonel Warre had driven the natives from a strong position at Kai Lake, near New Plymouth, without loss. A native force was entrenched at Mangatantan, on the Upper Waikatoo, and General Cameron was about to make an attack.

CHINA.

From Shanghai it is reported that Major Gordon has defeated the rebels at Waisoo, and expected that Nankin and Soochusuf would surrender shortly.

AFRICA.

We learn that Dr. Livingstone arrived safely at Mozambique in February last in his steamer the Lady Nyassa, which was towed from the Congoni River by Her Majesty's ship Ariel. The Pioneer, with Bishop Tozer on board, was towed from the same river by the Orestes. Dr. Livingstone was to sail for Johanna about March 16. He intended to go on to Zanzibar and Bombay. He had not reached Zanzibar on April 21.

EGYPT.

The Vicomte E. de Rougé has addressed a letter to M. le Duc de Morny, in which he gives, compressed into a few columns, the summary of his six months' labours in Egyptian archæology. Were we to attempt to analyse a summary already so condensed, we should fail to give our readers an idea of the talent that has been exerted, the enormous field that has been subjected to search, or the grandeur of the results which have been obtained. The commission consisted of M. E. de Rougé and his son; of M. Wescher, with a spécialité for Greek inscriptions; of M. de Bauville, the photographer; finally, of the well-known M. Mariette, as archæologist and savant. In the course of their six months' work they traversed Africa from Tunis to the Little Cataract of the Nile, visiting, exhuming, deciphering, conjecturing, we might almost say creating a new history, on their way. They have verified historical facts belonging to the age of the fourth dynasty of Egypt, 600 years or so before the time of Abraham; they have thrown new light on the history of the shepherd kings, who constitute the point of contact between sacred and secular literature at that period. Going on through the succession of dynasties, the commission reached the Greek age, and studied the influence of European art on the African mysteries; and even from the times when Egypt was thoroughly Romanised they have gathered fresh matter for observation, and have traced the existence of the primitive religion under the spurious mysticism of the Roman-Egyptian religion. Some of their observations will, it is hoped, clear up to a considerable extent the difficulties which beset our knowledge of the aboriginal races of the Mediterranean shore, to whom tradition teaches us to ascribe the origin of the Greek and Latin peoples. Altogether, we may shortly expect a work to be produced unequalled as yet in that line of archæology—a work which will lead us through the 'dewy dawn' of history among the strange and awful figures of those early Egyptian kings who must have been contemporaries of Shem, Ham, and Japhet.

TUNIS.

The accounts of the Tunisian insurrection are still most unfavourable to the cause of order and peace. The Bey has as yet declined to dismiss his ministry en masse, the only step by which he can hope to recover the confidence of his subjects. The insurgents have advanced to the gates of Tunis, increasing in their demands as they obtain more ground. The anti-bey, if we may so call him, who has been elected by the rebellious Arabs, has tried and put to death the head of the tribe Medjeer, with sixty of his relatives, on a charge of conspiracy. The Governor of Kerouan has also been murdered. The European residents in Tunis are extremely anxious to embark on board the fleet lying off Tunis for their protection, which now amounts to eighteen vessels.

ALGIERS.

THE details of the rebellion in Algiers are neither more intelligible nor more interesting to us than are the petty wars which we continue to wage with Hindoo potentates to French readers. The successes of the French generals Yusuf and Deligny have been constant and brilliant. The rebels have been always vastly superior in numbers, yet the advantages gained over them have been solid. The plan pursued by the French commanders appears to be to drive the inhabitants of the insurgent towns, as well as the nomad tribes in rebellion, into the rocky and barren valleys which lie between the northern buttresses of the Atlas range. Once there, the mere want of water will be enough to bring them to reason. If women and children perish by hundreds in this style of warfare, tant pis pour eux; they should have stayed at home and implored the clemency of the French soldier, which they say is never wanting.

MOROCCO.

IT is stated that, in consequence of the energetic attitude taken up by M. de Tallenay, the French chargé d'affaires in Morocco, with regard to the assassination of a French subject at Tetuan, the four principals in the affair have been arrested. Achach, the governor of Tetuan, has been dismissed for concealing the fugitives, and been summoned by an armed force to appear before the Sultan at Morocco. The French Minister has also rescued from the Moorish authorities a French subject, a native of Algiers, who has been detained in Morocco for upwards of six months. The old formula, Civis Romanus sum, is thus reappearing in France, now that in letter and spirit it has been declared no longer applicable to British subjects. We should be curious now to see the results of the impressment of a Frenchman into the Federal army, if the Yankee recruiters ever find one wandering so far from home.

THE CONTINENT.

ANOTHER meeting of the London Conference took place on Monday, June 6, exactly six days before the conclusion of the suspension of arms so hardly extorted by the prayers of United Europe from the infuriated belligerents. Under these circumstances, what may we suppose that the Plenipotentiaries discussed? An abstract question of nationality, or the intermediate and pressing question of an armistice? the advantages of the Schlei as a boundary between Germany and Denmark, or the resumption of hostilities at the close of the truce? We suppose that all must understand that the question of the prolongation of the armistice must have preceded every other; and this it was which was discussed, if we mistake not, on Thursday and Monday last. Now, if there is one point more clear than another in the perplexed diplomacy of modern Europe, it is this—that the Danish people have taken the bit between their teeth, and are leading their affrighted Ministry whithersoever they choose. What they now choose is a decided and open resistance to German encroachments, and a demonstration of their opinion in the strongest possible manner. Hence it is that the Danish Cabinet has been led to give as its ultimatum that the blockade of the German ports shall be renewed, at the close of a fortnight from the expiration of the present truce, unless the German powers agree upon some basis of negotiation before that period has elapsed. Whether we may believe the story now afloat that the English Government has at last declared itself ready to act in favour of Denmark, in case the condition is not complied with by the German Powers, is a point on which we may have some doubts, when we consider the peculiar character of Lord Russell's diplomacy; but the report is at least a fair specimen of the state of English opinion at the present time. The fact is, that the Austro-Prussian coalition has at last pushed the neutral Powers into a corner, and that, unless they recede from their present demands, war is the only alternative left to us. The Dagbladet of Copenhagen has stated positively, in the name of the Danish people, that should the London treaty be annulled, the kingdom of Denmark would be also destroyed, and the people must be left to choose whether they shall become an integral portion of the German or Scandinavian Confederation. But should any such eventuality be brought about, another claimant steps in in the shape of Russia, who demands that her rights to the succession shall be considered paramount, if the present line of succession either to Denmark or the Duchies is no longer recognised. We have therefore to decide whether we will support the integrity of Denmark or allow the Russian empire to have a footing on the North Sea.

The presentation of addresses to the King of Denmark from various townships of Jutland, in favour of a vigorous prosecution of the war, still continues. The Danes took the opportunity of the constitutional fête celebrated on the 5th inst. to form a grand procession to the King, the purport of which is easily discernible. It is, moreover, expected that the Rigsraad for Denmark and Slesvig will be speedily summoned, in consequence of the probability of a resumption of hostilities.

It is expected that General Count Gablenz has given orders to the Austrian forces to retire to their present positions. It seems that this movement is only the consequence of a former understanding between the Allies, which has never yet been completed. It is said that the name of the Austrian naval commander-in-chief has not yet been received by the Prussians with great and unmingled satisfaction.

The loss of the Prussians during the late campaign has been officially calculated at 941 men, 116 of whom are officers, 46 have died, and 1,092 persons were killed and wounded, besides 9 officers and 117 of lower ranks taken prisoners. The latter have been mainly owing, in consequence of the successful surprises effected by the Danes over that arm of the service.

Field Marshal Count von Wrangel has received permission from the supreme authority to retire, and in consequence of his advanced age, the supreme command will be taken, temporarily, at least, by Prince Frederick Charles, the senior officer after Count von Wrangel.

Duke Frederick of Augustenburg has paid a visit to the kings of Prussia and Saxony. It was understood that the visit could not take place so long as they formally recognised the treaty of London: we may therefore understand it now to mean an open repudiation of every engagement entered into according to that treaty. It is reported that the Duke will proceed to Vienna to pay a similar visit to the Emperor of Austria.

In the Hanoverian Parliament, the Minister of Justice, in a speech upon the Slesvig-Holstein question, said that Austria, Prussia, and the Federal Diet were combining to procure a complete separation of the Duchies from the Danish crown, and their formation into an independent German State under the rule of the present Duke of Augustenburg; and that Hanover concurred entirely in these projects, which it was hoped might be peacefully accomplished under conditions agreeable to the German nation.

The effect of the blockade is already evidenced in a scheme lately proposed by which the coal raised in the neighbourhood of Dusseldorf will be sent from that quarter into the East of Prussia. This country has until lately been supplied with coal from England, but it is now discovered that the native product is as good as that of hateful Albion, and it is expected that a large trade will arise from this article.

THE people of the United Principalities received with rapture the intelligence of the vote passed in favour of Prince Couza: Te Deum has been chanted, illuminations and reviews held, and addresses presented. The Prince has paid a visit to Constantinople to inform his Imperial suzerain of the change which he has effected: it is hoped that the visit will produce good results. The Sultan has made brilliant preparations for the reception of the Prince, and has sent a frigate to Kustendjee with his special aide-de-camp on board to receive him.

The conference on the subject of the difficulties in the Principalities still continues. At the instance of the English envoy, Sir Henry Bulwer, and with the assent of the French Minister, a commission is to be formed to act as receivers-general for the conventual property lately confiscated, until it shall have been decided to whom it now belongs. It is not intended that any notice should be taken of the late events at Bucharest, as tending only to complicate the questions under consideration.

The Turkish Budget is now in the course of preparation by Fuad Pacha, and will, it is hoped, be a good specimen of Turkish skill in finance.

THE 4th inst. was the anniversary of the battle of Magenta; we hear (from Italian sources) that the Austrians commemorated the day as a victory by a review of the troops at Verona under General Benedek. A review was also held on that day at Turin to celebrate the establishment of the Constitution, an anniversary which was celebrated with equal enthusiasm throughout the whole length of Italy. L. Minghetti has had the satisfaction of informing the Italian Parliament that he has succeeded in giving out the 200,000,000 francs of the old loan, which then remained unissued, on the most advantageous terms. A bill has been brought forward in the Senate to enforce the punishment of duels, which bid fair to be a curse to the Italian army.

As a contemporary has rightly said, there is no point in the present history of Europe on which reports vary so much as the health of the Pope. He is always said to be on the verge of death, or, as now, to be 'perfectly recovered from his late illness.' Considering how much depends on his life, it is not surprising that misstatements should often be made with regard to it; but it is truly a marvel that we should hear so little of authentic news from a city whereof half the inhabitants for one-half the year are English or foreigners. It is now stated that His Holiness has been able to resume his audiences, and has had an interview with M. de Sartigues, in the course of which he thanked the French Government for the protection which they had afforded to the Roman Catholics of the East.

IF ever evil omen attended the accession of a sovereign to a new province, it has occurred lately in the cession of the Ionian Islands from the protectorate of Great Britain to the Kingdom of Greece. On the 1st inst. the Greek troops were landed, and the Greek flag hoisted; the Lord High Commissioner had shortly before that published an announcement that the protocol whereby the cession had been finally concluded was signed on the 28th ult., and had received a vote of thanks from the Senate. On the 5th inst., whether by treachery or the natural carelessness of inexperienced soldiers, an explosion took place in the forts, whereby fifty houses, the hospital, a fort, the custom-house, and the neighbouring factories were destroyed, 90 soldiers and 47 civilians killed, and 58 soldiers and 200 civilians wounded or missing. It was at first feared in England that some of our own troops might have been the victims in this awful catastrophe; but such does not appear to have been the case. Never probably has a new government been inaugurated under more lugubrious circumstances. It may be remembered that the Albanians of the coast immediately opposite the late Septinsular Republic had stated pretty freely their intention of taking advantage of the cessation of the English protectorate to renew their raids upon the newly-liberated islands. The British consulates have now been informed that at the request of Greece England will continue her protection over the Ionian inhabitants in their relations with the Turkish authorities for another year; but it is not likely that this protection will extend to the prohibition of such raids as were hinted at by the Albanians, as they would be affairs of local police, and would require, if anything, the presence of the military force which we have already withdrawn. It has perhaps never been sufficiently noticed that the island of Vido, which commands the harbour of Corfu, was a British possession before the making of the treaty by which the Ionian Islands were confided to the protection of England, and that we have therefore spontaneously given up a security to which we were as much entitled as we are now to Malta and Gibraltar. It is not impossible that this fact may be found to have important bearings hereafter.

IF anything could be unexpected in this age of sensations alike in the political as in the dramatic and romantic world, it would be a civil disturbance in the quiet and well-ordered Republic of Switzerland. Such, however, has occurred in the rural canton of Bâle, where the authorities of the canton decided to carry out an election in spite of the positive prohibition of the Federal Council. So great were the fears of a collision between the Federal and State authorities, that Herr Schenk, the Vice-President of the Council, repaired to the spot, as commissioner to enquire into the cause of the disorders. By the laws of the Federation, the Supreme Council is allowed to confide to its commissioner extended powers enabling him to call out what force he may consider necessary for the preservation of order. We are happy to be able to state that the conflict between Federal and State rights is not to have a humiliating parody in the noble little Republic, and that Herr Schenk has considered his mission accomplished without the necessity for strong measures.

CONSIDERING how broad have been the allusions made of late in England to the expression of opinion by Royalty in matters of supreme policy, we think that a short statement of the late Ministerial crisis in Belgium will not be uninteresting. On the 31st ult. M. Rogier, Cabinet Minister, gave to the House a detailed account of the whole affair. It appears that an attempt had been made to form a Cabinet of the 'extreme right,' or Conservative party, but that the attempt had failed, in consequence of the impossibility of arriving at an understanding with the King on the programme to be adopted. The Liberal Ministry has therefore been recalled to power, and will, if still objected to by the House, call for a dissolution. It is fair to state that the leader of the Conservative party charged the Liberal Cabinet with the intrigues by which it had returned to office, and so relieved the Crown from a certain amount of responsibility; but the facts as we read them are not devoid of a lesson with regard to constitutional monarchy.

THE visit of the Emperor and Empress of Russia to the baths of Kissingen will lead them naturally first to Potsdam, and then to Darmstadt: it is especially stated of the latter place that it will be honoured by a short visit only.

NEW deputations of peasants, elected from the inhabitants of the Polish provinces of Augustowo, Ploek, and Lublin, have been received at St. Petersburg by his Imperial Majesty. The peasant Diet of Finland has formed a committee for the presentation of a petition to the Emperor, praying that the Government would appoint as officials in that country such persons only as could speak the Finnish language; they are also to solicit leave to use that tongue as the vehicle of instruction in physical and other sciences, and suggest that in default of that it will be necessary to use the Swedish language.

THE appeal of La Pommerais to the supreme tribunal of Paris has been unsuccessful, in spite of the talent and ingenuity displayed by his advocate. M. Dupin, the Procureur-Général, in the course of his reply glanced at all the great cases of poisoning which have happened in France, to show how needful it is to treat this species of crime with the greatest severity. No hope now remains for the man except in the Emperor's prerogative of mercy. Exertions have been made by the party objecting to capital punishment, to save him from the legal consequences of his crime; but it appears to be understood that mercy extended to him will be tantamount to an abolition of capital punishment, as the lower classes will never hereafter suffer one of their number to be executed after a 'gentleman' has been let off.

THE remains of the Duc de Malakoff, after having lain in state in Algeria, have been transported to the Church of the Invalides in Paris, where they now rest in a temporary tomb, until the more magnificent resting-place shall be completed.

The Progrès of Lyons has been suspended for two months for an article upon the deceased Marshal, which, according to the notice of the Minister of the Interior, 'insulted the French army in one of its most illustrious chiefs, by giving a false account of a military event.'

M. RENAN, the famous free-thinker of France, has for two years held the title of Professor of the Hebrew and Syriac languages in the College of France, without being allowed to give the lectures which are the duty of the office. In order to put an end to this anomaly, without depriving M. Renan of a livelihood, M. Duruy, Minister of Public Instruction, has proposed that M. Renan should give up the professorial chair, and receive in exchange the post of Assistant-Curator of the Imperial Library. To this course, however, the learned Professor entirely demurs; he declines to give up a title which he holds on the presentation of the College of France and as a Member of the Institute. He is willing to continue without the salary the duties of the Professorship by lectures at his own house; he, therefore, declines to accept the post offered to him. It appears, however, that the Government choose to consider that M. Renan has been dismissed from his office. What course will now be taken by the two parties at variance remains to be seen. M. Renan has published another and cheaper edition of the 'Vie de Jésus, which will be within the reach of the lowest classes; his work has lately been translated into Italian, and has already caused some trouble with regard to the international copyright.

ON April 30, at 5 A.M., a body was found by the platelayers on the line between Lyons and Marseilles, about two miles from the station of Villefranche. The corpse was that of a young man of twenty-five or thirty years of age; no signs were found by which he could be recognised; in his pockets were found a 'Bradshaw's Foreign Guide' and sixteen francs. It was decided that the deceased was an Englishman, and had committed suicide by throwing himself out of the train; the body was then rather hurriedly buried. Strange rumours, however, had arisen on the subject, and an exhumation was ordered; the features were photographed, and a post-mortem examination made. It appeared, from certain signs on the neck and wrists, that the man had been violently treated, if not strangled, before he was thrown out of the carriage. The conclusion was easy to the intuitive glance of a Frenchman: a rich Englishman had been robbed and murdered in a railway carriage; the miserable sum of sixteen francs had been left on his person to lull suspicion. Alas for the lively imagination of our neighbours! The true story differed from the romance in every particular. A waiter at the Hôtel de l'Univers at Lyons recognised the photograph of the corpse as that of a young American who had run from his hotel in a complete state of destitution, leaving a debt of 30 francs as a memento. Whatever the cause of the marks on his neck and wrists may have been, there is every reason to suppose that the deceased had contemplated suicide.

A REMARKABLE epidemic has prevailed for some years in the township of Morzine, on the French slopes of the Alps. It has hitherto baffled all the attempts of science either to classify its symptoms or prevail over its attacks: it produces all the effects of raving mania without its other characteristics, and appears to be principally confined to the female sex. Under these circumstances, Mgr. Maguin, Bishop of Annecy, paid a visit to the township, with the charitable wish to alleviate as far as possible the sufferings of his flock. He was in the act of administering confirmation to some of the parishioners, when a number of those assisting at the ceremony were suddenly seized with the awful malady. A horrible scene then took place, the details of which were too scandalous to be repeated. Such was the excitement caused that the authorities were forced to send for the military to keep order. A special staff of physicians has also been summoned to examine more closely into the disease, and has been provided by the departmental authorities.

AFTER giving some account of the Conference now sitting at London, a French journal goes on rather wickedly to state that another great engine for the destruction of human life has been invented by the skill of M. Gevelot, of Paris: it consists of a rifle and bayonet, both of which may be used in the ordinary fashion. About half-way up the barrel of the rifle, just at the point where the left hand would grasp it in the charging position, a 'six-shooter' is attached, the trigger of which may be pulled by the left hand without removing it from its position. This arm is expected by its inventor to revolutionise modern warfare. We may here also mention that an Austrian officer has invented a double-barrelled rifled cannon, which will fire sixteen balls per minute. How grateful we ought to be to the charitable ingenuity of modern artificers!

A REPORT has been issued of the exports and imports during the first quarter of the year 1864. It appears that the amount of the exports was 322,639,000 francs, or an increase of 50 per cent. on those of the year 1861, the first of commercial liberty in France. The amount levied by duties on imports has also risen, during the same time, from 35,560,000 francs, to 52,742,000 francs, which again shows a rise of exactly 50 per cent.

THE Emperor and Empress have favoured the Agricultural Show at Evreux with their presence. They were received in the most enthusiastic manner, and expressed the liveliest interest in the nature and quality of the natural productions exhibited: they were especially pleased with the fine show of half-bred horses, several individuals of which they examined with the utmost curiosity.

THE race for the Grand Prix de Paris was run at the beautiful course at Longchamp on Sunday last. The prize was an objet d'art given by His Majesty the Emperor, and 4,000*l.* given half by the city of Paris and half by the five great railway companies of France. The subscription was 40*l.*, with forfeits of 24*l.* and 20*l.*, according to the date of declaration. The race was open to colts and fillies of all countries of the age of three years. The colts carried 8st. 9lb. and the fillies 8st. 6lb. This year there were 126 subscribers. The length of the course was one mile and seven furlongs. The weather was superb, and the company numerous and gay. The Emperor and Empress were present to witness the sport. Only five horses came to the post to contest the rich prize. These were Blair Athol, the winner of the Epsom Derby, Fille de l'Air, the winner of the French and English Oaks, Bois-Roussel, the winner of the French Derby, Vermouth, by Nabob out of Vermille, and Baronello, by the Baron out of Annette. The betting was 2 to 1 on Blair Athol. Bois-Roussel went away with the lead, the running being made at an indifferent pace; at the end of a mile the leader dropped back and Fille de l'Air looked formidable; she was, however, instantly disposed of, and the race was left with Vermouth and Blair Athol. At the end of one mile and a half, Blair Athol looked all over the winner, but at that point the distance, the journey from London to Paris, and the effects of his terrific race at Epsom, told on him, and, though he struggled on gamely enough, he was beaten by Vermouth in good style by two lengths. Fille de l'Air was third, and Baronello fourth; but as the jockey of the former either declined or forgot to weigh after the race, she was disqualified for the five thousand francs with which the third horse is consoled. The victory of the French horse seemed to cause immense delight to the Parisians. Vermouth is the property of M. H. Delamarre, the owner of Bois-Roussel. The Emperor and Empress received quite an ovation from the English visitors.

OF all the improvements which have taken place in Paris under the present dynasty, none have been hailed by the English world with greater pleasure and interest than the restoration of Notre Dame de Paris. There is an instinctive tendency in the English mind, which we may notice without attempting to explain, leading it to take the greatest possible interest in matters of church architecture, to examine every restoration with a critical eye, and to join most heartily in the enthusiasm created by every successful attempt to reproduce the ancient glories of our cathedrals. No wonder, then, that every one of us has peeped longingly through the hoarding which for some time has hidden the restored chancel of Notre Dame from the vulgar view, and has asked with anxiety as to the probable time when the whole edifice would be completed. We have now to announce that on May 31 the solemn reconsecration of the Cathedral was celebrated by the Archbishop of Paris, assisted by a large number of his suffragan bishops. The improvements effected in the edifice comprise well-nigh a new creation; the northern and southern transepts have been rebuilt, the chancel entirely altered, and a complete set of new stalls, &c., added. The objectionable paint, which had been stencilled on the walls and pillars on the occasion of the Emperor's marriage, has been removed. Only the west front, with its two well-known towers, still remain as they were left, even by the sacrilegious hands of the patriots of 1791. The whole of the present week will be occupied by sermons preached in honour of the event by most of the ecclesiastical celebrities of France, amongst whom we see the name of Mgr. Dupanloup, the famous Bishop of Orleans.

SOUTH AMERICA.

The Emperor of Brazil has opened his Cortes by a speech, of which the portion most important to us was that in which he informed the House that the English and Brazilian Governments had accepted the mediation of Portugal for the settlement of their differences.

The seizure of the Chincha Islands by a Spanish squadron, as a guarantee for the performance of certain reparations demanded of the Peruvian Government, has not met with unqualified approbation at Madrid. The Epoca asks that the world will suspend its judgment until the Spanish commanders have shown or failed to show that they had strong reasons for the somewhat violent course pursued by them. It was said that the Peruvian Consul at Madrid has announced that he is empowered to settle all the differences existing between the two Governments; but the Consul at Bordeaux has denounced the statement as a forgery, and the principle of it as totally erroneous.

FUTILITY OF FEDERAL CONQUESTS.—The Milwaukie News thus illustrates an article, the object of which is to show that a people cannot be conquered by mere force:—'Two years ago we drove the rebels out of the entire country surrounding Paducah. That section is now all occupied by the rebel General Forrest. Immediately after General Grant advanced into West Tennessee, and during the summer of 1862, conquered the whole of that region; it is now almost entirely in rebel hands. The same summer desperate battles were fought at Corinth, Iuka, and Hatchie, and in every struggle victory crowned our arms; but every one of these points is in undisputed possession of the enemy. In the fall of that year, General Grant occupied La Grange in Tennessee, Holly Springs and Oxford in Mississippi, and the crossings of the Yockney river, some twelve miles south of Oxford, while his cavalry were thrown forward nearly to Granada; the whole of this territory is now abandoned. At the same time our forces held possession of all the country eastward of the line of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, which is also, of course, in undisputed possession of the enemy. A year ago this winter and spring our army took possession of the country back of Lake Providence, also of nearly all the region between the Mississippi and Yazoo rivers; afterwards occupied Jackson and Canton, in Mississippi; in the summer we arranged for the permanent occupation of the territory east of Vicksburg, and between the Big Black and Yazoo rivers; about the same time our troops were pushed westward from Vicksburg into Louisiana, routing the enemy from the entire vicinity, a distance of from seventy to one hundred miles. Every square foot of the territory described is now surrendered. In short, from Cairo to New Orleans, in the Mississippi Valley proper, the Federal flag, as we are informed, does not float over a single inch of territory out of the range of gunboats on the river, and no loyal man is known to live in any portion of the territory mentioned as conquered but now surrendered. No Union man, it adds, can ride five miles out of Memphis without being killed or captured, and the same is true of most stations on the Mississippi. That even as far up as Shawneetown, it says, one hundred and fifty shots were fired from the Kentucky shore, into one of our steamers on Sunday last.'

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

PARLIAMENT has not recovered from its fit of dulness, and therefore a very brief summary of its proceedings during the past week will be sufficient.

On Friday, in the House of Lords, a Bill for regulating chimney-sweeping was read a second time. The Earl of Shaftesbury gave a horrible account of the disgusting and revolting cruelties to which young children are subjected who are in training as climbing boys: he quoted from the evidence taken before the Commissioners a statement made by Mr. Ruff, who says: 'No one knows the cruelty which a boy has to undergo in learning. The flesh must be hardened. This is done by rubbing it, chiefly on the elbows and knees, with the strongest brine, close by a hot fire. You must stand over them with a cane, or coax them by a promise of a halfpenny, &c., if they will stand a few more rubs. At first they will come back from their work with their arms and knees streaming with blood, and the knees looking as if the caps had been pulled off; then they must be rubbed with brine again.' The noble Earl also cited a case in which a boy had been torn to pieces in dragging him out of a chimney. Many children are maimed and killed in climbing. In 1840 an Act was passed prohibiting the employment of boys for sweeping chimneys, but the law has been set at defiance both by master-sweeps and by householders. The object of the Bill now introduced is to make the law of 1840 effective.

On Monday, in the House of Lords, a message was read from the Queen recommending a grant to Sir Rowland Hill of 20,000*l.*, and a grant of 1,000*l.* a year to the Countess of Elgin. A motion for the production of the correspondence relative to the arrest of the Rev. Fortescue Anderson by the Russian authorities at Grodno during the Polish insurrection, was carried. The Public Schools Bill, the main object of which is to provide that any person accepting an office in a public school shall do so subject to any future legislation by Parliament, was read a second time. Several peers concurred in praising the report of the Commissioners, and agreed that our public school system was susceptible of considerable improvements.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, there was rather a lively discussion upon the Danish question. In reply to Mr. Osborne and other members, Lord Palmerston said he was bound not to disclose what had taken place at the Conference, that no arrangement had yet been made for a continuation of the suspension of arms, and that if the Conference did not meet again before the 12th the war would be resumed; but that there was no doubt the Conference would meet before that date. Later in the evening the subject was again brought forward by Lord H. Lennox, who said the House ought to be informed if the Government still considered themselves bound by their former declarations that the treaty of 1852 was to be maintained. Mr. Osborne made a short and telling speech, complaining of the House being kept in ignorance of what was being done, seeing that the proceedings of the Conference were published on the Continent. The House was being tricked into silence. Then Mr. Disraeli rose, and reviewed the way the House had been treated in reference to the Conference. The month of the armistice was nearly up, and it was the duty of the Government to state what had been done, or at least to assure the country that their views were unchanged. If the wild hypothesis were true that the policy of the Government was changed, and they were consenting to the partition of Denmark which five months ago they were stirring up a war to prevent, then it was a mockery for the Premier to keep silent. Lord Palmerston, in reply, taunted Mr. Disraeli with finding fault with the Government conduct and not suggesting any other policy. When the negotiations arrived at the proper stage, the Government would be able to convince the country they had done their duty. Mr. Fitzgerald and Lord R. Cecil followed, the latter insisting that it was not constitutional for Ministers, under pretence of friendship for Denmark, to stifle discussion whilst the negotiations were going on.

The same evening the Government was defeated by a majority of 52 on a vote for 10,000*l.* for the new National Gallery at Burlington House. In 1860 the House voted 17,000*l.* on the understanding that the National Gallery was not to be removed from Trafalgar Square.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, Mr. H. Berkeley asked the Secretary of the Admiralty if he had any objection to lay upon the table of the House a return of the number of men absent from the United Kingdom belonging to the Royal Naval Reserve, specifying how many were gone foreign, and of those how many were gone to the Federal and Confederate States of America. Lord C. Paget said he had no objection to lay on the table a return of the Royal Naval Reserve, specifying how many were going foreign. With regard to those men who might have joined the Federal or Confederate States services, the Admiralty were only aware that a few had done so, who, the moment the fact was ascertained, were discharged from the force. He should be happy to furnish the hon. gentleman with a return of the numbers of those men.

MURDER.—Commenting on the melancholy death of the daughter of Ex-Governor Pickens from the bursting of a shell thrown into Charleston by the Federals, of which we gave an account in our last number, the New York Daily News of May 20 says: 'The death of that sweet girl was murder. Why are those guns fired on Charleston? Not to weaken its defences. Not with any ordinary purposes of war. Not in fair fight with armed men. Not to aid the siege or lessen the improbability of its success. Why then? To murder innocent non-combatants like this fair victim to a thirst for blood. What wonder is there that her broken-hearted husband should have sworn "to die in battle with the Yankees?" Thousands of rebel hands will clutch the sword with a yet fiercer grip when they shall hear this woful tale; and once again, what wonder? If we must fight, and wound, and slay, in God's name let us fight with men, not women and their children. Let it be in the fierce heat of battle, not to glut a devilish as well as useless thirst for blood. Meanwhile, that girl's death was murder.'

GENERAL LEE'S ADDRESS TO HIS ARMY.

THE following has appeared in the New York papers, credited to the Richmond Enquirer:—

GENERAL ORDERS —No. 41.
Head-quarters, Army of Northern Virginia,
May 14, 1864.

1. The General commanding takes great pleasure in announcing to the army the series of successes that, by the favour of God, have recently been achieved by our arms.

2. A part of the enemy's force threatening the valley of Virginia has been routed by General Imoden, and driven back to the Potomac, with the loss of their train and a number of prisoners.

3. Another body of the enemy, under General Averill, penetrated to the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad at Dublin depot. A portion of his force has been dispersed by Generals Morgan and W. E. Jones, who are in pursuit of the remainder.

4. The army of General Banks sustained a severe defeat in Western Louisiana by the forces of General Kirby Smith, and retreated to Alexandria, losing several thousand prisoners, thirty-five pieces of artillery, and a large number of wagons. Some of the most formidable gunboats that accompanied the expedition were destroyed to save them from capture.

5. The expedition of General Steele into Western Arkansas has ended in a complete disaster. Northern journals of the 10th instant announce his surrender, with an army of nine thousand men, to General Price.

6. The cavalry force sent by General Grant to attack Richmond has been repulsed, and retired towards the Peninsula. Every demonstration of the enemy south of James River has, up to this time, been successfully repelled.

7. The heroic valour of this army, with the blessing of Almighty God, has thus far checked the principal army of the enemy, and inflicted upon it heavy losses. The eyes and hearts of your countrymen are turned to you with confidence, and their prayers attend you in your gallant struggle. Encouraged by the success that has been vouchsafed to us, and stimulated by the great interests that depend upon the issue, let every man resolve to endure all and brave all, until, by the assistance of a just and merciful God, the enemy shall be driven back, and peace secured to our country. Continue to emulate the valour of your comrades who have fallen, and remember that it depends upon you whether they shall have died in vain. It is in your power, under God, to defeat the last great effort of the enemy, establish the independence of your native land, and earn the lasting love and gratitude of your countrymen and the admiration of mankind.

R. E. LEE, General.

'Head-quarters, Army of Northern Virginia, May 5, 1864.—'Hon. Secretary of War,—The enemy crossed the Rapidan at Ely's and Germanna Fords. Two corps of this army moved to oppose him—Ewell by the old turnpike and Hill by the plank road. They arrived this morning in close proximity to the enemy's line of march. A strong attack was made upon Ewell, who repulsed it, capturing many prisoners and four pieces of artillery. The enemy subsequently concentrated upon General Hill, who, with Heth's and Wilcox's division, successfully resisted repeated and desperate assaults. A large force of cavalry and artillery on our right was driven back by Rosser's brigade. By the blessing of God we maintained our position against every effort until night, when the contest closed. We have to mourn the loss of many brave officers and men. The gallant Brigadier-General J. M. Jones was killed, and Brigadier-General Stafford, I fear, mortally wounded, while leading his command with conspicuous valour.—R. E. LEE.'

'Near Spottsylvania Court House, Virginia, May 8.—To the Honourable J. A. Seddon,—After a sharp encounter with the Fifth Army Corps, we were attacked by Warren's and Torbett's divisions of cavalry. General R. H. Anderson, with the advance of our cavalry, repulsed the enemy with heavy slaughter, and we took possession of the Court House. I am the more grateful to the Giver of all victories that our loss is small.—R. E. LEE.'

'Spottsylvania Court House, viâ Guiney's, May 11, 1864.—The Honourable Secretary of War,—General Grant's army is intrenched near this place, on both sides of the Brook Road. Frequent skirmishing occurred yesterday and to-day, each army endeavouring to discover the position of the other. To-day the enemy shelled our lines and made several assaults with infantry against different points, particularly on our left, held by General R. H. Anderson. The last, which occurred after sunset, was the most obstinate; some of the enemy leaping over the breastworks. They were easily repulsed, except in front of General Doles's brigade, where they drove our men from their position, and from a four-gun battery there posted. The men were soon rallied, and by dark our line was re-established and the battery recovered. A large body of the enemy moved around our left on the evening of the 9th, and took possession of the road about midway between Shady Grove Church and the Court House. General Early, with a part of Hill's corps, drove them back this evening, taking one gun and a few prisoners. Thanks to a merciful Providence, our casualties have been small. Among the wounded are Brigadier-Generals Hayes and H. H. Walker.—R. E. LEE.'

LETTER FROM GENERAL LEE.—It was proposed by the City Council of Richmond to purchase a house for General Lee in that city. The grateful offering was declined in the following terms:—'Head-quarters Army, Northern Virginia, November 12, 1863.—To the President of the City Council, Richmond, Virginia.—Sir,—My attention has been directed to a resolution reported in the newspapers as having been introduced in the body over which you preside, having for its object the purchase by the City of Richmond of a house for the use of my family. I assure you, sir, that no want of appreciation of the honour conferred upon me by this resolution, or insensibility to the kind feeling which prompted it, induces me to ask, as I most respectfully do, that no further proceedings be taken with reference to the subject. The house is not necessary for the use of my family, and my own duties will prevent my residence in Richmond. I should therefore be compelled to decline the generous offer, and I trust that whatever means the City Council may have to spare for this purpose may be devoted to the relief of the families of our soldiers in the field who are more in need of assistance and more deserving of it than myself.—I have the honour to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant, R. E. LEE, General.'

Nearly one hundred thousand dollars has been subscribed in Montgomery, Alabama, to provide education for the children of soldiers killed in the war.

GENERAL KIRBY SMITH'S ARMY.

GENERAL KIRBY SMITH has issued the following congratulatory orders to his troops, officially announcing the death of several officers, and the late successes in Louisiana and Arkansas:

Headquarters, Trans-Mississippi Department,
Camden, Ark., May 3, 1864.

Soldiers of the Trans-Mississippi Department, —

Once more, in the hour of victory, we are called upon to mourn the heroic dead.

Generals W. R. Scurry and Horace Randal have fallen upon the field of honour. At Jenkins' ferry they offered themselves up, precious victims on the altar of liberty.

Mouton and Green are gone; Scurry and Randal have followed on the same glorious path. Be it ours to emulate their virtues and valour, and to act as men not unworthy to associate with such heroes.

The colours of their respective brigades will be draped in mourning for thirty days.

E. KIRBY SMITH, General Commanding.

Soldiers of the Trans-Mississippi Department,—

The campaign inaugurated at Mansfield on the day of national fast and supplication has, under Providence, been crowned with most glorious and brilliant success. You have defeated a foe three times your own numbers. The fields of Mansfield, Pleasant Hill, Cloutierville, Poison Spring, Marks' Mills, and Jenkins' ferry attest your devotion. Eight thousand killed and wounded, six thousand prisoners, thirty-four pieces of artillery, twelve hundred wagons, one gunboat and three transports are already the fruits of your victories. The path of glory is still open to you—permanent security to your homes before you. Call together your comrades, and, shoulder to shoulder, we will yet free the soil of our beloved country from the invader's footsteps. Soldiers of Arkansas, Missouri, Texas, and Louisiana, you have the thanks of a grateful people. Your living will be respected —your dead honoured and revered.

E. KIRBY SMITH, General Commanding.

A SOUTHERN ACCOUNT OF THE AFFAIR AT RESACA.

(From the Atlanta Register, May 11.)

A GREAT deal has been said here by Madame Rumour about the affair at Resaca last Monday, but it is very difficult to get at the truth of it. From a gentleman who was there at the time we obtain the following particulars:—

Monday morning the enemy, in what force our informant could not learn, approached Resaca through Snake Creek Gap, and about noon came within three-quarters of a mile of the village, where they were attacked by the Thirty-seventh Mississippi infantry, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Weir. This regiment was flanked right and left, and lost in killed, wounded, and missing, seventy-one men.

A small force of cavalry was sent to the rear of the enemy and captured sixteen of them.

The Seventeenth and Twenty-ninth Alabama regiments engaged the enemy about six o'clock in the afternoon, and repulsed them.

The enemy fell back on Monday night, and on Tuesday morning were pursued by several regiments and driven from the Gap, where they had commenced fortifying. A few prisoners were brought in on Tuesday.

Lieutenant-General Hood, Major-General Cleburne, and Brigadier-General Reynolds were at Resaca on Tuesday. General Cauty commanded the troops engaged in the fight on Monday.

The forces that were in pursuit of the enemy on Tuesday were under the command of General Cleburne, whose presence called forth a great deal of enthusiasm among the troops.

The correspondent of the Register sends the following:—

Mill Creek Gap, May 10—4 P.M.

Our army has been in line of battle for three days. On Sunday evening the enemy endeavoured to pass through Dug Gap, but were gallantly repulsed by General McNair's brigade and General Grigsby's dismounted cavalry. Our casualties were very small. The enemy left fifty dead on the field, and had about two hundred wounded. We captured about fifty prisoners. If they had succeeded in driving us from the Gap, it would have been an important point gained, as they would then have been able to turn our left. During yesterday the enemy were massing heavy forces in our front, trying to develope the position of our lines. A heavy artillery duel was going on the greater portion of the day. About four o'clock yesterday evening the enemy made three efforts to storm our rifle-pits on the brow of the ridges facing Mill Creek Gap. The enemy advanced in heavy columns around the points of the hills. Our officers ordered their men to reserve their fire until the enemy should get within short range. When they got within seventy-five yards the order to fire was given, when volley after volley was poured into their ranks. They broke in confusion and fell back beyond the hill and reformed their lines, and again advanced to the charge, but the same bloody welcome was tendered them, and again they sought safety in flight. A third time they endeavoured to turn our left in order to enfilade our works, but the movement was promptly met by the officers in command, and the enemy were driven in great confusion from the field. Many of the enemy were seen to fall as each volley was fired into them.

Our casualties are very small, perhaps not more than a dozen in killed and wounded. Our rifle-pits were held by the Fifty-fourth and Thirty-eighth Alabama and Thirty-eighth Tennessee regiments. Our artillery was handled with consummate skill, throwing shells frequently into the very lines of the enemy. There was considerable skirmishing yesterday in front of General Stevenson's lines, but no advantage was gained by the enemy. General Maney's brigade, posted on the top of Rocky Face Ridge, had several men wounded by the enemy's sharpshooters.

General Wheeler had a heavy skirmish with the enemy yesterday, on the Cleveland road, repulsing them with considerable loss in killed and wounded. He captured one hundred prisoners, among them a colonel commanding a brigade. From the enemy's demonstration yesterday evening, we expected the great battle to come off this morning, but the quiet that reigns along the lines this morning is only broken by the noise of the sharpshooter's rifle or the thunder of artillery far off to the right.

The indications are that the enemy are endeavouring to get possession of the railroad in our rear, in order to burn the bridge at Resaca, and thus cut off our communication with Atlanta. General Johnston is aware of their intentions, and has made such a disposition of his forces as to insure their defeat. Never have I seen such confidence and self-possession by troops just on the eve of battle.

THE FOURTH YEAR OF THE WAR.

(From the Richmond Whig, April 12.)

TO-DAY we enter upon the fourth year of the war—dating from the bombardment of Fort Sumter. We have withstood three years the onsets of a foe mighty in number, boundless in resources, desperately pertinacious, and remorselessly cruel. More than two millions of men on land and a navy equal to half a million more, with the most approved machinery of war, and at an outlay of several thousand millions of dollars, have furiously striven to overwhelm and 'crush' us. At the outset, so ignorant were our foes of the spirit and strength of our people, that they confidently expected to consummate in three months, and with a force less than the numbers they have actually had slain in battle, what the frantic efforts of three years have only served to, show they can never accomplish, in any number of years and with any hosts they can muster. That, mainly from their uncontested command of the water, they have won important advantages, in this long period, is not to be denied; but that they have fallen infinitely short of their confident expectations and swaggering promises, that they have disappointed egregiously the lookers-on in other countries, that they have gained greatly less than we ourselves apprehended, are facts equally undeniable.

They might have overrun us as the British did, and then have conquered us no more than they did. But, to the surprise of European spectators, they have come so far short of this as to have made advances only where the strength of the Confederacy was not put forth in resistance. It was impossible to defend all our wide borders, and invasion was easy. Many places intended originally to be defended, but really of minor importance, had to be abandoned to them, because their superior equipments and their navy enabled them to attack before we were ready for them. Such were Hateras, Roanoke Island, Newbern, Port Royal, Fort Donelson, and other incomplete and inadequately manned defences. New Orleans fell because its defences were not completed, and Vicksburg because it was intrusted to incompetent hands. These successes gave them the Mississippi River, and cut the Confederacy in two. But to what practical advantage? They cannot use the Mississippi for commercial purposes, and the two divisions of the Confederacy fight as well as they did when one. Their successes, indeed, have demonstrated even more forcibly than their failures the impossibility of accomplishing what they have undertaken; for they have shown that nothing seriously hurts us. So vast is our area, and so numerous the strategic and defensive points it furnishes, that the loss of any only necessitates a change of position on our part, and leaves the enemy to contemplate the failure of all the calculations based upon the prospect of winning it. The expected results of success have always eluded them, and the fruits of victory have turned to ashes on their lips. They have nowhere touched the vitals of the Confederacy, and never can; for the Confederacy has no one point in which its life is lodged. Every portion of it is instinct with existence—every mountain and valley and plain throbs with inextinguishable vitality. As long as ground enough is left to plant a battery or set a squadron in the field, the vital point of the Confederacy is not touched.

The question of most interest with us now is not whether the enemy can succeed in their undertaking - if, indeed, that ever was a question—but how much longer they will persist in the mad attempt. The impression generally prevails that the campaign on which we are now entering is the last—that the death-grapple has come, and the struggle must soon be over. The army makes no calculations. With grim humour and gay defiance worthy of the cavalier stock from which they come, our soldiers volunteer for 'forty years or the war.' But civilians indulge themselves in speculations, the failure of which cannot affect men who make none. Whether the fourth year of the war will be the final one depends mainly upon the incidents of the campaign. We leave out of view the possibility of other things always possible such, for instance, as the long-delayed but inevitable financial crash at the North, of which the upward tendency of gold there, in spite of all Chase's thimble-rigging, affords improving prospect -the counter-revolution that has been hoped for, and of which the late outbreak in Illinois is prophetic—foreign intervention, rendered more likely of late by the hostile demonstration in Washington towards the European arrangements for Mexico—we leave these out of the calculation, and speak only of military contingencies. Our opinion is, that if the campaign is a successful one to us, it will end the war, though it may not bring immediate peace. peace settled by treaty and declared by proclamation. We do not see how it is possible for the enemy, if at the end of four years of such gigantic combat as we have had they find themselves no further advanced towards their object than they now are, to stand up before the world and insist upon continuing the contest. We do not see how the world, without shaming the civilisation and common sense of the age, could permit it. Christian nations would be bound by the faith they hold and the humanity they profess to protest against it, and, if that did not avail, then to interpose to prevent it. Yankee humbug could not longer deceive mankind as to the possibility of our subjugation, nor Yankee audacity persist in what would be so obviously absurd.

What is most to be feared, all in fact that is to be feared, is that advantages of such apparent importance may be gained by the enemy as will afford them a pretext for continuing the strife, and will enable them yet a while longer to practise upon the credulity of other countries. This would give them a little longer respite from the humiliation of admitted defeat, and the more terrible consequences they will have to face among themselves, when the appalling fact strikes the mind of the masses that all this bloody and wasting war, this frightful sacrifice of human life, the blood and tears and anguish of a whole people, the nightmare of national debt, the prostration of national name and rank, the corruption of public morals, the subversion of the general industry and the ruin of private fortunes, have been in vain, have been wasted and lost -and all through the contrivance of a set of knavish politicians. Lincoln and his men will postpone their day of reckoning as late as possible, and to that end will protract the war as long as any pretext that will delude their people can be found. If by force of numbers they can gain anything amounting to an advantage this year, or by the art of lying can make it appear they have, they will probably be able to carry their armies over into still another campaign. It becomes therefore our chief duty as well as our highest policy to strain every nerve to defeat them in all their attempts, and to see that at the end of the campaign now opening they are less favourably circumstanced than they now are. Let this result appear, and we may confidently count on the practical ending of the war with the expiration of the fighting months of this year. Our noble armies, we are sure, will do their duty; the people must do theirs, by taking care that their armies lack nothing that can contribute to their efficiency.

MR. WENDELL PHILLIPS ON THE WAR.

AT a meeting of the 'American Anti-Slavery Society,' held at New York on May 10, Mr. Wendell Phillips made a speech, from which we make the following extracts:—

I recollect, Mr. President, and will endeavour to bear steadily in mind, that we come here this morning as Abolitionists, that this platform is sacred to the consideration of the claims of the negro, that as far as possible we shut out of consideration here all those general interests which concern us only as citizens, and that as far as may be we confine our view to those things which interest us as pledged to secure the abolition of chattel slavery. The inevitable despotism of war accustoms the public mind to the liberal exercise of despotic power, until at last vigilance is blunted, and the keen sense of individual right and the sacredness of the bulwarks of personal liberty is lost in the din of battle. All these considerations, even as Abolitionists, we have the right secondarily to bear in mind. Now, therefore, standing as we do this hour, with the news, if it can be credited, of the greatest success of the whole three years, before which, as our President has well said, the rebellion reels, it is still to be borne in mind that we have already incurred a debt; that we have already sacrificed an amount of life, that we have already blunted the old vigilance of individual liberty to an extent that bids us as American citizens beware that any such second trial shall ever be needed by the Republic. This war, if the intelligence and virtue of the people can secure it, is to be the last between the sections of the American Union. It is very problematical whether another could be borne and such free institutions survive it in this belt of the continent. When I look, therefore, at the abolition of slavery, I connect with it meritably the maintenance of republican institutions. Now into the dark and fearful storm in which the vessel of state is plunging, no man has foresight enough to see when she will reach still water. The youngest of us are never again to see that republic into which we were born. In our day, at least, it is to be largely biassed by the inevitable results of such a civil war as this. When the war is ended, there will be thrown upon us seven or eight hundred thousand men unfitted by the experience of war for the daily avocations of business, and five or ten thousand idolised officers, the only available candidates for office for a quarter of a century to come. Two thousand millions of dollars is the debt of the Government to-day. three thousand millions of dollars the ultimate debt of State, county, and town, of war damages, the annual expense of three thousand millions of dollars beyond our debt interest to keep the standing army which will be inevitably necessary on any plan of reconstruction. Under that mortgage rests the labour of the next half-century. Every living right hand is mortgaged, and every one to be born for the next twenty years, for this atonement which God has demanded for the sin of our fathers. Hitherto the charm of American labour has been the surplusage of its means. When the American artisan reached Saturday night, after he had paid for his rent, his clothing, his food, he had a half or a third of his wages left—ample material for books, for lectures, for amusements, for newspaper, for travel, for the education of his children. The Austrian prays to-day in the streets of Vienna, 'God grant I may be as well off to-morrow as I was yesterday!' No Yankee ever breathed such a prayer. Every Monday morning he commences life better than he started a week before. This has been the fulcrum and spring-board which lifted the labour of the North into intellectual and moral life. The English artisan mostly, when he reaches Saturday night, has spent his last penny for food, rent, and clothing, and he begins his Monday morning almost as hopeless as the one previous. Now, so long as the results of this war last, so long as the inevitable necessities of the Government for twenty years to come, they are to ask at least one-third, if not one-half, of the average income of the capital of the country to defray its expenses; so long the labouring masses of the Northern States are robbed of just that surplus which constituted its nucleus to intellectual and moral progress. I look out upon our future, therefore, as one vastly momentous in the history of republican government. A comparatively ignorant labouring class in the history of all free States, the resource of corruption and the grave of independence—these are the dead weight—these are the lee-shore of the Maelstrom behind which the old frigate struggles for her harbour.

What I ask of American citizens interested alike in twenty millions of white men and four millions of black, in the providence of God on one bottom, sinking or swimming together, is- remembering the danger on the right hand and on the left—Clear the decks, sweep every possible obstacle or danger from our pathway, if in the providence of God we may by any possibility save the liberty of the whole and the free institutions bequeathed to us. Now over all the picture looms the cloud of a Government habituated to the exercise of despotic power. Well did Mr. Seward say to Lord Lyons, 'I but ring a bell on this side, and unchallenged I put in prison a New Englander; I ring one on that, and with equal responsibility consign a citizen of Ohio to a dungeon.' There is no other such despotism on this side the wall of China. Necessary, inevitable, not to be found fault with, in this death-grapple with the rebellion, but all the more earnestly does it become us to remember that such powers and such an example, if, perchance, trusted to less worthy hands, may result in the speedy dismemberment of the Republic, and the quick advance of despotism. In looking, therefore, at our question, let us remember that it is on a platform girdled by these dangers that we discuss the abolition of slavery to-day. I recognise as gladly as any man, as proudly as any man, the valour and skill of the army of the Potomac and its matchless chief. I believe that Grant will go to the gulf when he pleases to, and plant the stars and stripes again triumphant over the waters of the Gulf of Mexico; but I believe it will be done over battle-fields as bloody as that which he treads to-day. For though the rebellion reels in Virginia, it is by no means broken when it quits the Old Dominion. The sections have learned at least to respect each other. We know the South, its willingness to die for its ideas. We know its readiness for every sacrifice, its indomitable pride. Those elements are not subdued by a single battle, no, nor by three such. I believe, therefore, although we beat the rebellion out of Virginia, that it will still live, and the war is to last many, many months longer.

Now I should not say this if I thought this was a common war, to be decided by battle. If our conflict of arms was with the French, Grant is as good as anybody, and a little better. But in this struggle, if our success carries our banner down to the Gulf, you cannot stop the war of ideas; you have not completed the struggle betwixt Northern and Southern colonisation. The Hon. L. W. Spratt said at the Montgomery Convention: 'This is no geographical quarrel; there can be no geographical quarrel betwixt the men of the North and the men of the South. They are cordial enough. It is a war between the civil institutions of one section and the civil institutions of the other.' It is the eagle and the fish tied together. The eagle cannot live in the fluid suited to the fish, and the fish cannot live in the air with the eagle. One must perish, that the other may survive.

If I were a negro slave I should pray God that this war might last twenty years. If I were a negro and a slave I should dread every victory on the part of the North. For I believe that this war, while it lasts, is performing exactly the work which war did in South America—it is taking the rivets out of society; it is crumbling up the whole civil and social life into its original elements, and when that work is completely done, no matter what be the form of government that comes on, the negro is always free. Witness Mexico and South America. As an American white citizen I deprecate one month of war. I see in the seeds of debt, military ambition and despotism, against which God will demand a virtue and intelligence in the masses, such as history nowhere shows. The settlement of this war is not to be by battle, but by statesmanship.

. . . . . .

You can never make this Union one by force. At the commencement of the war there were a large body of Union men at the South. The Crittenden resolution was passed on this theory. The Crittenden compromise was proposed on the theory that it would bring this class to assert themselves and overcome the secessionists. Possibly it might have been so; we cannot know it now. But the war has built up a unanimous Confederate sentiment. Jeff. Davis made a rebellion—it was all he could make; Abraham Lincoln made the Confederacy—he was the only one who could make it. Three years of rebellion has made the South unanimous. You cannot reconstruct the Union on the loyalty of the white men; there is no loyalty there. You must reconstruct the States on somebody's loyalty, or keep them as territories for twenty years. In the latter event, you keep the Government intrusted with despotic power, and I tremble for the experiment. The blacks are the only basis of loyalty in the South. Give them a vote, link them to the fortunes of the Union, acknowledge the manhood of the black man till the white man is converted.

A MANCHESTER 'SOUTHERNER' AT FORT SUMTER.

ONE of the members of the Executive Committee of the Southern Independence Association, who is now on a visit to the Confederate States, has addressed to his colleagues and fellow-workers in Manchester a long and interesting account of what he had recently seen and done. The following are a few extracts from his letter:—

Charleston will henceforth rank in history as one of the finest military cities in the world, and will furnish a lesson of defence hitherto unknown. On the morning of my arrival I went promenading at leisure over that portion of the town which was the scene of the late fire, but the bursting of a 100 lb. shell in the market soon served to hasten my pace. The boys are always on the look-out for these unceremonious visitors, which they sell for old iron. When Sir Christopher Wren designed St. Michael's Church, he little thought it would play so conspicuous a part in the war. The steeple is 176½ feet high, and from its height can be seen the country far and wide, including all the Yankee operations on Morris Island, even to the reading of the buttons on the officers' uniforms. I waited upon General Beauregard the other day, and was received with the greatest courtesy, and procured his order to pass anywhere within the fortifications. Being anxious to see the great monument of sieges, Fort Sumter, I made preparations for a night visit. We went in boats, the night being too bright for steamers, and carried 1,000 bags of sand with us, each weighing some 50 lbs. When within 1,200 yards of Sumter the Yankees opened fire at the fort, and, sure enough, I thought we were discovered, and expected every moment our boat would be the mark for the next shot. Everything was still as death between the intervals of firing. Every man of us seemed to hold his breath, and all eyes were bent upon the Yankee batteries, which could just be seen above the surface of the water. Our oarsmen were, of course, rowing with all possible speed. I felt as I never felt before, if not in the jaws of death, at least face to face with that enemy. I placed my hand to my neck, and buttoned my coat close to the collar, determining, if our boat sank and my head kept its place, I would swim to the fort. However, quick as lightning, the officer in command cried 'Fort! Land!' and in a few minutes we were within the fort; and once there, you are safe.

I was introduced to Captain Mitchell, commanding in the absence of Major Elliott, and found him a fine young gentlemanly fellow; and for zeal, bravery, sound judgment, and artillery practice, he is considered not to be surpassed. The captain, accompanied by the chief engineer, took me through the fort. I admired the various chambers and rabbit runs, and was particularly struck with the order and regularity of the place. The soldiers' berths were neat and clean, the walls whitewashed, and the whole well ventilated; and the arrangements are so complete that all the men can be concentrated on any given point in a moment. The fort is well supplied with provisions, piles upon piles of them in case of accident; obstructions on every hand, and instruments that will distribute any amount of grape and canister when required. The captain informed me he was quite ready for whatever might happen; the fort, he said, was garrisoned by men from South Carolina, and a braver set of fellows never stood to their guns. While we were walking on the ramparts, I asked the not unreasonable question, 'Are the Yankees good shots?' and was informed they unquestionably were, but nobody need get hit unless he liked. Some few days ago a young fellow, 'larking' with the Yankees, exposed himself unnecessarily, when a ball came and took his head clean off. Another unlucky fellow—a negro—would sleep on the parade-ground, and, to make all secure, he got under cover of an iron cistern; but a shell came and killed him.

On bidding the Captain good-bye, I told him we English were very fond of relics, and if only a small portion of Sumter could be got to Europe, it would be treasured with much care. He then handed me the piece enclosed in memory of my visit.

The Yankee shipping has suffered greatly from torpedoes. So long as six months ago, the Ironside was shaken to that degree that she still lies seemingly helpless near Battery Wagner. The torpedo boats are very destructive and quick in their operations, and you will hear a great deal more of their performances before long.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

MANCHESTER, JUNE 8, 1864.

One of those small and obscure [illegible] which are very [illegible] the democratic [illegible] in my belief [illegible] the Confederate States of North [illegible] the enemy will [illegible] the Northern [illegible] voted out of the [illegible] under the presidency of [illegible] Emancipation Society [illegible] approach to that [illegible] were a very good [illegible] which the Federals [illegible] date of the North.

A public meeting was held on Tuesday evening in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, to [illegible] It was called by requisition, and was convened by the Union and Emancipation Society, on the Civil War of the Southern Rebellion.' The meeting, which was a very large one, was composed pretty equally, I should say, of those attending it to be, if possible, a counter-demonstration to the many Southern meetings recently held in the same town, long before the Union Hall, the seats in the body of the meeting being the platform were occupied by the Confederates of the place and some few others of the like kind; and by the time the chairman had taken his seat, the hall was crowded. Though, as this was a Northern meeting, it would be hardly possible to suppose that Confederate element ought to predominate. The Federals, it appears, strongly fortified themselves in the centre of the meeting, while the Confederates flanked their opponents right and left, and also occupied a strong position in the rear.

Mr. Heywood occupied the chair, and was supported by Mr. J. B. Estcourt, chairman of the committee of the Union and Emancipation Society, and by Mr. J. R. Cooper, also a prominent member of that body.

The Chairman said, as several public meetings had been held in that town in the Southern interest, the present meeting had been called to enable the people to hear the other side of the question. It had been suggested that this meeting should partake of the character of a debate, and that Mr. Kershaw ought to have been invited to represent the Confederate side of the question; but the committee had decided not to accede to that suggestion until a meeting had been called in the name of the North, as similar meetings had already been held in the name of the South. No doubt the Southern party in this country had secured an amount of success, so much, so that he believed it was the intention of a member of Parliament to have moved a resolution in the House of Commons this week for a recognition of the Confederacy (loud cheers and uproar), but that honourable gentleman had wisely postponed that step till June 17. He dared say, if General Grant proved unsuccessful, strong efforts would be put forth to obtain the recognition of the Southern States by the English Parliament. (Renewed cheering and counter-cheering.) The inhabitants of that town would in all probability be called upon to exercise their privilege of petitioning Parliament for or against that resolution. It therefore became them to enquire fully into the causes that induced the Confederate States to rebel against their legitimate Government ('oh! oh!' and great uproar), and also to consider solemnly what would be the effect—the European effect of recognising those States as an independent Power. It was in order that they might be instructed on those points that a deputation from the Union and Emancipation Society had visited their town; and he claimed on their behalf a fair and patient hearing. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. J. R. Cooper then attempted to address the meeting, but great interruption was caused at the outset by a request that the chairman would state beforehand whether discussion would be allowed, and what length of time would be permitted to each speaker. These queries, however, were not answered, and the speaker, amid much uproar, went on to say that he had left his daily business to come to their town to speak about a matter which concerned his welfare as much as that of any working man in that room. (A voice: 'Keep to the question.') Let them not quarrel as to which party is wrong, but by reason and sound argument try to discover which is right. (Cheers and uproar.)

Mr. Kenyon, of the Southern Independence Association, here asked permission to put a question.

The Chairman. I decline to hear you, and request you will sit down. (Renewed uproar.)

A Southerner. Are we to sit here all night and listen to one side, and not say a word for ourselves?

The Chairman. I have already stated that the Southerners have held two or three meetings here, and this one is for the Northerners. (Cheers and laughter.)

Mr. Bridge, of the Southern Independence Association. Is this a public meeting or not?

The Chairman. Certainly it is a public meeting—called for the purpose of hearing these two gentlemen speak.

Mr. Cooper, renewing his attempts to get a hearing, said he regretted the interruption. If they were to arrive at the truth, they must get at it in a spirit very different from that which had been shown that evening. He was amazed there should be such strong objections to hear what was to be said on one side, after two or three meetings had been held on the other. That, indeed, was 'Southern,' and worthy of the men who supported it. (The speaker, after this taunt, was allowed very little quarter, and continued his address amid incessant and determined signs of opposition.)

Mr. Estcourt also addressed the meeting under similar difficulties.

Upon a vote of thanks being proposed to the chairman, a most tumultuous scene took place, a large proportion of the assembly considering that motion as winding up the business of the meeting rather prematurely. Shouts were accordingly raised that the 'deputation' were afraid to debate the question—that 'the meeting was unfairly conducted'—that a 'new chairman ought to be appointed'—that 'the opinion of the people should not be misrepresented for Northern purposes,' &c., &c.

The Chairman called the meeting many times to order, but in vain.

Mr. Bridge. This meeting, if it is a public meeting, has a right to have questions put and answered.

Mr. Estcourt called upon the Southerners to give the Northerners fair play. ('They don't deserve it.') He would answer any question, but would decline to reply to a speech.

Mr. Bridge said the chairman distinctly promised him that he would be allowed to make a speech, as the meeting was a public meeting.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS: June 7.

The event of this week has been the races in the Bois de Boulogne, which took place on Saturday and Sunday. The weather was most favourable, the turf in capital order, and on the second day, when the great 1,000*l.* stake was run for, not only all Paris, but a large deputation from England, was present. The winners of the Derby, the Oaks, and the French Derby were to run. The victory of Vermouth, a French horse, was hailed with the most enthusiastic cheers as a national triumph by the enormous crowd which was assembled. The Emperor, who had sat listless and looking sadly careworn, brightened up as this race began; and when the result was known, he was not the least demonstrative of the spectators. The enthusiasm became so thoroughly national that its first object, the victor of the day, was soon forgotten in deafening cheers for the Emperor, before whose stand the crowd defiled, waving hats and handkerchiefs, with loud cries of 'Vive l'Empereur!' Independently of the running, which was capital, the whole scene was one of the gayest that could be imagined, and the crowd, as usual here, as good-tempered as orderly.

The too well-known M. Renan has been dismissed from the chair of Hebrew and Syriac which he had filled for two years, in which time he only delivered one lecture, after which his course was suspended. There was in a certain portion of the press an apparent wish to make him out a martyr, but the general common sense, which does not understand why the teacher of a language should become a dogmatizer in theology, has stilled the attempt. M. Renan will continue to attack Christianity in his writings, but no longer as an authorised public teacher.

There is no other local news. The Court left yesterday evening for Fontainebleau, where it will stay the month, after which its movements are not known, as it is uncertain whether the Emperor will go this year to Vichy or not. The final decision regarding La Pommerais, which can hardly be doubtful, is not announced. The agitation for suppressing the punishment of death has been resumed, somewhat mal-à-propos, for it is seldom that a criminal has aroused so little sympathy. A banquet which had been organised for last Saturday, with the object of promoting this doctrine, was stopped by the police, but a petition with thirty thousand signatures is stated to have been forwarded to the Emperor.

In the anxiety with which the next news is looked for from America, the French press is sparing of its remarks. The Pays has a very long and interesting letter dated from Washington, May 15, in which the operations of the present campaign are most ably described. The writer is evidently well qualified both by his professional acquirements and his personal knowledge of the ground to form an opinion. He sums up in the following words, which probably represent fairly the state of opinion among military men in the Federal capital:

'What will Grant do now?

'He will probably retire behind the Rappahannock to wait for a more favourable opportunity, and will occupy once more round Washington the circular line which, in point of fact, the Federals have not been able to leave since the beginning of the war, and which is the first line of defence of their capital on the two banks of the Potomac. No attack had ever been attempted against Richmond with such ample means of action, but none has had so swiftly tragical a result. In the first advances against the capital of Virginia, Richmond was only protected by a few feeble works which might easily have been taken, especially after the second day of the battle of Fair Oaks, June 1, 1862. Now, in addition to numerous lines of defence which protect it in all directions at considerable distances, the Confederate capital is itself surrounded by a network of formidable works, which would require, supposing the enemy ever reached them, the operations of a regular siege.'

It is evident that at that date the writer was little sanguine of success.

The Presse of this evening, in a very able article, calls attention to the forged proclamation of Mr. Lincoln. That it was a forgery is certain; but it is remarkable that the difference between the forged document and the real demands of Mr. Lincoln on the country was only one-fourth. The forgery calls

THE IMPOSSIBILITY OF SUBJUGATION.

Richmond is now the [illegible] armies under Lieutenant-General Grant are converging. It may be confidently asserted, by the Confederates, that even if Richmond is no longer tenable, they can turn the moral triumph which the city would be to the Federals into the Confederates will really have [illegible] They will have abandoned that part of Virginia which three years of war has exhausted, and made almost a waste and desert. A new line of defence will be chosen south of the James River, and in the interior of Virginia, and the war will interminably go on.

Richmond has no strategic importance, and without an army is captured with it, a victory would prove barren and fruitless. And these acquisitions once made, they can no more be securely held than those which have been won and lost in the West and South. The war has been an abortion and failure heretofore, and will be none the less so hereafter. Shall it terminate, or is it to be recorded on the pages of history, that the people of the North lost their own liberties in the wicked attempt to subjugate their brethren in the South?

THE CONFEDERATE STATES AND ENGLISH SYMPATHY.—The Richmond Dispatch of a recent date thus comments on the public sympathy manifested in this country for the South:—'Colonel Lamar, of Georgia, than whom there could be no more competent witness, confirms in his late speeches the fact unanimously asserted by all visitors to England, that the public sentiment of the cultivated classes in that country is entirely with the Confederacy. This does not influence the action of the British Government, nor is it any indication that the policy of that Government towards our country will ever be changed. We do not entertain the least hope of such a result. Nor does Colonel Lamar. No power on earth ever pursued a more selfish and inhuman policy than that of Great Britain to the Southern Confederacy. Next to the Yankees, the present Administration of England is our worst enemy on earth. We make no exception of Russia: for Russia, while she holds to the same principle of neutrality as England, and candidly confesses that she would like to see the old Union restored, renders no material aid and comfort to the Yankees. If she had given them seventy thousand Cossacks, as the British Government has seventy thousand Irishmen, she might then rival England in her practical hostility to the Southern Confederacy. All this, however, should not make us indifferent to the friendship of the best part of the English people. We would rather have their friendship than their enmity. We ought not to return sympathy with contempt. We should show them that we know how to discriminate between them and their Government. They are not responsible for the course of their Ministry towards the Confederate States any more than for their course towards Poland and Italy. Let us prove that the moral sentiment of all civilised mankind is in our favour.'

SKEDADDLERS FROM THE BATTLE-FIELD.—The Philadelphia Age says: 'Within the last few days the number of able-bodied citizens from the army of the Potomac has greatly increased in this city. The side-walks along Chestnut Street are thronged with them. The Provost Guard, instead of hunting up poor and innocent conscripts, would do well to look after these sneaks, whose shoulders are adorned with the straps which they by no means deserve. If the emigration of skedaddlers from the field of battle continues to increase as it has during the last few days, our city will in a very short time again present quite a warlike appearance.'

PATRIOTIC MUNIFICENCE.—The Hon. E. M. Bruce of Kentucky has offered to pay for the tuition of Kentucky soldiers who have lost a leg or an arm, or been otherwise disabled during the war, so that they may be prepared for commercial pursuits on the restoration of peace.

A SCENE IN THE FEDERAL CONGRESS.—In the Federal House of Representatives on May 19, Mr. Mallory (Kentucky) charged Mr. Julian (Indiana) with inserting in the Congressional reports a statement that he had not made; a charge which was not sustained on a reference to the reporter's notes. The members charged each other with lying, and a very riotous scene ensued. In the course of the discussion Mr. Julian called his opponent 'a blackguard, a ruffian, and a coward.'

DR. LE VERT has lately died in Mobile. His father accompanied General Lafayette to America as an army surgeon.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

THE INDEX was established in May 1862, in the darkest hour of Confederate fortunes, by earnest friends of Southern Independence, with the distinctly expressed object of being the representative, in English journalism, of a gallant and struggling people appealing to the world not only for political, but still more for moral recognition. Since accepting this great trust, THE INDEX has unceasingly laboured, by the combined aid of English and of Southern writers, to enlarge and extend the common ground upon which two nations may cordially meet, which need only to understand each other in order to cherish the warmest mutual appreciation and lasting friendship. The chief and almost the sole difficulty has been, and is still, the callous indifference of the British Government on the one hand, and, on the other, the perplexity, to the European mind, of the unsolved and unprecedented problems involved in the management and education of four millions of the African race, intermingled with a population of the highest Caucasian type. This difficulty could be met only by a liberal fairness to every shade of honest opinion, by an inflexible adherence to truth under all circumstances, and by a bold avowal of convictions, even though ill received. THE INDEX does not claim to be neutral, but it claims to be independent in the highest sense of that word. It is because it must reflect and appeal to, at one and the same time, the public opinion of two countries as yet only imperfectly acquainted, that this somewhat unusual self-description is called for.

Thanks to arrangements now in successful operation, by which the Letters of regular Correspondents and Newspapers from all parts of the Confederate States are received within from twenty-five to thirty days from their date, THE INDEX is always enabled to present the very Latest Direct News from the South, as well as a faithful reflex of the tone and spirit of the Southern Press.

All communications intended for publication should invariably be addressed to 'the Editor of THE INDEX, 13 Bouverie Street, E.C.,' and unless authenticated by a responsible name, can receive no attention.

Advertisements should be sent and Money Orders made payable to J. B. HOPKINS, INDEX Office.

Grant's Strategy.

IT is curious to note the persistency with which the Federal organs in this country cling to their belief in General GRANT. 'Wanted, a General' has been a cry in the North since the war began, and nothing has more clearly proved the utter want of generalship amongst the Federals than the absurd panegyrics they have heaped upon every leader of their armies from M'CLELLAN to POPE, and BURNSIDE to GRANT. At the latest date, all New York was in a state of triumphant anticipation, because the last-named General had found out, after fourteen days more or less of fighting and the loss of 30,000 men, that LEE'S position at Spottsylvania Court House was impregnable. The most brilliant movement of the war had begun, and GRANT with masterly strategy had 'flanked' the Confederate army, and nullified all LEE'S dispositions. It never occurred to the unsophisticated Yankees that GRANT'S flank movement was a fortnight too late for his reputation; and that, if it was expedient at the end of the month of May, it would have been ten times more advisable at the beginning. Nor does it seem to have detracted from their notions of generalship, that day after day GRANT sent up his troops to be slaughtered by an invisible enemy, when any leader with the slightest pretension to military knowledge would have recognised the impossibility of carrying the Confederate entrenchments, and would at least have made his flank movement with his whole force, instead of sacrificing a division to what the Yankees call his 'bull-dog tenacity.'

It is impossible to write with any certainty on the recent operations of the two armies. Southern reports are rigorously excluded from the Northern press. The correspondents of New York papers are constrained to write either what is flattering to the pride of the mob, or convenient for the interests of the LINCOLN Administration. But, without any great accuracy of detail, and drawing our conclusions solely from the Federal press, we do not hesitate to say that the latest intelligence proves very clearly that GRANT'S original plan of campaign has utterly failed; that he has been outfought and outmanœuvred in his direct advance upon Richmond; and that he has substituted for the bold programme which, a week or two ago, elicited such extraordinary praise, a line of operations savouring far more of the prudence of M'CLELLAN. We do not blame General GRANT for this change. He has made it not a moment too soon. He might have hammered away at the entrenchments of Spottsylvania Court House all the summer. We had almost hoped, from his confident declaration of adhesion to that particular line, that he was really intent upon the destruction of the last brigade of the Federal army. It says something for him that at the eleventh hour he is not ashamed to acknowledge his mistake.

But all that is known up to the present moment is that GRANT has changed his programme. He has retired from the front of the Confederate position at Spottsylvania Court House. What his further movements have been, the New York press does not inform us. Mr. STANTON is silent. We hear from unofficial sources of an advance to Guiney's station on the Fredericksburg and Richmond Railroad, and thence to Bowling Green. Then it would appear that GRANT, having made this eastward détour, has suddenly struck the railroad again, and is advancing along the line upon Saxton's Junction. One correspondent describes LEE in a strong position in front of GRANT, defending the junction; another announces that the Confederate General is in full retreat upon Richmond; a third states positively that GRANT is ahead in the race to the Confederate capital, and LEE in pursuit. But there are one or two suspicious circumstances connected with the flank movement of General GRANT, which it is worth while to notice. In the first place it is highly significant that GRANT has changed his base and depôt of supplies. Fredericksburg and Acquia Creek are abandoned, and some new point on the Rappahannock has been selected. Now if GRANT were moving directly along the Fredericksburg railroad, obviously the shortest and most convenient line for the transport of supplies would be the railroad. An army that could not keep twenty-five miles of railroad communication open is scarcely the army to undertake a very formidable movement into an enemy's country. Yet the abandonment of Fredericksburg is a confession of this weakness. GRANT is compelled to forego the direct line and to trust to cross-country roads for his supplies in order to insure their safety from Confederate cavalry. In the second place, we have up to this day received no definite accounts of EWELL'S flank attack on GRANT'S train. Had this anything to do with GRANT'S sudden determination of changing his base? and were his supplies already intercepted when he began his march eastward? In short, is GRANT'S altered programme designed with a view to capture Richmond or to save the Federal army? A few days will relieve us of the uncertainty. But for the present we are inclined to believe that GRANT is in far more jeopardy than LEE.

There are already rumours that the Federal commander is making for the Peninsula; that is to say, after losing 70,000 men, he means to begin with a crippled army the campaign which M'CLELLAN commenced two years ago and brought to a disastrous conclusion on the James river. A change of base is a favourite metaphor in the North for actual defeat, and possibly GRANT may have decided to keep the hopes of the North alive by retiring to some point where he may be able to talk of a further advance upon Richmond, and to feel safe under the protection of his gunboats. But we fancy that even the North will hardly be taken in by this pretence. There are, however, only two alternatives. GRANT must either fight LEE on ground of the Confederate General's choice, and repeat the bloody repulses of Spottsylvania Court House, or continue his flank movements day after day, and so find himself eventually somewhere about the line which M'CLELLAN took up in 1862. We venture upon no predictions, although events thus far have not disappointed our anticipations; but no one can watch the terrible suspense of the North, and its sensitiveness to every rumour, without coming to the conclusion that its every hope is set upon GRANT'S advance, and that it fears the worst. And even if there were no rumours of disasters to the army of the Potomac and of the destruction of BUTLER'S forces, there would be ample justification in the latest intelligence from Virginia for the agony of fear which dictates Mr. STANTON'S official despatches, and which marks the receipt of every fresh item of intelligence from Virginia with an increased premium on gold.

The Censorship in New York.

IMITATION is the sincerest flattery; but it would seem to be flattery of too delicate a character for the appreciation of Mr. LINCOLN'S Secretary of State. An unfortunate gentleman of New Jersey, a sincere Republican and a profound admirer of Mr. SEWARD, has just learned to his cost that the First Minister of the United States is not gifted with that subtlety of taste and apprehension which would enable him to discern the compliment veiled in a close copy of his own most remarkable achievements, and that those who pay him the delicate attention of taking him for their example and pattern in matters of morality and their master in the arts of diplomatic and speculative manœuvring, may, instead of earning his gratitude, fall under his severest displeasure. The unlucky offender had concerned himself in gold speculations. He is, as we have said, a loyal Republican, and no doubt believes in his inmost heart that greenbacks are quite as valuable as gold, and that nothing but the reconstruction of the Union is needed to bring them back to their nominal price, or even to raise them to a premium. But, aware that there are in New York many persons of a less confiding temper, who believe in gold more earnestly than in the Union, and have more regard to profit than to patriotism, he could not resist the temptation to make money at their expense. He took to buying gold when it was cheap and selling it when it was dear, knowing, of course, that if he could get two greenback dollars for one silver, the time would come when the rebellion would be crushed, and his two bits of paper would be worth as much as two metallic dollars. In this conviction he 'speculated for the rise;' and, emboldened by the manœuvres which he had seen practised by the chiefs of his party, not merely with impunity but with advantage, he laid a little plot whereby he might at once enrich himself and inflict a deserved punishment on the wretches whose disloyal distrust of the best and most enlightened Government on earth caused gold to rise on the receipt of any news that seemed to augur temporary misfortune to the Federal cause. He wrote, in the name of Mr. LINCOLN, a short proclamation announcing what, if not exactly true, was nevertheless not very far from the truth—that the campaign in Virginia was virtually closed, and that, to continue the war and crush out the rebellion, a new draft of 400,000 men would be required. This he wrote on the 'manifold' paper employed by the office of the 'Associated Press' in its despatches to the various newspapers, and sent it round to them. He skilfully chose his time, and forwarded the fictitious document at an hour when the editors were gone home to bed, and the papers were on the point of going to press. The scheme was admirably devised: it failed, as we shall see, only by an accident which could hardly have been anticipated; and the plotter, if he did not make as much by the trick as he had hoped, expected, doubtless, to receive credit for his smartness, and felicitated himself on the gratification which Mr. SEWARD would feel at finding that a devoted partisan had made so ingenious a use of the art in which the State Department at Washington has achieved so many masterpieces.

The unhappy artist was unaware that the process was copyright. To his utter consternation, he learned that orders had been straightway despatched from Washington for his arrest, and that his innocent stratagem was to be punished by the Government of the free and enlightened North almost as severely as it would have been punished in enslaved and benighted England. Dismayed, confused, thunderstruck by this wholly unexpected blow, he was easily discovered, arrested, and carried off to Fort Lafayette, there to meditate at leisure on the perils that environ those who ape the arts of despotic Ministers, and take in vain the august name of ABRAHAM LINCOLN. We pity the poor fellow's perplexity, as he ponders in his prison over the error into which he has unwittingly fallen. What has he done? Why has he been punished for doing that which the Federal Government has done on former occasions, and which has brought credit and distinction to more than one ingenious imitator of other men's caligraphy? Is forgery protected by a Federal patent which he has unwittingly infringed? Is it lawful to forge the name of a Confederate Minister, and only unlawful to take a similar liberty with the name of a Yankee President? Or is the use of such arts confined of right to diplomacy, and forbidden to the Stock Exchange? It is not so long since, as Mr. SEWARD informed the British Government, a gentleman of Republican principles forged an important document, which took in not only a few Wall Street speculators, but two Governments and their respective ambassadors. The forgery was quoted in diplomatic despatches, and made the theme of solemn remonstrances, and its detection had the effect of placing the Federal Government in an exceedingly humiliating position, and subjecting it to very serious and disgraceful suspicions. And yet no step was ever taken to punish the author of that fraud; nay, more, rumour confidently asserted that he had been only the tool and instrument of the great man who holds the keys of Fort Lafayette, and sends citizens to prison, at a distance of a thousand miles, by touching a bell in his cabinet. It was the recollection of this successful, useful, and honoured fraud that prompted the humble imitation of Mr. HOWARD; and certainly it seems hard that the imitator should be arrested as a traitor, while the original enjoys the reward of his smartness in peace and liberty.

But others have been still more harshly treated than Mr. HOWARD. Among the journals to which the forged proclamation was sent were two of the most respectable journals in New York—the World and the Journal of Commerce. They happened, unluckily for themselves, to be the only journals which contained the proclamation. But this was the merest accident. By some chance the document did not reach the office of the Tribune. Perhaps the forger thought it safest not to send it; perhaps, as the Tribune itself suggests, the editorial office being shut, the messenger did not know his way to the printing-room. Some of the other papers, recciving the proclamation, had in their employ printers of an enquiring turn of mind, who recognised in the style of the proclamation another hand than Mr. LINCOLN's. The forger had done his best; but it is so difficult for an educated man to imitate the slovenly phraseology and slipshod grammar of Mr. LINCOLN, that his speech betrayed him. The grammar was too accurate, the language too correct, to have come from the Chief Magistrate of the United States. Mr. HOWARD wrote in English; Mr. LINCOLN is not acquainted with that language, but employs, both in conversation and in writing, the dialect of American current in the North-Western States. Suspicion thus awakened, reference was made to other offices; the absence of the document from the Tribune office was discovered, and the forgery was suppressed. But this suppression cost one paper the destruction of more than half its daily edition, and was barely accomplished in time to save other newspapers from sharing the error of the two we have mentioned. By the time the editors made their appearance in the morning, the blunder was known, and it was immediately corrected. The forgery was acknowledged, and a reward advertised for the detection of the offender. Meantime the telegraph had been busy. It took up to Washington the news of the appearance of a strange proclamation bearing Mr. LINCOLN's signature; and it brought down orders to arrest the editors, send them to Fort Lafayette, and suppress their papers. The first order was suspended; the second was put into immediate execution; and for the future Opposition journals in New York must keep a responsible editor to sit up all night, and take care that no doubtful matter finds its way into the paper in the hurry of the last moments, if they would be secure against forfeiture.

It is true that, after a few days, the soldiery who had been put in possession of the offices were withdrawn, and the publication of the papers once more permitted. But, for all this, the injury inflicted on the proprietors has been very serious. Those who know anything of journalism know that a newspaper proprietor would rather pay a fine of several thousand pounds than suspend the issue of his paper for a single day; and, had the journals seized been less powerful and popular than they are, such a suspension might have entailed their absolute destruction.

We need hardly waste words upon the moral and political character of this exertion of arbitrary power. It is plain that there was not the slightest pretence for the persecution of the two journals. They are among the most respectable members of the American press. In this particular instance their fault was altogether involuntary; and it is quite plain that the publication of the spurious proclamation was only the pretext for their seizure. At the same time, or nearly so, another journal was seized at Baltimore for an article in which it ventured to estimate the losses of GRANT in Virginia at 70,000 men—an exaggeration, no doubt, but a fair deduction from the comparison of his avowed losses with those confessed on previous occasions, when subsequent investigations have doubled the number originally acknowledged. It is evident that the Federal Government intended to rid itself of two dangerous opponents in the press—the more dangerous from their high character and moderation—that it seized what seemed a favourable opportunity of crushing them without provoking an outbreak of public indignation, and has retracted its edict on finding that public sympathy with the victims was too strong to be safely disregarded. Mr. SEWARD is recovering courage, and returning to the arbitrary practices which were suspended when the result of the elections in 1863 manifested a feeling decidedly adverse to the LINCOLN Administration; seizures of newspapers will be followed as before by the imprisonment of writers, orators, and politicians, and Federal bastiles will soon be as full as ever of the leading men of the Democratic party, unless the indignation expressed at this initial outrage should be sufficiently vigorous and well sustained to teach the Government that the experiment might cost it too dear. The utter contempt of law, the insolent and open disregard of even the shadow of legal forms and pretences, the naked and violent exercise of military force, which have marked the proceedings of the Administration, are highly significant symptoms of the temper in which Mr. LINCOLN and his advisers, even while the Presidential contest is approaching, are disposed to deal with the rights and liberties of the States. Before an energetic and well-marked expression of popular displeasure, no doubt, they would quail and retrace their steps; but if they find the road of tyranny a tolerably safe one, it is evident that their progress will be rapid and unhesitating.

Roused at last to a sense of public duty, Governor SEYMOUR has instructed the District Attorney to prosecute the agents of the Federal Government in this outrage on the laws and liberties of New York; and no doubt, if the Federal Government do not think it expedient to interfere by force, a verdict of guilty may be returned, and judgment passed upon them. But there is little likelihood that Governor SEYMOUR will carry his assertion of the rights and dignity of the State so far as to arrest and punish, in execution of a judicial sentence, men protected by the commission and by the military forces of President LINCOLN. If he should attempt to do so, matters will be brought to an issue between the law and the Government, between the inherent authority of the States and the usurped ascendency of the Federal power; and the crisis at which they have now arrived will be more evident than it has hitherto been to the people of the North. But, even in that case, we have little hope that they will be induced to hesitate in the course which they have hitherto pursued so eagerly. They will, as others have done before them, rather sacrifice their own liberty than abandon their hope of crushing out the liberty of their neighbours; and if they are to be converted from that determination, it must be by the sword of Southern chivalry, and not by the scourge of Executive tyranny—a scourge which falls only on those who have learned to value freedom, and which, while it punishes the resistance of the minority, gratifies the vindictive passions of the many. Acts of oppression and injustice perpetrated on the Democrats are acts of indulgence to the fanatical Republicans; and so far from repenting the enterprise which brings such outrages in its train, they regard it as one of the chief advantages of the war, that, while wreaking their hatred on their enemies abroad, it affords them excuse and opportunity for persecuting their adversaries at home. This is the spirit that ever precedes the enslavement of free nations; and no power runs so fast and so surely to tyranny as that which owes its origin to the vindictiveness of a faction, and its consolidation to the crimes and the passions of civil war.

Counting the Cost.

THE terrible results of the war have enforced reflection even upon those who were at first its most ardent and hopeful advocates. Men who entered upon it in the hope of speedy and complete conquest, in the belief that the Southerners would be brought to submission by a few disasters, or that, at worst, the superior numbers of the North would speedily overpower the defenders of Virginia, and that the fall of the Confederate capital would close the struggle, and who have gone on from step to step, from levy to levy, from campaign to campaign, in the expectation of a decisive blow, are beginning to understand that no blow could possibly be decisive; that every inch of ground that is to be won must be wrested from the South at the bayonet's point; that States may be overrun and towns captured without affecting in the least the coherence or the resolution of the Confederacy; that each captured town must be held by a Federal garrison, and that each conquered State, the instant that the invading army is withdrawn, resumes its allegiance to the Confederacy; that so long as one State is left uncrushed that State will resist, and that while one city remains in the possession of the South that city will be the rallying point of Southern nationality. The North expected to engage in a war of peculiarly easy accomplishment; imagining that the looseness of a newly-formed confederate tie would enable them to break up with ease the union of the South, and that all that was required to crush the 'rebellion' was such a disaster as might convince the 'rebels' of their inferiority in power. These expectations have been entirely reversed by the event; the Confederacy has held together with truly national cohesion, while the nature of the country, political as well as geographical, deprives the enemy of that advantage which an invader enjoys in older and consolidated States, where there is a vulnerable centre, a vital point, which once pierced the power of resistance is paralysed. At first no one dreamed that the North could have anything to apprehend or to suffer by the war; now, men are beginning to look round them, and to reckon the sacrifices they have made and compute the costs they have incurred, and the results of the calculation appear not a little alarming. Even now the majority have not begun to appreciate their position, its actual evils, or its imminent dangers; and the cry for a vigorous prosecution of the war is almost as popular and as reckless as ever. But there are signs that those who are capable of reflection are beginning to ask themselves how far and to what end they are prepared to go; and even the fanatics who will not hear of any relaxation of the struggle, or any modification of Northern pretensions, are, if they retain the faculty of reason, somewhat appalled by their own answers to these questions. They feel that they have already paid a terrible price for the indulgence of unreasoning passion and insensate animosity, and that, if they are still to pursue any end which even to them can seem commensurate with the magnitude of the losses they have suffered and the risks they incur, they must be prepared to sacrifice all that remains to them of liberty, prosperity, or national greatness. Fanatics, of course, are willing to sacrifice anything to their idol; but when once they venture fairly to announce to a nation the extent of their demands upon its endurance, they generally find common sense too strong for them. And the Yankees must be the wildest and most irrational of all nations if they are not somewhat staggered by the frankness with which the great leader of the Abolitionists announces the price to be paid for the emancipation of the negroes, and calls upon them to pay it.

As an Abolitionist, Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS rejoices not merely in the war, but in its protraction and its disasters. He does not anticipate the emancipation of the negro as a result of Northern victories: in the negro's interest he regards those victories as misfortunes. So far, and through a considerable portion of his speech, we are in accord with the orator. The negro has nothing to expect from Northern conquerors but a slavery infinitely harder than anything that exists in Cuba or did exist in Jamaica. Wherever the Yankee has come, the negro has perished. He has been torn from the home where he was well clothed and well lodged, abundantly fed and carefully provided. He has been sold at a few dollars a head to Yankee speculators, who have worked him to death in a few weeks; he has been doomed to prowl about the purlieus of the camp, living on foul offal and dying of strange diseases; and, in his helpless misery, he has vainly implored his captors to rid him of this liberty—liberty to starve and suffer—and restore him to the master whom he loved, and who cared and provided for him. Since this war broke out the Yankees may have captured some 200,000 negroes. We have reason to believe that one-half of these are dead. In the worst days of Rome, in the palmiest days of the slave-trade, slaves were never treated so ill and never died half so fast as under the protection of Northern Abolitionists. Well may Mr. PHILLIPS say that if he were a negro 'he would dread every victory on the part of the North.' It is not by Northern victories that, in his opinion, the slaves are to be delivered. The war is to set them free by a slower, surer, and more terrible process. 'It is performing exactly the work which war did in South America; it is taking the rivets out of society; it is crumbling up the whole social and civil life into its original elements, and when that work is completely done, no matter what the form of government be that comes on, the negro is always free.' It is to the dissolution of society, not to the reconstruction of the Union, that Abolitionists are bidden to look for the accomplishment of their darling object. The States are to sink into the condition of Mexico or Nicaragua, to be the prey of continual anarchy and chronic civil war, to be without order, without government, without security for life and property, in order that out of this chaos may arise the independence of the negro. Such is the prospect to which Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS deliberately directs the hopes of his friends: he deprecates peace, he even deprecates victory, lest they should avert that total, all-subverting ruin by which the slave is to be set free. Perish the Union, so that the negro be emancipated: exterminate the Southern people, level their cities to the ground, ravage their lands, close up their ports, make of their rich country a howling wilderness, in order to provide a fit home for four millions of freedmen. What matter if for this end we sacrifice everything that has made Americans proud of their country and has attracted to her shores the poor and the discontented from all quarters of the world—liberty, wealth, security for life and property, everything that makes a nation great and happy? All this is a lesser evil than to acknowledge the independence of the South—a trifling price to pay for the final abolition of negro slavery.

So speaks Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS in his character of uncompromising Abolitionist. There are few of his countrymen to whom the picture which he draws will be agreeable, or who will derive much consolation from the beatific vision of starving but liberated negroes dancing around the ruins of American prosperity. And, indeed, when Mr. PHILLIPS himself lays aside the garb of the enthusiast, and descends to the level of statesmen and men of the world, it is evident that he himself has terrible misgivings. He cannot be always an Abolitionist orator; he must now and then remember that he is a man and a citizen; and neither his personal nor his patriotic feelings are altogether gratified by the prophetic vision that seemed so charming to his imagination while rapt in the trance of fanaticism. When he descends to speak of facts and figures, and to deal rather with present realities than with future glories, his tone becomes despondent in the extreme. Though speaking in the belief, or pretended belief, of a victory which had no existence but in the fertile imagination of Mr. STANTON, his is the language of anxiety and of warning, not of exultation. The emancipation of the negro fades into distance and uncertainty; the ruin and calamity out of which it is to arise are near and real. The liberties, the prosperity, the happiness of the American people are in danger; the very foundations of society are threatened, and the fate which has befallen Mexico and the South American Republics appears to threaten the United States. Mr. PHILLIPS speaks out as frankly as Mr. WOOD or Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, though in a different spirit. He regards the war as a just one, and accepts all the evils that have followed in its train as necessary and inevitable. But he confirms every protest that the Democratic party has uttered against Republican tyranny and 'revolutionary energy;' and he sees, in the necessities of a war waged for conquest and protracted for years at enormous cost and with varying fortunes, perils which threaten to overwhelm the freedom and well-being of the North under the combined weight of debt and despotism. When the war is over, seven or eight hundred thousand men (an exaggerated estimate, but the truth is formidable enough), unfitted for civil life by long service in the field, will be thrown loose upon society, ready for mischief, hard to be restrained by law, ready tools of criminal ambition, and the perpetual nucleus of anarchy, disturbance, or civil war. The element that has contributed so largely to the ruin of the Spanish colonies – a lawless disbanded soldiery—will be present in full force in the United States; and what security can there be that it will not be used there as it has been used elsewhere? The Government has been habituated to exercise despotic power, and, which is much worse, the people have learned to endure it. Is there any certainty that either will be able or willing to resume at once the habits and principles which are the life of republican institutions, and to pass at once from martial despotism to peace and civil freedom? And if these perils should be safely overcome, there are dangers behind from which Mr. PHILLIPS at least can see no escape. Hitherto an immunity from taxation, which has fostered the growth of capital and the prosperity of labour, has been one of the chief blessings of America. But she will no longer be a lightly-taxed country. If this year should end the war, how would her national accounts stand? She would owe more than half as much as England, and she would have to pay nearly twice as high an interest upon it. She would have to keep a standing army of considerable force in order to maintain her authority in the disaffected States. These two demands, springing out of this struggle—the legacies of this great war—will form a mortgage on the capital and labour of the future, reducing the profits of both, and curtailing that rapid increase of wealth which has provided constantly enhanced comforts for a population augmented at an incredible rate; and generations yet unborn will have to defray the cost and endure the consequences of a war begun in the greed of conquest and prolonged by the lust of revenge.

Even so bitter an enemy as Mr. PHILLIPS has learned at last to do reluctant justice to the courage and resolution of the South. He recognises the determination of the Confederates to defend with the last drop of their blood the sanctity of their homes and the honour of their country, and he understands that the defeat of General LEE, and even the capture of Richmond, would utterly fail to bring the victors any nearer to the accomplishment of their hopes. He is prepared for many battles and a long-protracted conflict—prepared, nay resolute, to carry the war from post to post, and from State to State, till the last army of the Confederacy is destroyed on the last league of territory that the South shall retain. In order to carry on such a struggle, he is ready to accumulate a debt which, as he himself declares, will fetter the industry and mortgage the income of unborn generations—ready to endure a despotism which, as he says, has not its parallel on this side of the wall of China. We recommend his speech to the notice of his countrymen, who, while they can hardly reject his testimony to the character and costliness of the struggle they are maintaining, may probably differ with him in regard to the adequacy of the object. To forego the Union for ever—to let the South go in peace with the honours of victory after so long and desperate a contest—would doubtless be a sore trial for the vanity of the Northern people. They would spend much blood and much treasure rather than make so painful a sacrifice. But there is a limit to the endurance of which a people fighting, not for existence, but for conquest, is capable; and we presume that the North would be unwilling, for the sake of extending the Union to its former limits, to risk the inauguration of a universal despotism, and the reduction of the whole country to a condition of almost Mexican wretchedness and anarchy. In frankly telling them what the prosecution of the war involves, and what may be expected from it, Mr. PHILLIPS has rendered a service to his compatriots; but we scarcely think that he has, as he intended, furthered the cause of his party. Those who read his speech will take it as a warning, not an encouragement, and his exhortation to unlimited sacrifices will rather serve to cool their frenzy than to fan their fervour. Instead of agreeing with him that two partners who cannot live together must fight till one or both be destroyed, his hearers are likely to ask themselves whether the objections to an amicable separation are altogether insuperable; and whether, if the eagle and the fish cannot inhabit the same element, the simplest and safest plan would not be to sever the bonds that enforce so unnatural a union. Intended as an exhortation to implacable war, the speech will be read as an argument for the necessity of peace; and, instead of accepting its conclusion that the white race must be sacrificed to the emancipation of the black, those who remember the recent revelations from the Mississippi valley will draw the inference that nothing but a frank and immediate abandonment of that chimera can save either race from destruction.

THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT AND THE WAR IN AMERICA.—The Paris correspondent of The Times wrote on Friday last: 'I hear that two delegates—one civil, the other military—have been sent by the French Government to America, for the purpose of ascertaining by personal inspection the real state and prospects of the belligerents, and to report thereon to the Emperor. It is also stated that overtures have been again made on the part of France to the English Government with a view to devise some means of putting a stop to the frightful and useless carnage between Federals and Confederates. I do not say that these overtures have been made through the usual official channels, but I have some reason to believe that the main fact is correct. What reception they have met with, I cannot say.'

THE CROP PROSPECTS IN THE UNITED STATES.—The New York Daily Bank of May 21 observes: 'We notice, from our Western exchanges, that the prospects of this year's crops are very discouraging. The severity of the winter has killed a great portion of the winter wheat. Fields, it is said, that ought to produce fifteen bushels to the acre, will not produce two bushels. The spring, too, has been very backward. The want of labour is another serious drawback. Thousands and thousands of men have been withdrawn from the productive forces of the country, and the inevitable result must be a scarcity.'

THE CROPS IN THE CONFEDERATE STATES.—The Richmond Whig of May 5 says: 'The country is full of wheat, while we think the product in Georgia is likely to be double what it was in 1863. We can already see the signs of an accumulating surplus of old wheat.'

THE FORGED PROCLAMATION.

As the proceedings of the Lincoln Government have made the forged proclamation so notorious, we deem the document sufficiently curious to merit publication in our columns:—

Executive Mansion, May 17, 1864.

Fellow Citizens of the United States:

In all seasons of extraordinary dangers a nation carefully to scrutinise its line of conduct, humbly to approach the Throne of Grace, and meekly to implore forgiveness, wisdom and guidance.

For years as known only to Him, it has been decreed that this country should be the scene of unparalleled carnage, and this nation the monumental sufferer of the 19th century. With a heavy heart, but an undiminished confidence in our cause, I approach the performance of a duty rendered imperative by my constant weakness before the Almighty, and of justice to the people.

It is not necessary that I should tell you that the first campaign under Lieutenant-General Grant, in whom I have every confidence, and whose courage and fidelity the people do well to honour, is virtually closed. He has conducted his great enterprise with discreet ability. He has inflicted great loss upon the enemy. He has crippled their strength, and defeated their plans.

In view, however, of the situation in Virginia, the disaster at Red River, the delay at Charleston, and the general state of the country, I, Abraham Lincoln, do hereby recommend that Thursday, the twenty-sixth day of May, A.D. 1864, be solemnly set apart throughout these United States as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer. Deeming, furthermore, that the present condition of public affairs presents an extraordinary occasion, and in view of the pending expiration of the service of (100,000) one hundred thousand of our troops, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, by virtue of the power vested in me by the constitution and the laws, have thought fit to call forth, and hereby do call forth, the citizens of the United States, between the ages of (18) eighteen and (45) forty-five years, to the aggregate number of (400,000) four hundred thousand, in order to suppress the existing rebellious combinations, and to cause the due execution of the laws.

And furthermore, in case any State or number of States shall fail to furnish by the 15th day of June next their assigned quotas, it is hereby ordered that the same be raised by an immediate and peremptory draft.

The details for this object will be communicated to the State authorities through the War Department.

I appeal to all loyal citizens to favour, facilitate, and aid this effort to maintain the honour, the integrity, and the existence of our national Union, and the perpetuity of popular government.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this seventeenth day of May, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four, and of the independence of the States the eighty-eighth.

(Signed) ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President:
William H. Seward.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

NEW YORK: May 24, 1864.

THE SITUATION IN VIRGINIA—GENERAL SHERMAN'S EXPEDITION—DEFEAT OF SIGEL—A SKETCH OF SIGEL'S MILITARY CAREER—THE POSITION OF BUTLER—THE 'GOOD NEWS' FROM LOUISIANA—THE SHELLING OF CHARLESTON AND YANKEE MALICE—LESS CONFIDENCE FELT IN GRANT—THE SUPPRESSION OF THE 'WORLD' AND 'JOURNAL OF COMMERCE'—THE CASE OF COLONEL ARQUELLES—OPPOSITION TO THE DESPOTIC ACTS OF THE LINCOLN GOVERNMENT.

ANOTHER week has passed, and Grant is as far as ever from taking Richmond. From some reported changes in the lines of General Lee, it is possible that the Federal army may be topographically nearer—as the crow flies—to the Confederate capital: but the prospect for capturing it has receded indefinitely, even to the vision of sanguine army correspondents and vaunting Cabinet Ministers. The letters from Washington and from the battle-field begin to talk ominously of the unexpected largeness of the Confederate army, their discipline, and desperate bravery, and the immense strength of the fortified lines of defences which lie between the invading armies and Richmond. Of course the doomed city is to be taken, if it has to be reached over the innumerable corpses which the prodigal North can afford to expend in order to accomplish its object; but the coveted prize is still afar off, and the way to it confessed to be a hard and heavy one. Even the bulletins of Secretary Stanton are getting to be quite tame; and President Lincoln would, without doubt, be right glad if somebody could succeed in persuading the public that his jubilant recommendation of a national Te Deum for the victories of Grant was a forgery. Gold, which stood at about 172-3 when Grant crossed the Rapidan, has been at 182-3, and is this day, at noon, at 185. The national credit has been sinking at that rate since the campaign commenced on the success of which the Secretary of the Treasury publicly based his only hope for the repairing of the finances.

The only apparent success which has attended the operations of any of the various columns of the Federals advanced simultaneously, in all quarters, against the strong points of the Confederacy is that of General Sherman's army from Chattanooga into Northern Georgia. There has been a good deal of fighting there, and the army of General Joe Johnston has given up, or been driven from, positions which were supposed to be very strong, and has fallen back towards Atlanta. I should be more uneasy on this score—because the possession of Atlanta is of vast importance to the Confederacy, and to lose it would be a very great disaster—if I did not know that Johnston has a very fine army, and his capacity and his caution are so relied upon, that the advance of Sherman does not appear to give any alarm at Richmond. They believe that he will in good time be driven back, or held there until he is powerless. The other two branches of Grant's combinations have come to trouble. Sigel, who was to descend the valley of the Shenandoah, has been encountered, and defeated ignominiously and disastrously. Franz Sigel is the favourite general of the German soldiers, and the Administration has done a good many not very creditable things for him in order to conciliate them. Among other stories is one for which I am indebted to a Union officer, who spoke as if of his own knowledge of the truth; and the transaction is so illustrative of the military and political management of 'honest' Mr. Lincoln, that I will repeat it here as an episode. In one of the early battles of the war in Missouri, where Sigel held a command, the Federals suffered a defeat, and the officers under Sigel attributed it to his incompetency and, they do say, his positive cowardice. When the troops were rallied, they refused to be commanded by Sigel, and selected for their leader an experienced army officer, who conducted their retreat successfully. There were of course charges and counter-charges. The officers arraigned General Sigel for imbecility and misconduct, and Sigel arraigned his successor for insubordination. Both parties hurried to Washington. What transpired between Sigel and the President I never heard, but what occurred between the President and the insubordinate, whom I shall call Major S—, has been told and retold, and is universally believed. Major S— waited upon the President, and, on being announced, was astonished by being greeted thus:—'I am very glad to see you, General S—.' 'Thank you, Mr. President, but you are mistaken—only Major S—, not General S—, at your service.' 'Not at all,' replied the smiling chief; 'I mean General S—; you are General from this day, but this matter must be dropped between you and our friend Sigel. We can't afford to offend the German interest!' Accordingly the Major became a General, and a valuable officer he is, and Sigel went back to another command. He proved unfortunate again, and was out of employ, to the great indignation of the 'German element;' and it became quite threatening when the joint resolution was brought into Congress for dropping unemployed general officers from the army. Yielding to the political necessity, the Administration restored him to active command, and thus he came to lead down the Shenandoah Valley a large army, to execute a duty so simple, and with such a supposed preponderance of force, that it was not imagined that he could commit any great blunder. But he allowed himself to be surprised, suffered a disastrous defeat, and met with such heavy losses as to relieve General Lee from all apprehensions of further trouble from that quarter. The Confederate accounts say that his rout was complete, and Sigel himself among the foremost of the fugitives, but the 'German element' is too strong to allow such a thing to be said with the assent of the Government at the North. It was obliged to remove him from the command, and General Hunter, who did nothing with so much vigour in South Carolina, has been appointed to succeed him. But this unavoidable necessity has occasioned Mr. Lincoln a good deal of trouble, and threatens him with further damage among the German Radicals, who are going into the campaign to defeat his re-election to the Presidency with another grievance in his treatment of Sigel. The removal is to lay to the repairing of the loss to Grant's operations of this co-operating movement. Butler, on the south side of the James River, is a little better off than Sigel, but not much. He has been badly beaten by Beauregard, and holds himself within his entrenchments, with now and then an exulting bulletin that he is safe. There are gunboats near, upon which he can take refuge in the last extremity, if it be necessary to secure his person from capture by Beauregard, but he issues no more flaming announcements that he can enter Richmond when he pleases. If he ever gets there, it will probably be because he can't help it, being carried there against his will. The disappointment at the flatness of his failure, after his magnificent manifestos of last week, has set even some of the most rabid of the Radicals to grumbling against Butler's military inefficiency; and the men who really think military capacity to be a necessary quality in a general, for which ferocious cruelty and insatiable rapacity are not adequate substitutes, are talking about the duty of the Administration to remove him.

Secretary Stanton has telegraphed what is called good news from the Red River in Louisiana. It is to the effect that, by damming up the river below the falls of Alexandria, General Banks has succeeded in floating his gunboats over, and that he has thus been enabled to make his escape, with the remnants of his army, to the Mississippi River, and get back to New Orleans. It is also said to be 'good news' that General Steele did not surrender his army in Arkansas when repulsed, and that he is likely to be able to make his way also to the Mississippi River. It is really great news for the Confederates that this magnificent expedition, which was heralded as marching onward in two irresistible columns to overrun Western Louisiana, occupy Texas, and frown down the Mexican Empire from the American borders of the Rio Grande, should be hunted back to the Mississippi, in straggling bands, by the triumphant Confederates, and the hope of their safety be welcomed with thanksgiving.

It ought to be noted, as another in the series of devastations which mark the track of Federal armies and light up their retreats, that the Federal accounts of the retreat of General Banks from Alexandria record that he left the city in flames.

The only other records of Northern achievements of late are the notices, every few days, of the throwing of shells, in mere wantonness, into the city of Charleston. This is not in the progress of an assault, or with any view of improving the chance of capturing the city. It is mere malicious warfare on the non-combatant inhabitants, the women and children, such as the moral sentiment of the times pronounces to be mere barbarity, but which seems to delight the Northern reader as the proper way of dealing with rebels. There have been some like vauntings of similar raids into Florida and along the southern coasts, in which mills on which the inhabitants depended for food have been burnt, and large quantities of cattle killed or driven off. An object to which particular attention has lately been directed, and in which there is said to have been great success, as there was no armed Confederate force to obstruct the marauders, is the destruction of the private salt works, on which so much of the means of living among the people depends in the South. One of the Federal plans, much relied on to extort the submission of the South, is the starving of their families by the destruction of their crops, the burning of their mills, the killing or stealing of their cattle, and the terrible distress arising from the utter privation of salt.

There has been no time in which the Southern people have felt a more thorough confidence in the success of their arms, or a more abiding faith in the achievement of their independence, than at this time. The omens of the battle-field are propitious. The failure of the first great onset of the immense force which the Federals, after so many months of preparation, hurled upon them, has disappointed and disheartened the North. It has exhilarated and inspirited the South. The confidence in General Lee is unbounded, and the South looks to him as the chief whose sword will marshal the way to certain victory. On the other hand, it is not to be denied that the Federal opinion of the generalship of Grant has been undergoing serious changes. The sanguine multitude expected from him speedy and crushing victories, the immediate occupation of Richmond, and the end of the weary war. He has lost the best part of the finest of their armies, and, piling his dead and wounded in tens of thousands before the impenetrable wall of the Southern army, is still confronted by the same fierce array, and counts on an ultimate success only after a renewal again and again of the same desperate conflicts and the same horrible carnage. Indeed, it is muttered about among the fickle crowd, and quoted as the words of distinguished military men from the battle-fields, that Grant has none of the elements of a great commander, and that his whole theory for reaching Richmond is by pushing superior numbers on the enemy's works, and conquering at last by the mere momentum of the greater mass of the dead he can afford to lose. The utter recklessness with which, in the late series of battles, he sent mass after mass of his soldiers to certain destruction, repeating, on a grander scale, the madness of Burnside at Fredericksburg, broke the confidence of many of his best officers in him, and at the same time shattered his best troops. It will tell hereafter in the lessened efficiency of what remains of his disciplined troops, who alone could have gone up steadily upon such murderous work, and on the newer troops with whom he has been so largely reinforced, who may not be so ready for rushing upon certain destruction. It is very evident that there is a loss of the popular trust in the leadership of Grant, and that experienced military men look with misgivings on the result of the forward movement to which he may be impelled by the same headlong impetuosity of reliance on the brute power of numbers. They know that he has against him the most skilful strategist and ablest soldier of the times, at the head of a splendid army welded together by an enthusiastic devotion to the common cause, and owning the directing soul in the genius of their leader. This is one case at least in which it is found that 'battalions' do not surely win.

The President and Secretary of State have, during these exciting military events, found time to involve themselves in new difficulties, from one of which I see no way for them to escape without political ruin, except in the utter debasement of the people, or by the pusillanimity of their adversaries. They have ventured, with a recklessness which is almost amazing, upon acts of illegal and arbitrary violence which have armed their adversaries with potent weapons of attack, and shocked even their own partisans beyond the capacity of defence.

I do not suppose anybody in England was deceived by the fabrication which two of the city papers unwittingly sent out in the Scotia,* purporting to be a proclamation of the President of the United States appointing a fast-day, and calling for a new levy of a few hundred thousand men to redeem the failure of General Grant's campaign. It had currency here for several hours in the morning, just as canards equally absurd do, any day in the week, to put up the gold market. You are not so impressible abroad as the gold speculators are here. The moment the paper was examined with care, its spuriousness was apparent. However much of truth might be suspected to lie in the estimate placed on the aspect of military affairs, it was clearly impossible that the President had publicly made such despairing confessions. The style of composition was not that of President or Secretary, being a little better than that of either. Its form was that rather of a political address than of an executive document, beginning with 'Fellow-citizens, &c.' In a few hours it was disproved here by the testimony of the regular telegraphic operators that it had not come over the lines, by the United States Provost-Marshal, and by a very emphatic despatch from Mr. Seward pronouncing it a forgery.

* The usual supplies of the World did not come out by the Scotia, the proprietors taking back their bags. The only copies that reached Europe came through private hands.

It was a paltry trick, for which the perpetrators deserved severe punishment for trifling with the public impatience, in serious matters, by misusing the names of persons highest in authority. It might have passed away with the other bubbles of the class to which it belongs, but for the extraordinary folly of the Administration. The Secretary of State immediately magnified it into a presumption of organised plotting against the Government, and used it to excuse an astounding coup d'état against the political enemies of the Administration.

It chanced—some say it was brought about by contrivance—that the spurious proclamation appeared in the columns of only two papers, the World and the Journal of Commerce, both of which, while in no sense recognised as friends or abettors of the South, but rather disliked as among the more really dangerous of its enemies, are outspoken in their condemnation of the policy, principles, and management of the Administration.

The manner in which they were tricked into the publication of the counterfeit proclamation is this:—

There is a common agency of the leading daily papers of New York for the receiving news, by which telegraphic despatches are prepared at an office of the Association, and copies furnished simultaneously to all the morning journals. A person is left in each office to receive and send to the compositors such despatches as may come in after the hour of closing and the retirement of the editors and proprietors for the night. Confiding in their agency, no extraordinary precautions have been thought necessary for the particular scrutinising of despatches coming through the regular channel. In this case, the forger was familiar with the routine of the offices and the business of telegraphing. He had been employed on the daily papers of the city, and was employed at the time on a daily paper in Brooklyn. He was thus able to imitate the exact appearance of the regular despatches in form, and on the peculiar paper used, and, having thus made a facsimile, cause them to be left in the usual way and at the customary hour at all the offices, with the singular and, some think, the suspicious omission of the Tribune. The imposition was, in fact, so perfectly got up in all its external appointments, that, considering no responsible person was appointed to examine the text with an eye of critical suspicion, the wonder is—and ill-natured persons have not done speculating about it—not that it was published by two, but how it came to be omitted by any. The Daily News, the only other morning paper in the city hostile to the Administration, was perhaps more cautious because it knew itself to be closely watched for an opportunity of pouncing down upon it, and therefore made enquiries at the telegraph office, and so escaped the snare. The Herald was nearly caught, and had printed off thousands of copies when the paper was suspected, the press stopped, and that edition suppressed. The World and the Journal of Commerce were not so fortunate, or not so generously warned, and the unconscious proprietors sent out their morning editions with the spurious document. The first feeling in the city was one of consternation; the next would have been that of contemptuous indifference, but for the party malignity which immediately attempted to foment enmity against the two papers which had themselves been most hoaxed, and were really injured in their reputation as reliable journals. These, immediately on discovering the trick, made haste to warn the public as widely as possible, and to make personal exertions and offer large rewards in order to detect the author. They did this before the Government had time to complain, or to put its own stamp on the fraud. The atonement was made, and the clearest proof afforded that whatever of transgression there might be was in perfect good faith, when the Administration ordered the seizure of the offices, the imprisonment of the editors and proprietors, and the suppression of the journals. The order for personal confinement was soon revoked, after remonstrance by some of the partisan friends of the Administration. but files of soldiers took possession of the two establishments, and suppressed the issue of the journals from Wednesday until Monday. In aggravation of the wantonness of these proceedings, the property was refused to be released after the perpetrator of the forgery was detected, and the manner by which he succeeded in making these papers his victims was fully ascertained, and discreet friends of the Administration, including General Dix, who had executed the military part of the affair under orders from Washington, and alarmed politicians who saw in it only a huge political blunder, had urged on the Administration the policy of retracing its steps. The only conceivable motive for persevering in the wrong-doing, against which every political press ventured to utter some degree of remonstrance, must have been the foolish thought of terrifying the opposition press during the coming canvass for the Presidency, on success in which, by the reelection of Mr. Lincoln, the President himself and his Secretary of State are staking all the issues of the day, and straining all the machinery of Government.

It was a mistaken calculation, and for once the Administration overestimated the servility of its supporters, and counted too largely on the tameness of its adversaries. These outrages were too gross and monstrous not to alarm the most subservient for their consequences. The most timid have been goaded into remonstrance, and opposition rears its front once more with a flush of courage in the defence of rights which no person is base enough to confess himself to be willing to resign.

Files of soldiers were marched through the streets of a peaceful city, in contempt of the civil power of a great State, to arrest its citizens on a mere military order, to seize their persons, and sequester their property, and suppress their business. Two public journals were forcibly stopped; an entire telegraphic establishment was taken, on a vague suspicion that it might have been used to circulate the obnoxious paper, and the operators sent to the Government forts. Although subsequently released, by the act of the same capricious power, as innocent of what was imputed to them, the Government retains the surveillance of the wires, and thus secures a system of espionage over all the telegraphic correspondence of the country. The same arbitrary course was extended to the outgoing mails. The mail steamer Scotia was detained several hours in the harbour, while Government detectives overhauled the mails, to take out of them copies of the newspapers which were carrying the spurious proclamation to Europe. It is a grotesque proof of the reality of some part of the panic experienced by the Government, that it should have taken such silly steps to keep from the knowledge of the British people a paper which went out accompanied by such absolute proofs of its spuriousness. In all these violent acts against the rights of property, the sacredness of mails, the freedom of the press, and the liberty of the citizen, the Constitution of the United States, and of the State of New York, were flagrantly outraged, and mere military caprice made paramount over both.

The alarm and resentment which have followed these manifestations of Federal insolence have roused the opposition into something like vigour of tone against the usurpations which have reached to this height of despotic lawlessness. Even Governor Seymour—whose shrinking from conflict with the Federal authorities on every issue of right which has been heretofore presented to him has made him a by-word, as responsible more than any other man for the unchecked career of the authorities at Washington is now said to have been roused into the resolve to vindicate the sovereignty of law within the State of New York. It begins to be said that he will take measures to have these transactions and their authors brought into review before the Courts of the State of New York, as trespasses against individuals and unconstitutional invasions of State authority, and that he will support the Courts with the whole physical power of the State. Possibly he may attempt it, but there are so many ways by which he can be baffled, that I have no idea that such a conflict will ever be brought to any practical issue. The principal use of the contest, as of almost every question that is raised anywhere on public matters, will be to affect the nomination and election of President; and it cannot be disputed that, if there is to be an election not positively controlled by the direct use of the army votes, Mr. Lincoln has put into the hands of his adversaries a powerful weapon with which to compass his own overthrow.

Another offence of his Administration, of the same kind, against favourite American theories and sympathies, is the recent denial of the right of asylum to a Spanish officer, pursued for punishment by the authorities of Cuba, and the secret violence with which he caused the victim to be seized and delivered to his pursuers. The case is that of Señor J. A. Arguelles, a Spaniard late in high office as Governor of a province in Cuba, who, having a controversy with the Captain-General, General Dulce, resigned his appointment, and came with a proper passport to the United States. The Spanish authorities afterwards sought to proceed against him as a slave-dealer. It is in substance the same charge which Señor Arguelles publicly made against General Dulce himself, and repeated in the public journals after his arrival here, before the proceedings against him were commenced here. About ten days ago, he was suddenly arrested at his hotel in this city, by deputies of the United States Marshal (Murray), and secreted from the reach of friends and counsel. During the excitement caused by his disappearance, it was discovered that he had been shipped off clandestinely to Havana, to be delivered to the Spanish authorities; and it is now officially avowed that this was done by order of the Secretary of State, with the approval of the President, in pursuance of an agreement with the Spanish Minister.

There is no extradition treaty between Spain and the United States. The transaction is defended on the naked ground that Governments, by the law of nations, have the inherent right of deciding whom they will protect, and to whom they will refuse protection; and that the surrender of Arquelles was within the discretion of this Government in the exercise of that right. To this a volume of indignant protest rises on all sides. If the law be as stated, the worst of criminals has the right to demand that he may test the facts which bring him under the operation of this severe rule in the open day. It is a Neapolitan or Austrian crime to kidnap men in the dark and hurry them secretly to strange and distant prisons. If the law be as stated, it is a law of despotic Governments only, where the sovereignty is an autocracy, and binds itself in all things by its own expressed will. It is not law for a Government where the sovereignty acts by delegated powers, and only through the means which itself provides—certainly not in a republic, where the Administration has no powers except those granted by constitutions and regulated by law. Mr. Seward and Mr. Lincoln assume too much when they claim that, in respect to the inherent powers of sovereignty, they are on an equal footing with monarchs. And if the power could be found, the American feeling and practice has been so uniformly and indignantly against even the willing surrender of fugitives under the solemn obligations of treaties, that it is a shock to all their sensibilities, for which no political frenzy can find an excuse, to note the precipitancy with which the President violates the sacred right of asylum, and, without treaty obligations or law, at his own arbitrary will, delivers up to his enemies the stranger who sought the protection of their flag. The same despotic authority which thus gives up a supposed criminal is equally competent to deliver at its caprice any offender for any possible offence for which another Government might wish to reclaim him for punishment or vengeance. It is a damaging coincidence for the Administration that this assumption of a power so utterly odious, and universally unpopular, should be contemporaneous with the exercise of the despotic power to suppress public journals, and override, by a mere military order, the constitutional safeguards for liberty and property within the States. The wildest war republican begins to shrink from the practical application of the doctrine of passive obedience to arbitrary power, which he has been teaching so long and so clamorously.

Congress, too, is adding to Mr. Seward's troubles by unanimously asking him to furnish the grounds upon which he is reported in the French official journals to have explained away the meaning of their former unanimous vote in favour of applying the Monroe doctrine to the French occupation of Mexico. There is trouble all about. It will be instructive to watch how he escapes, if he escape at all, from the meshes in which he has been so long and so industriously entangling himself.

LATE CONFEDERATE SUCCESSES.—There is not a State in the Confederacy, with the exception of Missouri, where we have no force, in which, within about two months past, the Confederate arms have not achieved some success or the Yankees met with a failure. Thus we have: In Texas, Benavide's affair at Laredo. In Louisiana, Banks's defeat at Mansfield. In Arkansas, the capture of Jacksonport, and possibly by this time the discomfiture of Steele. In Kentucky, the capture of Paducah. In Tennessee, the capture of Fort Pillow. In Mississippi, the defeat of Grierson. In Alabama, the Yankee failure at Fort Powell. In Florida, the victory of Olustee. In Georgia, the repulse of Crow's Valley. In South Carolina, the confessed failure of the siege of Charleston. In North Carolina, the capture of Plymouth. In Virginia, the defeat of Dahlgren's raid. There are others besides, but we have confined ourselves to a single affair in each State.—Richmond Despatch, May 3.

THE Northern papers publish a list of Federal Generals who have died during the war. This list comprises thirty-six killed in battle, and fifteen who have died of diseases contracted in the service.

NEVADA.—On May 19, the Federal House of Representatives passed the Senate Bill authorising Nevada to form a State Government.

LITERARY NOTES.

MR. NASSAU W. SENIOR is dead, at the age of seventy-three. Known to the general public chiefly through one or two works of considerable but not striking merit, his position in political society was an exceedingly eminent one, and he made a peculiar but very serviceable use of it. Holding confidential conversations with men of all parties and countries, he was wont to record in MS. journals the opinions he elicited from them, and the views they expressed upon men and circumstances. These journals were at the service of his friends, of course in honourable confidence that the information they disclosed should never be misused; and they contributed in no small degree to enlighten and direct the judgment of writers and politicians in regard to the character and prospects of persons and parties abroad, to whom few men had such ready and universal access as the diarist. His Turkish and Egyptian journals have been published. They are the least interesting of his collections, but they give a fair idea of the nature of the volumes necessarily withheld. The public has little notion how much it owes to Mr. Senior—how much his journals contributed to inform and correct the opinions of those from whom the readers of newspapers and reviews learn the sense and bearing of what is passing in foreign countries. Full and frank as his records of conversation were, Mr. Senior never abused the confidence of private intercourse; and we believe that no case ever occurred in which the disclosure of a state secret or the publication of a personal scandal was traced to him. In future years, his manuscripts will serve to cast light on the private characters of many of the greatest of public men, and on the private history of many of the most important public events, and will afford to the historian of our generation precisely those materials which historians in general most covet and most rarely find.

Among the works recently published, none is more worthy of note than the collected edition of Mr. H. Taylor's poems.* The author of the 'Statesman' is much less known to his contemporaries than a multitude of writers of greatly inferior merit; and it is to posterity that he must look for that full appreciation which is always eventually rendered to genius, intellect, and taste. The vast majority of successful writers succeed because they hit the passing fancy of their age, and for the same reason—because the fancy of the age is but passing, and each generation has its own—an after-time consigns them to oblivion. They have had their reward; they have charmed those contemporaries with whom they sympathised, and whose admiration they desired; they have received profit and honour from those whose intellectual palate they have striven to gratify; and they have no claim to anything more. The favour of posterity is reserved for those who have consulted, not the fleeting taste of the multitude, but the fixed taste of the intellectual few—who have appealed, not to the accidental humours of their contemporaries, but to the deeper feelings of human nature which do not change with changing generations. These in their own day win only the approval of scholars; but that approval introduces them to succeeding generations, and, being confirmed by the judgment of posterity, ranks them with those authors whose works are among the permanent possessions of mankind. Mr. Taylor belongs to this class of writers. He is in no sense peculiarly a writer of this self-conceited nineteenth century; his works are not distinguished either by its special affectations, or by its particular cast of thought; their excellence belongs to no single school, nor are their merits of that type which finds most favour with readers of poetry in the present day. Both his prose and his verse are admirably simple in style and severe in tone, totally free from the slovenliness which disgraces so many contemporary authors, as well as from that affectation of mystery which disfigures so much of our poetry. Perfectly clear and straightforward in expression, even his loftiest thoughts are spoken in language whose sense it requires no second perusal to discover, his diction is classically correct and pure, his verse singularly accurate, and his prose unrivalled alike in terseness and in simplicity. His life has been spent in the transaction of public business; and the atmosphere of politics pervades the whole of his writings. His greater poems—and his minor ones are of comparatively little value—turn, except in one instance, entirely on political themes; and as his one prose work is intended to describe the life and direct the apprenticeship of a professional statesman, so the heroes of his great dramas are always statesmen—historical personages, whose interests in life and whose action in history are of the political type. In the 'Statesman' we find counsels which cannot but be useful to all those who are placed in positions of extensive authority, and on whose wisdom and knowledge of the world, on whose health and temper, on whose life and conduct the welfare of others is likely to depend; in the poems we find the political character developed in action, and recognise in the principal actors the political cast of mind. The most generous and high-minded of Mr. Taylor's heroes are still men of the world, practical, stern, and somewhat hard in disposition; with the prompt peremptory manner and decided temper which mark the man accustomed to the transaction of momentous business, and wont to make up his mind and act on his own resolves therein. 'Philip van Artevelde' is, in our opinion, the only poem of this age which, in point of poetic excellence, of intellectual splendour, and of moral grandeur, can be placed on a level with the 'Idylls of the King.' And in the contrast between these two poems the tone of Mr. Taylor's mind, and the bent of his imagination, appear most vividly. Dealing with a chivalric age, Mr. Taylor's poem is anything but chivalrous. His hero avowedly wages war with the chivalry of Christendom; and his ideal of excellence is not the knight-errant of romance, but the ruler and reformer of history—not the man

> Who would against his own eye-witness fain
> Have all men true and leal, and all woman pure;

but he who sees mankind as they are, and is perhaps disposed even to judge them more harshly than they deserve; who, recognising distinctly the work to be done in life and the means of doing it, is not too squeamish to undertake his part therein, but in all emergencies 'can do what is needful.' 'The blameless king' is the ideal of youth, 'selfless man and stainless gentleman;' one who never could have soiled his hands by mingling in the strife of modern politics, or in the coarse work of daily life in any sphere and any age—such a man as is only to be imitated by those whose good fortune exempts them from that coarse work, and allows them to emulate the chivalric virtues without bringing them too closely and constantly to the test of practical needs. Philip van Artevelde's is a character which we learn to appreciate only after we have reached manhood—a character far from perfect, but in which the good predominates, and which the alloy of evil but serves to harden into practical usefulness—the character of a man who has not passed through the world's trials and temptations unscathed, but whose heart is nevertheless sound, and whose steps are bent in the right direction—the great man of real life, the ideal of those whose very imaginations are bound down, more or less closely, within the scope of realities. 'Philip van Artevelde' is hardly the poem to be very popular with the young; and as the young are the chief readers of poetry, it has failed as yet to achieve the reputation it deserves. But to scholars, writers, and thinkers, Mr. Taylor's poems are well known; and by these they are so frequently quoted, that many lines have reached the familiarity of household words among people who would be sorely puzzled to assign their authorship.

> The world knows nothing of its greatest men.
> I will not wait upon necessity,
> And leave myself no choice of vantage-ground;
> But rather meet the times where best I may,
> And mould and fashion them as best I can.
> An unthrift was a liar from all time:
> Never was debtor that was not deceiver.

These are among the many passages which by frequent citation the few who know their author have made familiar to the multitude who never heard of him.

M. Guizot's 'Memoirs of a Minister of State'* will not, we think, tend to raise the estimation in which the Minister of the late King of the French is held in England. Among those who did not know him, M. Guizot enjoyed the reputation of a loyal and high-minded man; those who did know him had in the lapse of time forgotten some of his worst sins, and remembered him chiefly as the earnest upholder of constitutional government in France, and the energetic supporter of the English alliance. The veteran politician is not well-advised in reminding us how insincere was his constitutionalism, and how selfish his diplomacy; in holding himself up to public admiration as he was, an obstinate intriguer, capable of deceiving his friends and violating his word whenever he saw the opportunity of achieving a personal vengeance or a diplomatic victory—a Minister more bent on the success of his own policy than on the preservation of the constitutional liberties which it cost France so much to win, and which she found it so difficult to retain. These memoirs reach from 1840 to 1842. If M. Guizot be wise, he will stop here; he will refrain from telling us how he dishonoured France in the eyes of Europe, and Louis Philippe in the eyes of France, by the infamous treachery which brought about the Spanish marriage—how he sacrificed to the greed of a crowned scoundrel the happiness and the virtue of a maiden Queen, and his own character as a gentleman and man of honour—how his obstinate adherence to a system of corruption in the Chambers and repression against the press finally forced his political adversaries into insurrection against the dynasty, and sacrificed alike the constitution and the monarchy. There is enough in this volume to damage M. Guizot's character with English readers. It is impossible to read the chapter which treats of the Eastern negotiations—the affairs of Egypt—without being struck with the contrast presented by the policies of France and England; the one bent only on stealing diplomatic advantages and gratifying the national vanity, the other keeping steadily in view the matter actually in hand, the calls of duty and the interests of Europe, and willing to yield any and every minor point in order to carry the one object truly and unselfishly pursued throughout—the consolidation of the Turkish Empire and the subjection of the Pasha of Egypt to the paramount authority of the Sublime Porte. Beside the frank straightforwardness of Lord Palmerston, there is something truly pitiable in the petty malice and personal vanity of the French Minister, anxious only to extort gratifications to the wounded susceptibility of France and acknowledgments of her consequence and dignity, and willing, for this purpose, to trouble and delay the final settlement of a question which had at one time threatened a European war. These memoirs certainly suggest two opposite reflections, which, we believe, accord pretty closely with the opinion of most English statesmen. First, what a comfort it must be in negotiation with France to have to deal with Napoleon III. and M. Drouyn de Lhuys rather than with Louis Philippe and M. Guizot! Secondly, if M. Guizot is to be taken—and he may very fairly be taken—as one of the best of the statesmen of the constitutional régime, how little has France lost by that exclusion from office of these statesmen which is charged as one of the worst sins of the Empire!

As a political writer, Sir G. C. Lewis is perhaps a little heavy and dry. He never cultivated the graces of composition, and always gave much more attention to the matter than to the manner of anything he had to say. But his 'Essays on the Administrations of Great Britain from 1783 to 1830'† are in his best style, and are certainly much more readable than the majority of his books. That they are tinged with party spirit it would be absurd to deny; that they should not be so coloured would have been too much to expect from the most honest man that ever professed Whig principles and married into a Whig family—

> Justis-limus unus
> Qui fuit in Teucris et servantissimus æqui.

But this party spirit is not unpleasantly or venomously manifested; it is the natural bias of a fair and generous-minded man; and it is certain that any one who wishes to form a just estimate of the merits of Pitt and Fox, the Grenvilles, their contemporaries and successors, ought to read and take into account this as well as other estimates of their quality. The preface to this collection, written by Sir F. W. Head, contains some quotations from Sir George's letters on the aspect of affairs in America, which are very characteristic of the writer's coolness, shrewdness, and insight:—

'Dana's lecture on Sumner is very interesting. It illustrates the relations of the South and North, and their feelings to one another. People here speak of the outrage on Sumner as a proof of the brutal manners of the Americans, and their low morality. To me it seems the first blow in a civil war. It betokens the advent of a state of things in which political differences cannot be settled by argument, and can only be settled by force. If half England was in favour of a measure which involved the confiscation of the property of the other half, my belief is that an English Brooks would be equally applauded.'

Again, on the election of 1856:—

'I take for granted that Buchanan will win. The Southern States are thoroughly in earnest. They are fighting for their property. The Northern States have only a principle at stake; they will be less united and less eager. At the same time, it is not at all clear that they can continue to form one State, or rather one political body; and they may reach a point when, like a married couple who cannot agree, they may part by common consent. Each may find his account in a separation.'

Again in 1861:—

'The Northern States have drifted, or rather plunged, into war without having any intelligible aim or policy. The South fight for independence; but what do the North fight for, except to gratify passion and pride? —— in his curious letter talks of averting anarchy; but if the North had remained quiet, they had nothing to fear from anarchy.'

Mr. Long's 'History of the Decline of the Roman Republic' promises to be one of the most interesting works that the classical scholarship of the present generation has produced. It is thoughtful in tone and clear in style; its narration of events is exceedingly full, careful, and intelligible; and the book is remarkable for its fairness and freedom from prejudice and partisanship. Perhaps Mr. Long is a little disposed to judge too harshly both the Roman nation in its dealings with barbarians—for his history starts from the time when Rome had only barbarian enemies—and the Roman aristocracy in their conservative opposition to popular demands. But he never uses words of condemnation half as strong as his facts would bear out; and if he be to blame, it is only for not having sought, in the analogies of history and the experience of our own political contest, mitigating and explanatory circumstances or conjectures which the records before him certainly neither suggest nor supply. The work deserves, and will receive from others, much fuller consideration than it can receive in our columns; we can only say that it will certainly take its place in the cycle of histories of Rome as one, if not of the most agreeable, of the most reliable. The difficulty of the task was enormous, the period dull, its records meagre and contradictory, the perplexities involved many and great; and the success which Mr. Long has achieved is all the more honourable at a time of which we have as yet no good English history. His History is readable and instructive, neither too profound for the general reader nor too loose and vague for the student, and will probably achieve and long enjoy an honourable and well-deserved popularity.

'Dwellers on the Threshold,' by Mr. W. D. Adams,† is a rather dull account of a certain number of magicians and alchemists, neither complete enough to be useful, nor detailed enough to be amusing. The writer never appears to have made up his mind whether to give us a dry history of the real lives of these personages, or a chronicle of the feats ascribed to them; and the result is that he has done neither the one thing nor the other. The book reads like a series of carelessly compiled magazine articles, of which the matter has been got together at the British Museum, and the composition left very much to chance.

'The Life of Major-General Wolfe'‡ is exceedingly interesting. The writer is enthusiastic in his admiration for the hero of the biography, and most painstaking in his labours to collect all information which may cast light on his character or his career. Several sketches of military life in the last century, which are introduced rather accidentally than of malice aforethought, add life and interest to a book which will, we suspect, be among the most popular works of the season, at least with that public to which military biographers chiefly appeal—the reading portion of the youth of England.

THE PUBLIC DEBT OF VIRGINIA.

ON November 19, 1863, the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund presented their Annual Report to the General Assembly of Virginia, in which they show that the total public debt of the State was $35,145,798; of which $1,805,000 (365,000*l.*) is payable in London. The Commissioners then detail what efforts they have made to meet their foreign engagements, and show clearly that the British Government has prevented the British bondholders from regularly receiving their interest. We subjoin this part of the report:—

Since the commencement of the present war it has become a matter of importance to know where the interest of the State debt is payable, and what steps have been taken to redeem the faith of the State by providing for the punctual payment of the interest. And it is proper that the amount due should be stated, and the reason why a portion of it has been in arrear should be assigned particularly as the Treasury has been at all times ready to meet all the liabilities of the State.

The interest on the whole of the registered debt is payable at the State Treasury in the city of Richmond—that on the Coupon Debt is payable partly in New York and partly in London. The amount so payable on January 1, 1864, is as follows:—

In Richmond . . .	$1,327,667 90
In New York . . .	602,700 00
In London	93,250 00

Of the amount payable in Richmond for the preceding years, it is proper to remark that the sum necessary for its payment has been promptly provided, and that it has always been ready for those who are entitled to receive it. But a large portion has not been collected, and we would suggest the propriety of providing by law some limit to the time for collecting the interest due in Richmond, after it becomes due, allowing a reasonable time for persons labouring under disabilities; otherwise, a large amount of money must be kept idle in the Treasury to satisfy creditors who are unwilling to receive it, or will not apply for it when due.

The amount payable in New York has not been paid, because it could not be paid during a state of war with the Government of the United States, without subjecting the whole to the risk of confiscation, and without giving aid and comfort to the public enemy. The Convention of the State, by its ordinance passed on June 26, 1861, prohibited the payment of this interest during the war.

Of the amount payable in London, the Commissioners have been exceedingly anxious to make punctual payment. The interest was paid regularly as long as it was practicable so to do. The semi-annual interest for July 1861 and January 1862 (being for the first year of the war) was promptly met. In the month of April 1862 the Commissioners endeavoured to make arrangements for remitting the interest due on the succeeding 1st of July. In a conference with the British consul located here, an agreement was attempted to be entered into, by which proper provision would have been made for the future payment of interest as it became due, and the consul himself would have been made the medium by which the subjects of his own Government would have received the amount of a debt justly due them. It was proposed that the Commissioners should purchase an amount of cotton or tobacco sufficient to pay the sum due, and place it in the hands of the consul, subject to our risk, and he was asked to remit certificates showing the purchase and deposit of the cotton or tobacco in his hands, allowing him a suitable commission for his trouble; and with these certificates it was well understood that a proper arrangement could have been made to provide for the payment of the interest. This was declined, upon the ground that any arrangement upon the subject with the agents of the State was considered by the British Minister in the city of Washington as a violation of the neutrality assumed by Great Britain between the United States and the Confederate States Government—thus in effect declaring that the sovereign State of Virginia, whose independence had been recognised by the Government of Great Britain during the revolution of 1776, and which recognition had never been withdrawn by that Government, had not the power to make provision for the payment of a just debt, acknowledged to be due to the subjects of Great Britain herself, without first asking permission of the Government of the United States. The idea that a sovereign State cannot make provision for the payment of a debt to a neutral Power, through the agents of that Power, without a violation of neutrality by those agents, when that State is at war with another Power, is simply preposterous. If the debt were due to the Government of the neutral Power, it would have a right to demand its payment, and it has the same right, without violation of neutrality, to attend to the interests of its subjects. But this is the doctrine, and it has been acted upon by other consuls of the same Government in other States. And yet an outcry is made against the States by the people of Great Britain, because the State of Virginia and other States have been in arrear in the payment of interest, under circumstances like these.

But the Commissioners were not satisfied with this unsuccessful effort. A proposition was then made to the Consul of the Austrian Government to undertake the transmission of the interest by means of a similar arrangement. On April 30, 1862, the Commissioners adopted the following preamble and resolutions:—

'In consideration of the impossibility of forwarding the interest that will be due in Europe on July 1 next, by the purchase of exchange, and it being possible to meet the payment by the purchase of tobacco, and by authorising an agent to be employed therefor, to negotiate with the firm of Barings and Brother for the payment of the interest, upon the faith of the tobacco so purchased:

'Resolved, that the auditor of public accounts and the second auditor be authorised to make such contract as they may deem expedient with the Consul of the Austrian Government, to become the agent of the State for purchasing the amount of tobacco necessary for the purpose contemplated, allowing such commission and remuneration for the service rendered as they deem right.

'Resolved further, that the said auditors be authorised to make such arrangements with the authorities of the Confederate Government as will protect the tobacco so purchased from destruction by the military, and facilitate the arrangement hereby contemplated.'

In a short time, however, it was ascertained that this proposition was declined upon the same ground.

An effort was then made to purchase the necessary exchange, but it was found impossible at that time to procure it. Under these circumstances, the interest has remained unpaid. The amount now due for the half-years ending July 1, 1862, January 1, 1863, July 1, 1863, and January 1, 1864—being for each of said periods the sum of £41,444 44—making an aggregate, on January 1, 1864, of £165,777 76.

We entertain a hope, notwithstanding all these disappointments, to be able in a short time to make a satisfactory arrangement, by which the interest now in arrear may be provided for. Every effort consistent with the proper and legal management of the duty intrusted to us, will be made to preserve the faith and credit of the State.

All which is respectfully submitted.

J. M. BENNETT, Auditor of Public Accounts.
GEORGE W. MUNFORD, Secretary of the Commonwealth.

A CATHOLIC CHURCH SACKED BY THE FEDERALS.—A correspondent of a Houston (Texas) paper gives a long account of the outrages of the Federal troops in Louisiana, and says: 'I had formerly believed that many of the stories of the burning of dwellings, robberies of churches, &c., were exaggerated; but after seeing these things with my own eyes, I am satisfied they are true. A Catholic church in the Spanish settlement, near Double Bayou Bridge, was sacked, and the church ornaments carried away; even the window curtains were taken.'

SUDDEN DEATH OF MR. HAWTHORNE, THE AUTHOR.—On May 19, Mr. Nathaniel Hawthorne was found dead in his bed at Plymouth, New Hampshire, by Ex-President Pierce, with whom he was travelling. The deceased gentleman, who was in his 60th year, was suffering from general debility; but there was nothing in the symptoms to prepare his friends for the melancholy event. 'Our Old Home' was Mr. Hawthorne's last published work.

THE ARKANSAS ASSEMBLY.—A Cincinnati paper states that the Hon. H. B. Allis, Speaker of the Arkansas House of Assembly, has been expelled, by a vote of 32 to 13, for refusing to sign the certificate of Mr. Fishbank as United States Senator.

SIEGE OF CHARLESTON: THREE HUNDRED AND FIRST DAY.—The Charleston Mercury of May 5 says: 'Ninety-two shells were fired at Fort Sumter during Tuesday and Tuesday night. Of these thirty-five struck.'

LOSSES OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY IN 1863.—The Register of the United States Navy, just published, contains a list of thirty-eight vessels captured and destroyed during the past year.

THE ROLL OF HONOUR.—The Governor of Virginia, in accordance with acts passed by the General Assembly in February last, is preparing a record of all the Virginian troops that have been engaged in the present war of independence.

THE New York papers report that Mr. E. A. Pollard, of the Richmond Examiner, and the author of 'A History of the War' published at Richmond, was on board the Greyhound when that steamer was captured by the Federals.

She left Bermuda May 18, and brings 100 tons of tobacco, 703 bales of cotton, and also 70,000*l.* in gold, chiefly on account of the Confederate Government. Among her 14 cabin passengers are Mr. and Mrs. Musson, Mr. H. Tapp, Mr. F. Skinner, Miss Desterre, the Rev. T. Frith, and Lieutenant Brawley, who belongs to the 6th South Carolina Regiment, and lost his arm May 31, 1862, at the battle of Seven Pines, Chickahominy. He left Wilmington May 10, in the steamer Thistle, which followed the Confederate ram Lawley, where she dispersed the Federal blockade ships. At the mouth of the river ten of these were outside, and one made an effort to overtake the Thistle. Ex-senator C. C. Clay, of Alabama, and Mr. Jacob Thomson, of Mississippi, left Wilmington in the Thistle, and after arrival at Bermuda started for Halifax. The Harriet Pinckney experienced head gales from NE. by E. all the passage home, and spoke, May 24, in lat. 34 29 N., lon. 45 10 W., the schooner Catherine M'Keever, of Inverness, from Kingston for London; and June 3, in lat. 49 32 N., lon. 15 5 W., the French brig Ariel, 94 days from Brazil for Havre.

AT BERMUDA.—May 16: The Ashford, The Georgina M'Caw (steamer), The Lynx (steamer), The Rouen (steamer), The Harkaway, from Liverpool. SHIP LAUNCHES.

The following vessels have been recently launched:—A 265 tons barque, from the yard of Mr, G. Gardiner, North Sand, named the Herald of Light; the Glenesptong, a 10 years' barque, of 296 tons register, from the yard of Mr. J. Blumer; The Beautiful Star, a 10 years' vessel of 455 tons, from the yard of Mr. J. Barkes; a 9 years' barque of 352 tons O.M., from the yard of Mr. Herrington, Hylton—all on the Wear. On the 23rd ult. there was launched, from the building yard of Mr. Edward James, at Aberystwith, a clipper schooner, 83 tons register, classed A 1 ten years: she is named the Mary Ellen. There was also launched from the yard of the Portland Shipbuilding Company, at Troon, a clipper ship of about 1,200 tons burthen, to class 13 years, named Free Queen: she was named by Miss Smith, one of the daughters of John Smith, Esq., of Irvine.

On Saturday afternoon Messrs. Henderson, Coulborn, & Co., launched from their yard at Renfrew a paddle-steamer named The Alexander, the principal dimensions of which are as follows, viz.:—Length, 160 feet; breadth, 23 feet; depth, 8 feet. The steamer will be fitted with a pair of the builders' diagonal oscillating engines of 60-horse power nominal. A duplicate of this vessel, to be named The Michel, will be launched by the same builders in a few days.

Last week Messrs. Scott & Co., Cartsdyke, launched a handsome screw steamer of about 600 tons, which was named The Leone, consort to The Milano built by Messrs. Scott, is of the following dimensions:—Length, 210 feet; breadth, 26½ feet; depth 16½ feet. She will be propelled by engines of 150-horse power nominal, to be supplied by the Greenock Foundry Company.

Last week an iron paddle steamer was launched from the shipbulding yard of Messrs. Randolph, Elder, & Co., at Fairfield. She is intended to be lugger or polacca rigged, and supplied with oscillating engines and feathering paddle-wheels. She is to be furnished with three boilers and three furnaces.

On Tuesday, Messrs. Wm. Denny & Brothers, Dumbarton, launched from their upper building yard a paddle-steamer of 868 tons b.m., and which is to be supplied with engines of 200-horse power (nominal), by Messrs. R. Napier & Sons, Lancefield Foundry, Glasgow. She was named The Ella, by Miss Robson, daughter of John Robson, Esq., banker, Dumbarton.

GREENOCK, JUNE 5.—On Thursday afternoon, a magnificent iron paddle-steamer was launched from the shipbuilding-yard of Messrs. Randolph, Elder, & Co., at Fairfield; she is intended for the blockade, and is similar in all respects to The Falcon, launched during the last month.

THE STEAMER GEORGIA.—We understand that this vessel, so well known as belonging to the Confederate States, and which for a considerable period has been employed in the destruction of Federal shipping, in which capacity she has been very successful, has passed into the hands of one of the most extensive merchants and shipowners of FEDERAL MILITARY REPORTS.—The New York World of May 27 says, 'The news we get from the armies is so coloured and distorted as to have become almost worthless. The country is constantly being deceived by accounts of victories which never occurred, and of captures which were never made.'

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

THE state of the discount market is for the moment rather exceptional. There is a good supply of money, and the principal bankers and brokers are working a half per cent. below the official minimum, but from the general position of affairs it is hardly supposed the rate will be reduced. The average quotation may be considered 6½ per cent. for first-class bankers' bills, and the minimum in Threadneedle Street is 7 per cent. In consequence, however, of some arrangements between leading capitalists and Madrid bankers, money has to be sent out there, and fresh advances are granted to that Government, though they neglect the adjustment of the Passive and the claims of the Certificate holders. For the moment the rates are consequently supported. If the Bank directors should reduce the rate it will be because they desire to transact business to provide for the dividend; for the last few days they have been scarcely transacting anything in the discount department. The favourable state of the weather and the supply of money should give confidence to the operators in stocks and shares; a great want of business will now be experienced through the retirement of many persons for holiday recreation.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The aspect of affairs with regard to the movements in bullion and specie has materially altered since last week; the amount of gold sent into the Bank has been only 12,000*l*., against which there have been withdrawals for transmission abroad to the extent of 83,000*l*. The arrivals of specie, however, have been to a fair extent, comprising altogether 305,484*l*., of which 70,000*l*. is from Bermuda and the Confederate States, 194,659*l*. from New York, 5,493*l*. from the Brazils, 11,532*l*. from Melbourne, 20,800*l*. from Port Phillip. The Delta steamer, which left this week for the East, took out 85,319*l*., of which 82,470*l*. was in silver, and 2,849*l*. gold. The proportions were, for India, 10,849*l*.; China, Straits, and Japan, 72,470*l*.; and Alexandria, 2,000*l*. There has been rather more demand for silver within the last two or three days, and prices have improved. About 30,000*l*. of Mexican dollars (chiefly out of the last West Indian packet) have been sold for China at 62¼*d*. per oz., being an advance of ½*d*. on previous sales; and to-day about 200,000 oz. of bar silver have been disposed of at 61¼*d*. and 61⅜*d*., being a slight rise. The telegrams from Melbourne, dated April 25, state that the shipments of gold since the departure of the last mail amount to 22,000 oz., valued at 88,000*l*.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The market for the English funded securities has been far from active during the week, the dealers being restrained in their operations through the uncertain state of the money market and the unsatisfactory position of continental affairs, particularly as regards the Germano-Danish question and the ultimate result of the Conference. Prices generally have shown weakness, but there has been a slight rally, and Consols close this evening at 90⅛ to 90¼ ex. div. for money, and 90¼ to 90⅜ ex. div. for the account, which is as nearly as possible the same as on this day week. Exchequer bills are rather firmer, the March issue being at 11*s*. to 6*s*. dis., and those of June at 5*s*. dis. to par. In foreign stocks a fair business has been transacted, but the most excitement has been in Spanish, which have declined considerably in consequence of the unfavourable nature of the news with regard to the intentions of the Minister of Finance of Spain as to her foreign creditors. The Passives have in consequence declined about 2 per cent., and the Certificates 1½ per cent. There has also been a drop of 1 per cent. in Greek. Mexican, however, have slightly improved, and Turkish are likewise better. The closing quotations this evening were:—Greek, at 24¼ to 24¾; Mexican, 44¾ to 45; Spanish Passives, 32¼ to 32½; Spanish Certificates, 9⅞ to 10⅛; Turkish six per cents. of 1854, 90 to 91, and those of 1862, 71¼ to 71¾.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been steady this week, with a moderate amount of business, improving fractionally upon purchases, of which several have been again made for conversion into cotton. We close 65 to 66, without much doing.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The progress of the war in Virginia, regarded as it is generally so favourable to the Confederate cause, is exercising a most depressing influence upon all descriptions of American Securities. The dealers have almost entirely ceased to operate, preferring to wait from day to day for some decisive news from the other side. Not a single transaction was recorded yesterday, and it has been the same to-day. The only dealings that have taken place during the week have been in Virginia Six per Cents, at 33; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, at 75; do. Pennsylvania do., at 73 and 72½; Erie, $100 shares, all paid, at 56, 55½, and 56; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, at 28¼, 30, and 28½ dis.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Business in the Railway Share Market has not been particularly brisk this week, the same causes tending to restrict transactions as have prevailed in the other departments; but, notwithstanding the general depression, prices on the whole present a favourable appearance. To-day there has been rather more animation, with a firmer tendency in quotations. As compared with last week, there has been a rise in Vale of Neath shares of 4 per cent.; of 2 per cent. in Edinburgh and Glasgow and Great Northern; of 1½ per cent. in North British; of 1 per cent. in Great Southern and Western, London, Chatham, and Dover, and North-Eastern (York); and of ½ per cent. in Lancashire and Yorkshire, London and North-Western, Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, North-Eastern (Berwick), and Staines and Wokingham. On the other hand, there has been a decline of 4 per cent. in Taff Vale; of 1 per cent. in West Midland (Hereford); of ½ per cent. in Great Eastern; and of ¼ per cent. in South-Eastern. In foreign and colonial railway shares a moderate business has been transacted, but without any material alteration in values.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the twenty-eighth annual general meeting of the Bank of British North America, the report, which was unanimously adopted, stated that the net profits for the year 1863, after deducting charges and income-tax, amounted to 61,413*l*. Out of this amount the directors have declared a half-yearly dividend payable on July 5 next, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, free of income-tax. The sum of 1,413*l*. will then be left to be added to the rest, which, including that addition, and after providing for the dividend paid in January last, and for a deduction of 10,000*l*. to cover the depressed value of securities, amounted on December 31 last to 120,024*l*. The Chairman (Mr. A. N. Jaffray) explained that the 10,000*l*. had been taken from the rest to meet losses occasioned by the depreciation of American Securities owing to the war. The directors had not contemplated so large a depreciation at the commencement of the war, or they would have previously provided for it.—At the meeting of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, the report read stated that reference was made in the two previous reports to a tender submitted by the Company, at the request of the Government, for the establishment of a second line of steamers to Australia, and expectations were held out that an arrangement for the double service, via Galle, would shortly be concluded. The directors were, however, informed, by a letter from the Postmaster-General, dated the 15th January last, eight months after their offer had been made, that the 'Lords of the Treasury were not prepared, at least for the present, to entertain the proposal.' It has appeared subsequently that the Company's tender was not officially communicated to the Governments of the colonies, and the matter consequently remains in abeyance. Notwithstanding a considerable falling off in the silk shipments from China during the spring months, the result of the Company's operations for the half-year allows of a payment of 1½ per cent., in addition to the usual half-yearly dividend of 3½ per cent. The accounts for the half-year ending March 31 last will accordingly be calculated at 5 per cent. on the paid-up capital, and will be paid free of income-tax. The report was adopted nem. con. Special meetings of the Mercantile Credit Association and the Imperial Financial Company have been held, to confirm the resolutions for amalgamating the two undertakings, and authorising the issue of fresh shares at par instead of 1*l*. prem.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In the produce markets a steady business is doing, and but few alterations have occurred in prices since our last. Arrivals have been of fair extent, and have furnished good supplies of the principal articles, for which there has been sufficient demand to clear the greater portion off at full rates. The deliveries from warehouse go on very satisfactorily, and evidence a healthy state of trade in these departments generally. With the continuation of fine weather, the wheat crops progress very favourably, and purchases are made with the caution and reserve usually witnessed under the circumstances. American provisions meet a fair enquiry in connection with other kinds of foreign. Good American cheese, at 50*s*. to 58*s*., sells steadily. Bacon sides, at 38*s*. to 42*s*., are dull of sale, attention being directed chiefly to the better qualities of Irish and Hamburg. American lard is neglected. In cotton a moderate business is passing, and rates are steady, a demand for export lending support to the market. Manilla hemp is firm, and good roping can hardly be quoted under 35*l*. 10*s*. to 36*l*. per ton. Jute has again sold rather largely at an average of 16*l*. 10*s*. to 29*l*. 10*s*. for common to fine. The sales of coloured wool closed this evening, 102,235 lbs. having sold during the progress of the series at fully the rates of the last quarter, to 1*d*., and in some instances 1½*d*., per lb. advance. The assortment on this occasion has been unusually good. Continental buyers have taken a fair proportion, but on American account the purchases have been small. Silk is dearer in consequence of the unfavourable aspect of the continental crop. Beyond some occasional sales of spelter at 23*l*. 5*s*. to 23*l*. 10*s*. on the spot, there has been very little doing in metals, quotations of which are nominally unaltered. The principal feature in the oil trade is the firmness of refined foreign rape, which is now held at 46*s*. to 46*s*. 6*d*. per cwt. Fish oils attract very little attention. The tallow market remains without any special feature. After being quiet for several days the demand for sugar is reviving, and rates are again very firm. Large supplies of Ceylon coffee have been cleared off, at about previous quotations for plantation, but slightly lower terms for native kinds. The tea market is altogether firmer, with more disposition to buy, owing to the continuously good deliveries here and the diminished shipments from China. In spices the only change is a small advance in white pepper, which has been sold at 6*d*. per lb. New Honduras black cochineal has realised high prices, but silver grain is 1*d*. per lb. lower.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, June 8.—Our cotton market during the week has not been particularly active; the demand throughout has been of a moderate character, but the holders of American cotton have been very firm as regards prices, but the quotations of last week are unaltered. Fine Sea Islands have advanced, but in nearly all other descriptions there has been a decline. The sales this week have amounted to 39,000 bales, of which 14,000 have been taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year to the present date have been 1,127,070 bales; and, to the same period in 1863, 919,440 bales. There have been imported so far this year 961,209 bales, against 648,083 bales last year. The exports this year have been 208,138 bales; in 1863 they were 185,885 bales. There have been taken for consumption during the present year 708,600 bales, and to the same period last year 483,100 bales. There have been taken on speculation this year 193,310 bales, and in 1863, 230,050 bales. The computed stocks at the present time are 325,680 bales, and at the corresponding period last year they were 371,530 bales. The closing quotations were, for American descriptions, 26*d*. to 29½*d*.; Pernambuco, 28¾*d*.; Maranham, 28¾*d*.; Egyptian, 26½*d*. to 32*d*.; Smyrna, 23½*d*.; Surats, 13*d*. to 25*d*.; Bengal, 17*d*. to 17¼*d*.; Scinde, 17¼*d*.; and China, 18½*d*. to 20½*d*.

The markets at Manchester have, during the week, been exceedingly quiet, and to some extent depressed, the only exception being for shipping yarns, for which there has been rather more enquiry for all the leading markets except those of India, for which there is nothing doing. For China, Russia, and the Mediterranean markets, there has been a strong enquiry, and some considerable sales have taken place at full prices. There has been a very quiet market for home-trade yarns. Nominally there is no change to notice in prices, but in some cases where spinners are not fully supplied with orders, there is a disposition to accept rather lower terms. The business actually transacted has been very small, and, as a general rule, prices are declining. In the cloth market there is no improvement whatever upon last week—in fact, there is, if anything, increased depression, which is in a great degree to be attributed to the unfavourable advices from India, the excitement caused by the nature of the American news, and the great uncertainty in which the Germano-Danish question is involved. There is no disposition on the part of buyers to transact business except at a reduction in prices, but manufacturers in general stand out for late quotations; but, to complete bargains, much lower prices would have to be accepted. In fact, for exportation little or no business has been done. In the home-trade houses, stocks are greatly reduced, but buyers will not replenish at present prices. The chief business doing, however, is in the home trade, but orders are exceedingly limited.

ACTS OF THE FOURTH SESSION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA, 1863–1864.

AN ACT TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE.

WHEREAS, the Confederate States are engaged in a war, upon the successful issue of which depend the integrity of their social system, the form of their civilisation, the security of life and property within their limits, as well as their existence as sovereign and independent States; And whereas, the conduct in all the contest demands that they should call into requisition whatever resources of men and money they have for the support of their cause, to faithfully administer the same: Therefore, as a part of the system of the public defence:—

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the exportation of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses, and rice, from the Confederate States, and from all places in the occupation of their troops, is prohibited, except under such uniform regulations as shall be made by the President of the Confederate States.

SEC. 2. That if any person, or persons, shall put, place, or load on board any ship, steamboat, or vessel, or any other water craft, or into any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for conveyance or transportation beyond the Confederate States, or into any portion of said States occupied by the enemy, any of the articles mentioned in the first section of this act, or shall collect the same for the purpose of being conveyed or transported, contrary to the prohibition aforesaid, within the Confederate States, or beyond them, the said articles, and the ship, boat, or other water craft, wagon, carriage, or other vehicle, with the slaves and animals that may be employed or collected for the purpose of aiding therein, shall be forfeited, and all persons, their aiders and abettors, on conviction of being interested or concerned in the enterprise, shall be deemed to be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and punishable by such fine or imprisonment or both, as the court may impose.

SEC. 3. That it shall not be lawful to put on board any ship, boat, vessel, or other water craft, or upon any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for transportation or conveyance aforesaid, any of the articles afores id, unless a permit be previously obtained from some officer of the Confederate States specially authorised to grant the same, particularly describing the articles thus to be laden, and the ship, boat, vessel, water craft, wagon, carriage, cart, or other vehicle, on which the same is to be transported, and until bond shall be given that the same shall be conveyed and transported to the place of destination under such conditions and regulations, and for such objects, as shall be prescribed by the President under the first section of this act.

SEC. 4. That the collectors of all the districts of the Confederate States, and such other officers as may be designated by the President of the Confederate States, shall have power and authority to take into their custody any of the articles before mentioned found on any ship boat, or other water craft, when there is reason to believe that they are intended for exportation, or when in vessels, carts, or wagons, or any other carriage or vehicle whatsoever, or in any manner, apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or towards the territory of the Confederate States in the occupation of the United States, or the vicinity thereof, or towards a place whence such articles are intended to be exported, and not to permit the same to be removed until bond shall be given, with satisfactory sureties, that no violation of this act, and the regulations under the same, is intended.

SEC. 5. That the powers granted by this act to the revenue and other officers of the Confederate States under this act to allow or refuse exportation of the articles before mentioned, or for the seizure or detention of any of the said articles, shall be exercised in conformity with such instructions as the President may give through the Departments of War and of the Treasury, which instructions may impose conditions as to the destination and sale of the same, and the investment of the proceeds of the same, or a portion thereof, in military or other supplies for the public service, which instructions such officers shall be bound to obey; and if any action or suit shall be brought against any such officer or officers, or their agents, he or they may plead the general issue, and upon proof of a compliance with the provisions of this act, or with the regulations and instructions of the President, he or they shall be absolved from all responsibility therefor; and any person aggrieved by any of the acts of any of the officers or agents aforesaid, may file his petition before the district court of the district in which such officer or agent resides, and after due notice to him, and to the district attorney, the said court may proceed summarily to hear and determine thereupon as law and justice may require, and the judgment of the said court and the reasons therefor shall be filed among the records of the court, and in case any release shall be granted, the judge may impose such conditions as to giving bond and security as may, in his opinion, be necessary to secure this act from violation, and, in case of refusal, may impose double or treble costs upon the petitioner if circumstances warrant: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account.

SEC. 6. That exclusive jurisdiction is conferred upon the district courts of the Confederate States of all suits or actions that may arise under this act in behalf of the Confederate States, its officers and agents, for the recovery of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures imposed in the same, by indictment, information, or action, according to the practice of the court, and the distribution of the penalties and fines shall be made under and according to the laws now in force for violation of the revenue acts, and all laws for the mitigation and remittance of penalties and forfeitures shall be applied in similar cases.

SEC. 7. That it shall be lawful for the President, or such officers as he may designate, to employ any portion of the military or naval force of the Confederacy or of the militia, to prevent the illegal departure of any ship, vessel, or other water craft, for detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody the same, or any wagon, cart, or other vehicle heretofore mentioned, their teams and drivers, and their products aforesaid, and to suppress and disperse any assembly of persons who may resist the execution of this act, or oppose the fulfilment, by the officers, of the duties imposed by the same.

SEC. 8. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

APPROVED, February 6, 1864.

REGULATIONS TO CARRY INTO EFFECT THE ACT 'TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE,' APPROVED, FEBRUARY 6, 1864.

I. AS TO THE SEA.

1. The owners of any vessel intending to sail from a Confederate port with a cargo consisting in whole or part of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses or rice, shall, before the landing on board of any such articles, file with the collector of the port from which the vessel is to sail, a copy of her register, with a declaration of the names of the owners and officers thereof, the place of their birth and of their residence for the preceding year, together with the port or place to which the said vessel proposes to sail. The said declaration shall also set forth the quantity and value, in Confederate currency, of the cargo proposed to be taken out, as also the consent of the said owners, that one-half of the tonnage of the said vessel may be employed by the Confederate Government for its own use, both on the outward and homeward voyage, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned. The collector shall submit a statement as to the owners and officers to the military commandant of the port, and if he shall not object to their loyalty, or to the sailing of the vessel, for reasons of military necessity, the collector shall grant a permit for the lading of the said vessel, one-half for account of the owners and one-half for account of the Confederate States.

2. Before the said lading shall be completed, the owners of the vessel shall execute to the Confederate States a bond in double the value of the vessel, with security deemed adequate by the collector, conditioned that she will pursue the voyage designated, and that she will return with reasonable dispatch to a Confederate port, after her outward cargo shall be discharged with a cargo, consisting one half of articles not prohibited by the laws of the Confederate Government, and the other half of such articles as the Government shall offer for shipment from such port, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned.

3. Each shipper of any portion of the cargo proposed to be laden on board the said vessel, shall, before the lading thereof, make application to the collector for a permit to lade the same, which application shall declare the articles to be shipped, and the quantity and value thereof in Confederate currency, the port of destination, and the name of the consignee. A permit shall then be granted by the collector if the application is deemed satisfactory. The lading shall be had under the inspection of a revenue officer, who shall be charged with the duty of seeing that the goods laden conform to the permit.

4. Before the completion of the lading on board or the granting a clearance, each shipper of any portion of the cargo shall execute and deliver to the collector a bond to the Confederate States, in double the value of his shipment in Confederate money, with security deemed adequate by the collector, with condition that at least one half the net proceeds of said shipment shall be invested in goods or articles not prohibited by law, and said goods or articles shall be shipped by the same or some other vessel to the Confederate States within sixty days from the unlading of said cargo; or that the said half of the net proceeds shall be paid in coin or sterling exchange to the proper agent of the Confederate States, to be reimbursed to the shipper by the delivery to him of cotton at the port of departure in the Confederate States, at the rate of ten pence sterling per pound for middling uplands.

5. The freight to be paid by the Confederate States on all cotton and tobacco shipped from a Confederate port shall be five pence sterling per pound, payable on delivery at the port of destination, in coin or sterling exchange. Return freight shall be at the rate of 25*l.* per ton, payable on its delivery in a Confederate port, in cotton at ten pence sterling per pound for middling uplands, and at a proportionate price for cotton of other qualities. In calculating the ton of freight by weight, 2,240 pounds shall be allowed; by measure, forty cubic feet shall be a lowed.

6. If the outward bound vessel shall consent, at the request of the Government, to take two-thirds of her cargo for account of the Confederate States, the outward freight shall be six pence sterling per pound, and whenever the Government is not prepared to fill up any portion of the tonnage reserved for its use at the time at which any vessel may be made ready to sail, her owners may fill up the same on their own account: but no vessel shall, without consent of the Government, sail on her outward voyage until one third of her cargo shall be laden for the use of the Government.

7. The rates of freight for articles other than cotton and tobacco shall be adjusted at the same relative rate and payable in the same way.

8. The Government reserves the right to limit or prohibit the shipment of rosin, turpentine, or any manufacture thereof, whenever deemed dangerous to its own shipment.

9. Upon the completion of the lading of the vessel, and before receiving her clearance, there shall be delivered to the collector, in addition to the usual manifest, another setting forth the names, ages, and description of her officers and crew, and of every passenger intending to sail in her. The said last-mentioned manifest shall be delivered to the commandant of the port, who shall thereupon cause the entire vessel to be searched, and if satisfied that the parties on board are persons who may safely be permitted to leave the Confederacy, and that the passengers have the proper passports, he shall certify the same on the manifest and return the same to the collector, whereupon, and not before, a clearance shall be granted to the vessel, and he shall be permitted to sail.

10. The owners of each vessel, and of each portion of a cargo sailing from a Confederate port, shall be allowed to take up their respective bonds, by producing to the collector the certificate of the proper agent of the Confederate Government at the port of delivery, setting forth the particulars, showing that the said party has complied with the obligations of the said bond so far as the same was practicable, and the collector, upon being duly satisfied, shall be authorised to surrender the said bonds.

11. Nothing in these regulations shall be so construed as to conflict with the proviso of the law, which declares 'that nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account;' nor shall a bond be required of a State in any case.

12. The penalties of all bonds executed in conformity with these regulations, shall be recoverable in full on proof of breach of the conditions of the bond, and without proof of any damage suffered by the Confederate States in consequence of such breach, and all bonds shall be executed in such form as to give effect to this regulation.

13 Vessels sent into the Confederacy for the purpose of exporting cotton received in payment of any Confederate bond or obligation shall be subject to these regulations only so far as relates to such portion of the tonnage, if any, as may remain vacant after the lading of the cotton received in payment as aforesaid.

14. The regulations for overland commerce with neutral countries will be issued separately, within a few days.
